On the conclusion of the treaty of Bretigni, the many military adventurers who had followed the standard of Edward, being dispersed into the several provinces, and possessed of strong holds, refused to lay down their arms, or relinquish a course of life to which they were now accustomed, and by which alone they could gain a subsistence. They associated themselves with the banditti, who were already enured to the habits of rapine and violence; and under the name of the companions, became a terror to all the peaceable inhabitants. Some English and Gascon gentlemen of character, particularly sir Matthew Gournay, sir Hugh Calverly, the chevalier Verte, and others, were not ashamed to take the command of these ruffians, whose numbers on the whole amounted to near forty thousand, and who bore the appearance of regular armies, rather than bands of robbers. These leaders fought pitched battles with the troops of France, and gained victories; in one of which Jaques de Bourbon, a prince of the blood, was slain; and they proceeded to such a height, that they wanted little but regular establishments to become princes, and thereby sanctify, by maxims of the world, their infamous profession. The greater spoil they committed on the country, the more easy they found it to recruit their number: all those who were reduced to misery and despair flocked to their standard: the evil was every day increasing; and though the pope, who resided at Avignon, and expected a visit from these formidable depredators, declared them excommunicated; they, however deeply affected with the sentence, to which they paid a much greater regard than to any principles of morality, could not be induced by it to betake themselves to peaceable or lawful professions.

As Charles was not enabled by power to redress so enormous a grievance, he was led by necessity, and by the turn of his character, to correct it by policy, and to contrive some method of discharging into foreign countries this dangerous and intestine evil.

Peter, king of Castile, stigmatized by his contemporaries and by posterity with the epithet of Cruel, had filled with blood and slaughter his kingdom and his own family; and having incurred the universal hatred of his subjects, he kept, from present terror alone, an anxious and precarious possession of the throne. His nobles fell every day the victims of his severity: he put to death several of his natural brothers from groundless jealousy: each murder, by multiplying his enemies, became the occasion of fresh barbarities; and as he was not destitute of talents, his neighbours, no less than his own subjects, were alarmed at the progress of his violence and injustice. The ferocity of his temper, instead of being softened by his strong propensity to love, was rather inflamed by that passion, and took thence new occasion to exert itself. Instigated by Mary de Padilla, who had acquired the ascendant over him, he threw into prison Blanche de Bourbon, his wife, sister to the queen of France; and soon after made way by poison for the espousing of his mistress.

Henry, count of Trastamare, his natural brother, seeing (d) Some historians would detract from the merit of this honourable conduct, by representing John as enamoured of an English lady, to whom he was glad on this pretence to pay a visit; but besides that this surmise is not founded on any good authority, it appears somewhat unlikely, on account of the advanced age of that prince, who was now in his fifty-sixth year.—Nothing can be a stronger proof of the great dominion of fortune over men, than the calamities which pursued a monarch of such eminent valour, goodness, and honour, and which he incurred merely by reason of some slight imprudences, which in other situations would have been of no importance. But though both his reign and that of his father proved extremely unfortunate to their kingdom, the French crown acquired, during their time, very considerable accessions, those of Dauphiny and Burgundy. This latter province, however, John had the imprudence again to dismember by bestowing it on Philip his fourth son, the object of his most tender affections; a deed which was afterwards the source of many calamities to the kingdom.

the fate of every one who had become noxious to this tyrant, took arms against him; but being foiled in the attempt, he sought for refuge in France, in 1366, where he found the minds of men extremely inflamed against Peter, on account of his murder of the French princess. He asked permission of Charles to enlist the companies in his service, and to lead them into Castile; where, from the concurrence of his own friends, and the enemies of his brother, he had the prospect of certain and immediate success. The French king, charmed with the prospect, employed du Guesclin in negociating with the leaders of these banditti. The treaty was soon concluded. The high character of honour which that general possessed made every one trust to his promises: though the intended expedition was kept a secret, the companies implicitly inlisted under his standard: and they required no other condition before their engagement, than an assurance that they were not to be led against the prince of Wales in Guienne. But that prince was so little averse to the enterprize, that he allowed some gentlemen of his retinue to enter into the service under du Guesclin.

Du Guesclin, having completed his levies, led the army first to Avignon, where the pope then resided, and demanded, sword in hand, an absolution for his soldiers, and the sum of two hundred thousand livres. The first was readily promised him; some more difficulty was made with regard to the second. "I believe that my fellows," replied du Guesclin, "may make a shift to do without your absolution; but the money is absolutely necessary." The pope then extorted from the inhabitants in the city and neighbourhood the sum of a hundred thousand livres, and offered it to du Guesclin. "It is not my purpose," cried that generous warrior, "to oppress the innocent people. The pope and his cardinals themselves can well spare me that sum from their own coffers. This money, I insist, must be restored to the owners. And should they be defrauded of it, I shall myself return from the other side of the Pyrenees, and compel you to make them restitution." The pope found the necessity of submitting, and paid him from his treasury the sum demanded. The army, hallowed by the blessings, and enriched by the spoils of the church, proceeded on their expedition.

These experienced and hardy soldiers, conducted by so able a general, easily prevailed over the king of Castile, whose subjects, instead of supporting their oppressor, were ready to join the enemy against him. Peter fled from his dominions, took shelter in Guienne, and craved the protection of the prince of Wales, whom his father had invested with the sovereignty of these conquered provinces, by the title of the principality of Aquitaine (e). The prince promised his assistance to the dethroned monarch; and having obtained the consent of his father, he levied a great army, and set out upon his enterprize in 1367. He was accompanied by his younger brother, John of Gaunt, created duke of Lancaster, in the room of the good prince of that name, who had died without any male issue, and whose daughter he had espoused. Chandos also, who bore among the English the same character which du Guesclin had acquired among the French, commanded under him in this expedition.

The first blow which the prince of Wales gave to Henry of Trastamare, was the recalling of all the companies from his service; and so much reverence did they bear to the name of Edward, that great numbers of them immediately withdrew from Spain, and enlisted under his banners. Henry, however, beloved by his new subjects, and supported by the king of Arragon and others of his neighbours, was able to meet the enemy with an army of one hundred thousand men; forces three times more numerous than those which were commanded by Edward. Du Guesclin, and all his experienced officers, advised him to delay any decisive action, to cut off the prince of Wales's provisions, and to avoid every engagement with a general, whose enterprizes had hitherto been always conducted with prudence and crowned with success. Henry trusted too much to his numbers; and ventured to encounter the English prince at Najara, on the 3rd of April, 1367. It is said that Henry was chased off the field, with the loss of above twenty thousand men; and that there perished only four knights and forty private men on the side of the English. A very incredible story.

Peter, who so well merited the infamous epithet which he bore, purposed to murder all his prisoners in cold blood; but was restrained from this barbarity by the remonstrances of the prince of Wales. All Castile now submitted to the victor: Peter was restored to the throne; and Edward finished this perilous enterprize with his usual glory. But he had soon reason to repent his connexions with a man like Peter, abandoned to all sense of virtue and honour. The ungrateful tyrant refused the stipulated pay to the English forces; and Edward, finding his soldiers daily perish by sickness, and even his own health impaired by the climate, was obliged, without receiving any satisfaction on this head, to return into Guienne.

The barbarities exercised by Peter over his helpless subjects, whom he now regarded as vanquished rebels, revived all the animosity of the Castilians against him; and, on the return of Henry of Trastamare, together with du Guesclin, and some forces levied anew in France, the tyrant was again dethroned, and was taken prisoner. His brother, in resentment of his cruelties, murdered him with his own hand; and was placed on the throne of Castile, which he transmitted to his posterity. The duke of Lancaster, who espoused in second marriage the eldest daughter of Peter, inherited only the empty title of that sovereignty, and, by claiming the succession, increased the animosity of the new king of Castile against England.

But the prejudice which the affairs of prince Edward received from this splendid though imprudent expedition, ended not with it. He had involved himself in so much debt, by his preparations and the pay of his troops, that he found it necessary, on his return, to impose on his principality a new tax, to which some of the nobility consented with extreme reluctance, and to which others absolutely refused to submit (f). This incident revived the animosity which the inhabitants bore to the English, and which all the amiable qualities of the prince of Wales were not able to mitigate or assuage. They complained that they were considered as a conquered people, that their privileges were disregarded, that all trust was given to the English alone, that every office of honour and profit was conferred on these foreigners, and that the extreme reluctance which most of them had expressed to receive the new yoke, was likely to be long remembered against them. They cast, therefore, their eyes towards their ancient sovereign, whose prudence they found had now brought the affairs of his kingdom into excellent order; and the counts of Armagnac, Comminge, and Perigord, the lord d'Albret, with other nobles, went to Paris, and were encouraged to carry their complaints to Charles, as to their lord paramount, against these oppressions of the English government.

In the treaty of Bretigni it had been stipulated that the two kings should make renunciations, Edward of his claim to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; John of the homage and fealty due for Guienne, and the other provinces ceded to the English. But when that treaty was confirmed and renewed at Calais, it was found necessary, as Edward was not yet in possession of all the territories, that the mutual renunciations should for some time be deferred; and it was agreed that the parties meanwhile should make no use of their respective claims against each other. Though the failure in exchanging these renunciations had still proceeded from France, Edward appears to have taken no umbrage at it; both because this clause seemed to give him entire security, and because some reasonable apology had probably been made to him for each delay. It was, however, on this pretence, though directly contrary to treaty, that Charles resolved to ground his claim, of still considering himself as superior lord of those provinces, and of receiving the appeals of his sub-vassals.

But as views of policy, more than those of justice, enter into (e) The prince seemed now to have entirely changed his sentiments with regard to the Spanish transactions; whether he was moved by the generosity of supporting a distressed prince, and thought, as is but too usual among sovereigns, that the rights of the people were a matter of much less consideration; or dreaded the acquisition of so powerful a confederate to France as the new king of Castile; or, what is most probable, was impatient of rest and ease, and sought only an opportunity for exerting his military talents, by which he had already acquired so much renown.

(f) This tax was a livre upon a hearth; and it was imagined that the imposition would have yielded one million two hundred thousand livres a year, which supposes so many hearths in the provinces possessed by the English. But such loose conjectures have commonly no manner of authority, much less in such ignorant times. There is a strong instance of it in the present reign. The house of commons granted the king a tax of twenty-two shillings on each parish, supposing that the amount of the whole would be fifty thousand pounds. But they were found to be in a mistake of near five to one. Cotton, p. 3. And the council assumed the power of augmenting the tax upon each parish.

into the deliberations of princes; and as the mortal injuries received from the English, the pride of their triumphs, the severe terms imposed by the treaty of peace, seemed to render every prudent means of revenge honourable against them; Charles was determined to take this measure, less by the reasonings of his civilians and lawyers than by the present situation of the two monarchies. He considered the declining years of Edward, the languishing state of the prince of Wales's health, the affection which the inhabitants of all these provinces bore to their ancient master, their distance from England, their vicinity to France, the extreme animosity expressed by his own subjects against these invaders, and their ardent thirst of vengeance; and having silently made all the necessary preparations, he sent to the prince of Wales a summons to appear in his court at Paris on the 1st of May, 1369, and there to justify his conduct towards his vassals. The prince replied, that he would come to Paris; but it should be at the head of sixty thousand men. The unwarlike character of Charles kept prince Edward, even yet, from thinking that that monarch was in earnest in this bold and hazardous attempt.

The prince of Wales having apprized his father of the dishonourable conduct of Charles, Edward summoned a parliament to meet on the 3rd of June, who advised him to renew his pretensions to the throne of France, and immediately to resume the title and arms of king of France. To enable him to support these claims, and the war they would necessarily occasion, they granted him a considerable supply, arising from a heavy duty on wool, wool-fells, and leather.

Charles having foreseen the storm that would inevitably attend the resumption of his own superiority over the foreign dominions of Edward, had made preparations to oppose it with vigour and effect; but, as his address was superior to his courage, he relied chiefly on intrigue for the success of his schemes. The governors of several towns and fortresses, both in Ponthieu and Guienne, were bribed to violate their oath, and to betray the interest of their lawful sovereign. The citizens of Abbeville opened their gates to the French; those of St. Valori, Rue, and Crotoy, followed their example; the gallant Lord Chandos, constable of Guienne, was slain in a skirmish on the 1st of January, 1370; and the health of the prince of Wales being so much impaired, as to render him unable to sit his horse, or to head his troops, the French pursued their advantage with astonishing rapidity. Among the towns that were taken by treachery, was Limoges, whose inhabitants, instigated by their bishop, had revolted, and granted admission to a French garrison. The prince of Wales, having expended considerable sums in fortifying this city, was greatly enraged at the loss of it; and sent word to the inhabitants, that if they did not return to their duty, and expel the enemy, he would level the place with the ground, and put all the citizens to the sword. But the people of Limoges, relying on his inability to put his threats in execution, sent an answer that was couched in terms of insolence and contempt. The prince collected a body of forces; and placing himself in a litter, being unable to ride, conducted them to Limoges, and laid siege to the city, but, sensible that the place was sufficiently strong to resist any attempts to take it by assault, he began by undermining the walls; and, having by that means effected a practicable breach, he entered it at the head of his troops, and put the whole garrison, together with three thousand of the inhabitants, to the sword. He was prevailed on, however, to spare the life of the bishop, who, having been the primary cause of the revolt, ought certainly to have been the first victim of his own perfidy.

The reduction of Limoges was the last military atchievement of the prince of Wales; who, being weakened by sickness, retired to Bourdeaux; but, being led to expect benefit from his native air, he determined to quit the continent. Accordingly, having exacted a promise from the nobles, that they would pay obedience to his brother John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, he embarked for England, in January, 1371, with his princess, and only surviving son, Richard, and arrived at Southampton.

The king, incensed at the losses in France, threatened to put to death all the French hostages who remained in his hands; but on reflection abstained from that ungenerous revenge. After resuming, by advice of parliament, the vain title of king of France, he endeavoured to send succours into Gascony; but all his attempts both by sea and land proved unsuccessful. The earl of Pembroke was intercepted at sea, and taken prisoner with his whole army near Rochelle, by a fleet which Henry king of Castile had fitted out for that purpose (g). Edward himself embarked for Bourdeaux with another army; but was so long detained by contrary winds, that he was obliged to lay aside the enterprize. Sir Robert Knolles, at the head of thirty thousand men, marched out of Calais, and continued his ravages to the gates of Paris, without being able to provoke the enemy to an engagement: he proceeded in his march to the provinces of Maine and Anjou, which he laid waste; but part of his army being there defeated by the conduct of du Guesclin, who was now created constable of France, and who seems to have been the first consummate general that had yet appeared in Europe, the rest were scattered and dispersed, and the small remains of the English forces, instead of reaching Guienne, took shelter in Bretagne, whose sovereign had embraced the alliance of England. The duke of Lancaster, some time after, made a like attempt with an army of twenty-five thousand men; with which he set out from Calais on the 20th of July, 1373; and marched the whole length of France from Calais to Bourdeaux; but was so much harrassed by the flying parties which attended him, that he brought not the half of his army to the place of their destination. It is remarkable that he besieged not a single town, or fought a single battle. Edward, from the necessity of his affairs, was at last obliged to conclude a truce with the enemy; after almost all his ancient possessions in France had been ravished from him, except Bourdeaux and Bayonne, and all his conquests, except Calais. This truce was signed on the 11th of February, 1374, and was to continue till Easter; but, before its expiration, it was prolonged till the 1st of May, 1375. The duke of Anjou, however, who had before broken his parole with Edward, in violation of the truce, entered the province of Guienne, and reduced the greatest part of it to submission; so that what the king had gained by the valour of his troops, he now lost by the perfidy of his enemies. But this treacherous conduct did not prevent a farther prolongation of the truce till the first of April, 1377; and, as it was generally believed that the war would be then renewed with additional vigour, the king summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster in the month of April, 1376, and obtained a continuation of the extra duty on wool, wool-fells, and leather, for the term of three years; and a promise of farther supplies, should the necessity of his affairs require them.

The decline of the king's life was exposed to many mortifications, and corresponded not to the splendid and noisy scenes which had filled the beginning and the middle of it. Besides seeing the loss of his foreign dominions, and being baffled in every attempt to defend them; he felt the decay of his authority at home, and experienced, from the sharpness of some parliamentary remonstrances, the great inconstancy of the people, and the influence of present fortune over all their judgements. This prince, who, during the vigour of his age, had been chiefly occupied in the pursuits of war and ambition, began, at an unseasonable period, to indulge himself in pleasure; and being now a widower, he attached himself to a lady of sense and spirit, one Alice Pierce, who acquired a great ascendant over him, and by her influence gave such general disgust, that, in order to satisfy the parliament, he was obliged to remove her from court. The indolence also, naturally attending old age and infirmities, had made him, in a great measure, resign the administration into the hands of his son the duke of Lancaster, who, as he was far from being popular, weakened extremely the affection which the English bore to the person and government of the king. Men carried their jealousies very far against the duke; and as they saw, with much regret, the death of the prince of Wales every day approaching, they apprehended, lest the succession of his son Richard, now a minor, should be defeated by the intrigues of Lancaster, and by the weak indulgence of the old king. But Edward, in order to satisfy both the people and the prince on this head, declared in parliament his grandson heir and successor to the crown; and thereby cut off all the hopes of the duke of Lancaster, if he ever had the temerity to entertain any.

(g) Henry king of Castile had warmly espoused the interest of the French king. The English and Spanish fleets met on the morning of the 23rd of June, 1372, when the action immediately commenced, and continued with unremitting ardour till the darkness of night put an end to the combat; which was, however, renewed on the ensuing morning with equal fury. As the contest was maintained with equal skill and valour by the two contending fleets, the victory was at length decided in favour of the Spaniards, who had in this action the advantage of cannon, with which the English fleet was wholly unprovided. Most of the English ships were either taken or sunk.

The prince of Wales, after a lingering illness, died at the palace of Westminster, on the 8th of June, 1376, in the forty-sixth year of his age; and left a character illustrious for every eminent virtue, and from his earliest youth, till the hour he expired, unstained by any blemish. His valour and military talents formed the smallest part of his merit: his generosity, humanity, affability, and moderation, gained him the affections of all men; and he was qualified to throw a lustre, not only on that rude age in which he lived, and which nowise infected him with its vices, but on the most shining period of ancient or modern history (h). The king survived about a year this melancholy incident: England was deprived at once of both these princes, its chief ornament and support: he expired at his palace of Shene in Surrey, on the 21st of June, 1377, in the sixty-fifth year of his age and the fifty-first of his reign; and the people were then sensible, though too late, of the irreparable loss which they had sustained.

The English are apt to consider with peculiar fondness the history of Edward III. and to esteem his reign, as it was one of the longest, the most glorious also, that occurs in the annals of their nation. The ascendant which they then began to acquire over France, their rival and supposed national enemy, makes them cast their eyes on this period with great complacency, and sanctifies every measure which Edward embraced for that end. But the domestic government of this prince is really more admirable than his foreign victories; and England enjoyed, by the prudence and vigour of his administration, a longer interval of domestic peace and tranquillity than she had been blest with in any former period, or than she experienced for many ages after. He gained the affections of the great, yet curbed their licentiousness: he made them feel his power, without their daring, or even being inclined, to murmur at it: his affable and obliging behaviour, his munificence and generosity, made them submit with pleasure to his dominion; his valour and conduct made them successful in most of their enterprizes; and their unquiet spirits, directed against a public enemy, had no leisure to breed those disturbances to which they were naturally so much inclined, and which the frame of the government seemed so much to authorize. This was the chief benefit which resulted from Edward's victories and conquests. His foreign wars were, in other respects, neither founded in justice, nor directed to any salutary purpose. His attempt against the king of Scotland, a minor and a brother-in-law, and the revival of his grandfather's claim of superiority over that kingdom, were both unreasonable and ungenerous; and he allowed himself to be too easily seduced, by the glaring prospect of French conquests, from the acquisition of a point which was practicable, and which, if attained, might really have been of lasting utility to his country and his successors. The success which he met with in France, though chiefly owing to his eminent talents, was unexpected; and yet, from the very nature of things, not from any unforeseen accidents, was found, even during his life-time, to have procured him no solid advantages. But the glory of a conqueror is so dazzling to the vulgar, the animosity of nations is so violent, that the fruitless desolation of so fine a part of Europe as France, is totally disregarded by us, and is never considered as a blemish in the character or conduct of this prince. And indeed, from the unfortunate state of human nature, it will commonly happen, that a sovereign of genius, such as Edward, who usually finds every thing easy in his domestic government, will turn himself towards military enterprizes, where alone he meets with opposition, and where he has full exercise for his industry and capacity (i).

It is remarked by an elegant historian, that conquerors, though usually the bane of human kind, proved often, in those feudal times, the most indulgent of sovereigns. They stood most in need of supplies from their people; and, not being able to compel them by force to submit to the necessary impositions, they were obliged to make them some compensation by equitable laws and popular concessions. This remark is, in some measure, though imperfectly, justified by the conduct of Edward III. He took no steps of moment without consulting his parliament and obtaining their approbation, which he afterwards pleaded as a reason for their supporting his measures (k). The parliament, therefore, rose into greater consideration during his reign, and acquired more regular authority, than in any former time; and even the house of commons, which, during turbulent and factious periods, was naturally depressed by the greater power of the crown and barons, began to appear of some weight in the constitution. In the later years of Edward III. the king's ministers were impeached in parliament, particularly lord Latimer, who fell a sacrifice to the authority of the commons (l); and they even obliged the king to banish his mistress by their remonstrances. Some attention was also paid to the election of their members; and lawyers, in particular, who were at that time men of character somewhat inferior, were totally excluded the house during several parliaments (m).

One of the most popular laws enacted by any prince, was the statute which passed in the twenty-fifth of this reign (n), and which limited the cases of high treason, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads, conspiring the death of the king, levying war against him, and adhering to his enemies; and the judges were prohibited, if any other cases should occur, from inflicting the penalty of treason without an application to parliament. The bounds of treason were indeed so much limited by this statute, which still remains in force without any alteration, that the lawyers were obliged to enlarge them, and to explain a conspiracy for levying war against the king, to be equivalent to a conspiracy against his life; and this interpretation, seemingly forced, has, from the necessity of the case, been tacitly acquiesced in. It was also ordained, that a parliament should be held once a year, or oftener, if need be: a law which, like many others, was never observed, and lost its authority by disuse (o).

Edward granted above twenty parliamentary confirmations of the Great Charter; and these concessions are commonly appealed to as proofs of his great indulgence to the people, and his tender regard for their liberties. But the contrary presumption is more natural. If the maxims of Edward's reign had not been in general somewhat arbitrary, and if the Great Charter had not been frequently violated, the parliament would never have applied for these frequent confirmations, which could add no force to a deed regularly observed, and which could serve to no other purpose than to prevent the contrary precedents from turning into a rule, and acquiring authority. It was indeed the (h) As a proof of the ascendancy which the singular endowments of this prince were calculated to obtain over the minds of those whom he honoured with his friendship, it is said, that the celebrated warrior, John de Greilly, captal de Buche, (who had been taken prisoner in Guienne, and was now in confinement at Paris,) was so extremely affected with the news of his death, that he obstinately refused to take any kind of nourishment, from a fixed determination not to survive a master to whom he was so firmly attached, and from whose interest and service the court of France had in vain tried to seduce him, by the most tempting offers of extraordinary preferment. In consequence of this resolution, he expired a few days after the prince.

(i) Edward had a numerous posterity by his queen Philippa of Hainault. His eldest son was the heroic Edward, usually denominated the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour. This prince was born at Woodstock, the 15th of June, 1330, and espoused his cousin Joan, commonly called the Fair Maid of Kent, daughter and heir of his uncle, the earl of Kent, who was beheaded in the beginning of this reign. She was first married to sir Thomas Holland, by whom she had children. By the prince of Wales she had a son Richard, who alone survived his father, and succeeded his grandfather on the throne.

The second son of king Edward (for we pass over such as died in their childhood) was Lionel duke of Clarence, who was first married to Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter and heir of the earl of Ulster, by whom he left only one daughter, married to Edward Mortimer earl of Marche. Lionel espoused in second marriage Violante, the daughter of the duke of Milan, and died in Italy soon after the consummation of his nuptials, without leaving any posterity by that princess. Of all the family, he resembled most his father and elder brother in his noble qualities.

Edward's third son was John of Gaunt, so called from the place of his birth: he was created duke of Lancaster; and from him sprang that branch which afterwards possessed the crown. The fourth son of this royal family was Edmund, created earl of Cambridge by his father, and duke of York by his nephew. The fifth son was Thomas, who received the title of earl of Buckingham from his father, and that of duke of Gloucester from his nephew. In order to prevent confusion, we shall always distinguish these two princes by the titles of York and Gloucester, even before they were advanced to them.

There were also several princesses born to Edward by Philippa, to wit, Isabella, Joan, Mary, and Margaret, who espoused, in the order of their names, Ingelram de Coucy earl of Bedford, Alphonso king of Castile, John of Montfort duke of Bretagne, and John Hastings earl of Pembroke. The princess Joan died at Bourdeaux before the consummation of her marriage.

effect of the irregular government during those ages, that a statute which had been enacted some years, instead of acquiring, was imagined to lose force by time, and needed to be often renewed by recent statutes of the same sense and tenour. Hence, likewise, that general clause so frequent in old acts of parliament, that the statutes enacted by the king's progenitors should be observed (p); a precaution which, if we do not consider the circumstances of the times, might appear absurd and ridiculous. The frequent confirmations, in general terms, of the privileges of the church, proceeded from the same cause.

It is a clause in one of Edward's statutes, "that no man, of what state or condition soever, shall be put out of land or tenement, nor taken nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought in answer by due process of the law (q)." This privilege was sufficiently secured by a clause of the Great Charter, which had received a general confirmation in the first chapter of the same statute. Why then is the clause so anxiously, and, as we may think, so superfluously repeated? Plainly, because there had been some late infringements of it, which gave umbrage to the commons (r).

But there is no article in which the laws are more frequently repeated during this reign, almost in the same terms, than that of purveyance, which the parliament always calls an outrageous and intolerable grievance, and the source of infinite damage to the people (s). The parliament tried to abolish this prerogative altogether, by prohibiting any one from taking goods without the consent of the owners (t), and by changing the heinous name of purveyors, as they term it, into that of buyers (u): but the arbitrary conduct of Edward still brought back the grievance upon them; though contrary both to the Great Charter and to many statutes. This disorder was in a great measure derived from the state of the public finances and of the kingdom; and could therefore the less admit of remedy. The prince frequently wanted ready money; yet his family must be subsisted: he was therefore obliged to employ force and violence for that purpose, and to give tallies, at what rate he pleased, to the owners of the goods which he laid hold of. The kingdom also abounded so little in commodities, and the interior communication was so imperfect, that, had the owners been strictly protected by law, they could easily have exacted any price from the king; especially in his frequent progresses when he came to distant and poor places, where the court did not usually reside, and where a regular plan for supplying it could not easily be established. Not only the king, but several great lords, insisted upon this right of purveyance (v).

The magnificent castle of Windsor was built by Edward III. and his method of conducting the work may serve as a specimen of the condition of the people in that age. Instead of engaging workmen by contracts and wages, he assessed every county in England to send him a certain number of masons, tilers, and carpenters, as if he had been levying an army (w).

They mistake, indeed, very much the genius of this reign, who imagine that it was not extremely arbitrary. All the high prerogatives of the crown were to the full exerted in it; but what gave some consolation, and promised in time some relief to the people, they were always complained of by the commons: such as the dispensing power (x); the extension of the forests (y); erecting monopolies (z); exacting loans (a); stopping justice by particular warrants (b); the renewal of the commission of trailbaton (c); pressing men and ships into the public service (d); levying arbitrary and exorbitant fines (e); extending the authority of the privy council or star-chamber to the decision of private causes (f); enlarging the power of the mareschal's and other arbitrary courts (g); imprisoning members for freedom of speech in parliament (h); obliging people, without any rule, to send recruits of men at arms, archers, and hoblers, to the army (i).

But there was no act of arbitrary power more frequently repeated in this reign, than that of imposing taxes without consent of parliament. Though that assembly granted the king greater supplies than had ever been obtained by any of his predecessors, his great undertakings, and the necessity of his affairs, obliged him to levy still more; and after his splendid success against France had added weight to his authority, these arbitrary impositions became almost annual and perpetual. Cotton's Abridgement of the Records affords numerous instances of this kind, in the first (k) year of his reign, in the thirteenth year (l), in the fourteenth (m), in the twentieth (n), in the twenty-first (o), in the twenty-second (p), in the twenty-fifth (q), in the thirty-eighth (r), in the fiftieth (s), and in the fifty-first (t).

The king openly avowed and maintained this power of levying taxes at pleasure. At one time he replied to the remonstrance made by the commons against it, that the impositions had been exacted from great necessity, and had been assented to by the prelates, earls, barons, and some of the commons (u); at another, that he would advise with his council (v). When the parliament desired that a law might be enacted for the punishment of such as levied these arbitrary impositions, he refused compliance (w). In the subsequent year they desired that the king might renounce this pretended prerogative; but his answer was, that he would levy no taxes without necessity, for the defence of the realm, and where he reasonably might use that authority (x). This incident passed a few days before his death; and these were, in a manner, his last words to his people. It would seem that the famous charter or statute of Edward I. de tallagio non concedendo, though never repealed, was supposed to have already lost, by age, all its authority.

These facts can only shew the practice of the times: for as to the right, the continual remonstrances of the commons may seem to prove that it rather lay on their side: at least, these remonstrances served to prevent the arbitrary practices of the court from becoming an established part of the constitution. In so much a better condition were the privileges of the people, even during the arbitrary reign of Edward III. than during some subsequent ones, particularly those of the Tudors, where no tyranny or abuse of power ever met with any check or opposition, or so much as a remonstrance, from parliament.

In this reign we find, according to the sentiments of an ingenious and learned author, the first strongly marked, and probably contested, distinction between a proclamation by the king and his privy-council, and a law which had received the assent of the lords and commons (y).

It is easy to imagine that a prince of so much sense and spirit as Edward, would be no slave to the court of Rome. Though the old tribute was paid during some years of his minority (z), he afterwards withheld it; and when the pope, in 1367, threatened to cite him to the court of Rome for default of payment, he laid the matter before his parliament. That assembly unanimously declared, that king John could not, without a national consent, subject his kingdom to a foreign power: and that they were therefore determined to support their sovereign against this unjust pretension (a).

During this reign, the statute of provisors was enacted, rendering it penal to procure any presentations to benefices from the court of Rome, and securing the rights of all patrons and electors, which had been extremely encroached on by the pope (b). By a subsequent statute, every person was outlawed who carried any cause by appeal to the court of Rome (c).

The laity, at this time, seem to have been extremely prejudiced against the papal power, and even somewhat against their own clergy, because of their connexions with the Roman pontiff. The parliament pretended that the usurpations of the pope were the cause of all the plagues, injuries, famine, and poverty of the realm; were more destructive to it than all the wars; and were the reason why it contained not a third of the inhabitants and commodities which it formerly possessed: that the taxes levied by him exceeded five times those which were paid to the king:

that every thing was venal in that sinful city of Rome; and that even the patrons in England had thence learned to practise simony without shame or remorse (d). At another time they petition the king to employ no churchman in any office of state (e); and they even speak in plain terms of expelling by force the papal authority, and thereby providing a remedy against oppressions, which they neither could nor would any longer endure (f). Men who talked in this strain were not far from the reformation: but Edward did not think proper to second all this zeal: though he passed the statute of provisors, he took little care of its execution; and the parliament made frequent complaints of his negligence on this head (g). He was content with having reduced such of the Romish ecclesiastics as possessed revenues in England, to depend entirely upon him by means of this statute.

As to the police of the kingdom during the reign of Edward III. it was certainly better than during times of faction, civil war, and disorder, to which England was so often exposed: yet were there several vices in the constitution, the bad consequences of which, all the power and vigilance of the king could not prevent. The barons, by their confederacies with those of their own order, and by supporting and defending their retainers in every iniquity (h), were the chief abettors of robbers, murderers, and ruffians of all kinds; and no law could be executed against those criminals. The nobility were brought to give their promise in parliament, that they would not avow, retain, or support, any felon or breaker of the law (i); yet this engagement, which we may wonder to see exacted from men of their rank, was never regarded by them. The commons make continual complaints of the multitude of robberies, murders, rapes, and other disorders, which, they say, were become numberless in every part of the kingdom, and which they always ascribe to the protection that the criminals received from the great (k). The king of Cyprus, who paid a visit to England in this reign, was robbed and stripped on the highway, with his whole retinue (l). Edward himself contributed to this dissolution of law, by his facility in granting pardons to felons from the solicitation of the courtiers. Laws were made to retrench this prerogative (m), and remonstrances of the commons were presented against the abuse of it (n): but to no purpose. The gratifying of a powerful nobleman continued still to be of more importance than the protection of the people. The king also granted many franchises, which interrupted the course of justice, and the execution of the laws (o).

Commerce and industry were certainly at a very low ebb during this period. The bad police of the country alone affords a sufficient reason. The only exports were wool, skins, hides, leather, butter, tin, lead, and such unmanufactured goods, of which wool was by far the most considerable. Knyghton has asserted, that one hundred thousand sacks of wool were annually exported, and sold at twenty pounds a sack, money of that age. But he is widely mistaken, both in the quantity exported and in the value. In 1349, the parliament remonstrate that the king, by an illegal imposition of forty shillings on each sack exported, had levied sixty thousand pounds a year (p): which reduces the annual exports to thirty thousand sacks. A sack contained twenty-six stone, and each stone fourteen pounds (q); and at a medium was not valued at above five pounds a sack (r), that is, fourteen or fifteen pounds of our present money. Knyghton's computation raises it to sixty pounds, which is near four times the present price of wool in England. According to this reduced computation, the export of wool brought into the kingdom about four hundred and fifty thousand pounds of our present money, instead of six millions, which is an extravagant sum. Even the former sum is so high as to afford a suspicion of some mistake in the computation of the parliament with regard to the number of sacks exported. Such mistakes were very usual in those ages.

Edward endeavoured to introduce and promote the woollen manufacture, by giving protection and encouragement to foreign weavers (s), and by enacting a law, which prohibited every one from wearing any cloth but of English fabric (t). The parliament prohibited the exportation of woollen goods, which was not so well judged, especially while the exportation of unwrought wool was so much allowed and encouraged. A like injudicious law was made against the exportation of manufactured iron (u).

It appears from a record in the Exchequer, that in 1354 the exports of England amounted to two hundred and ninety-four thousand one hundred and eighty-four pounds seventeen shillings and two-pence: the imports to thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and seventy pounds three shillings and six-pence, money of that time. This is a great balance, considering that it arose wholly from the exportation of raw wool and other rough materials. The import was chiefly linen and fine cloth, and some wine. England seems to have been extremely drained at this time by Edward's foreign expeditions and foreign subsidies, which probably was the reason why the exports so much exceeded the imports.

The first toll we read of in England for mending the highways, was imposed in this reign: it was that for repairing the road between St. Giles's and Temple Bar (v).

In the first of Richard II. the parliament complain extremely of the decay of shipping during the preceding reign, and assert, that one sea-port formerly contained more vessels than were to be found in the whole kingdom. This calamity they ascribe to the arbitrary seizure of ships by Edward for the service of his frequent expeditions (w). The parliament in the fifth of Richard renew the same complaint (x); and we likewise find it made in the forty-sixth of Edward III. So false is the common opinion, that this reign was favourable to commerce.

There is an order of this king directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London, to take up all ships of forty tons and upwards, to be converted into ships of war (y).

The parliament attempted the impracticable scheme of reducing the price of labour after the pestilence, and also that of poultry (z). A reaper, in the first week of August, was not allowed above two-pence a day, or near six-pence of our present money; in the second week a third more. A master carpenter was limited through the whole year to three-pence a day, a common carpenter to two-pence, money of that age (a). It is remarkable, that in the same reign, the pay of a common soldier, an archer, was six-pence a day; which, by the change both in denomination and value, would be equivalent to near five shillings of our present money (b). Soldiers were then enlisted only for a very short time: they lived idle all the rest of the year, and commonly all the rest of their lives: one successful campaign, by pay and plunder, and the ransom of prisoners, was supposed to be a small fortune to a man; which was a great allurement to enter into the service (c).

The staple of wool, wool-fells, leather, and lead, was fixed by act of parliament in particular towns of England (d). Afterwards it was removed by law to Calais: but Edward, who commonly deemed his prerogative above law, paid little regard to these statutes; and when the parliament remonstrated with him on account of those acts of power, he plainly told them, that he would proceed in that matter as he thought proper (e). It is not easy to assign the reason of this great anxiety for fixing a staple; unless perhaps it invited foreigners to a market, when they knew beforehand that they should there meet with great choice of any particular species of commodity. This policy of inviting foreigners to Calais was carried so far, that all English merchants were prohibited by law from exporting any English goods from the staple; which was in a manner the total abandoning of all foreign navigation, except that to Calais (f): a contrivance seemingly extraordinary.

It was not till the middle of this century that the English

We may therefore conclude that the numerous armies, mentioned by historians in those times, consisted chiefly of ragamuffins, who followed the camp, and lived by plunder. Edward's army before Calais consisted of thirty-one thousand and ninety-four men; yet its pay for sixteen months was only one hundred and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and one pounds. Brady, ibid.
(c) Commodities seem to have risen since the Conquest. Instead of being ten times cheaper than at present, they were, in the age of Edward III. only three or four times. This change seems to have taken place in a great measure since Edward I. The allowance granted by Edward III. to the earl of Murray, then a prisoner in Nottingham castle, is one pound a week; whereas the bishop of St. Andrews, the primate of Scotland, had only six-pence a day allowed him by Edward I.

began

began to extend their navigation even to the Baltic (g); nor till the middle of the subsequent, that they sailed to the Mediterranean (h).

Luxury was complained of in that age, as well as in others of more refinement; and attempts were made by parliament to restrain it, particularly on the head of apparel, where surely it is the most obviously innocent and inoffensive. No man under a hundred a year was allowed to wear gold, silver, or silk in his clothes: servants also were prohibited from eating flesh meat or fish above once a day (i). By another law it was ordained, that no one should be allowed either for dinner or supper, above three dishes in each course, and not above two courses: and it is likewise expressly declared, that soused meat is to count as one of these dishes (k). It was easy to foresee that such ridiculous laws must prove ineffectual, and could never be executed.

The use of the French language in pleadings and public deeds was abolished (l). It may appear strange that the nation should so long have worn this badge of conquest: but the king and nobility seem never to have become thoroughly English, or to have forgotten their French extraction, till Edward's wars with France gave them an antipathy to that nation. Yet still it was long before the use of the English tongue came into fashion. The first English paper which we meet with in Rymer is in the year 1386, during the Reign of Richard II (m). There are Spanish papers in that collection of more ancient date (n): and the use of the Latin and French still continued.

We may judge of the ignorance of this age in geography, from a story told by Robert of Avesbury. Pope Clement VI. having, in 1344, created Lewis of Spain prince of the Fortunate Islands, meaning the Canaries, then newly discovered; the English ambassador at Rome, and his retinue, were seized with an alarm that Lewis had been created king of England; and they immediately hurried home, in order to convey this important intelligence. Yet such was the ardour for study at this time, that Speed, in his Chronicle, informs us there were then thirty thousand students in the university of Oxford alone. What was the occupation of all these young men? to learn very bad Latin, and still worse logic.

In 1364 the commons petitioned, that in consideration of the preceding pestilence, such persons as possessed manors holden of the king in chief, and had let different leases without obtaining licences, might continue to exercise the same power, till the country were become more populous (o). The commons were sensible that this security of possession was a good means for rendering the kingdom prosperous and flourishing; yet durst not apply all at once for a greater relaxation of their chains.

There is not a reign among those of the ancient English monarchs which deserves more to be studied than that of Edward III. nor one where the domestic transactions will better discover the true genius of that kind of mixed government which was then established in England. The struggles with regard to the validity and authority of the great charter were now over: the king was acknowledged to lie under some limitations: Edward himself was a prince of great capacity, not governed by favourites, not led astray by any unruly passion, sensible that nothing could be more essential to his interests than to keep on good terms with his people: yet, on the whole, it appears that the government at best was only a barbarous monarchy, not regulated by any fixed maxims, or bounded by any certain undisputed rights, which in practice were regularly observed. The king conducted himself by one set of principles; the barons by another; the commons by a third; the clergy by a fourth. All these systems of government were opposite and incompatible: each of them prevailed in its turn, as incidents were favourable to it: a great prince rendered the monarchial power predominant: the weakness of a king gave reins to the aristocracy: a superstitious age saw the clergy triumphant: the people, for whom chiefly government was instituted, and who chiefly deserve consideration, were the weakest of the whole. But the commons, little obnoxious to any other order, though they sunk under the violence of tempests, silently reared their head in more peaceable times; and while the storm was brewing, were courted by all sides, and thus received still some accession to their privileges, or at worst some confirmation of them.

It has been an established opinion, that gold coin was not struck till this reign: but there has lately been found proof that it is as ancient as Henry III (p).

CHAP. VIII.

RICHARD II.

SHORTLY after the king's accession a parliament was summoned, which was both elected and assembled in tranquillity; and the great change, from a sovereign of consummate wisdom and experience to a boy of eleven years of age, was not immediately felt by the people. The habits of order and obedience which the barons had been taught during the long reign of Edward, still influenced them; and the authority of the king's three uncles, the dukes of Lancaster, York, and Gloucester, sufficed to repress, for a time, the turbulent spirit to which that order, in a weak reign, was so often subject. The dangerous ambition likewise of these princes themselves was checked by the plain and undeniable title of Richard, by the declaration of it made in parliament, and by the affectionate regard which the people bore to the memory of his father, and which was naturally transferred to the young sovereign upon the throne. The different characters also of these three princes rendered them a counterpoise to each other; and it was natural to expect, that any dangerous designs which might be formed by one brother, would meet with opposition from the others. Lancaster, whose age and experience, and authority under the late king, gave him the ascendant among them, though his integrity seemed not proof against great temptations, was neither of an enterprizing spirit, nor of a popular and engaging temper. York was indolent, unactive, and of slender capacity. Gloucester was turbulent, bold, and popular; and being the youngest of the family, was restrained by the power and authority of his elder brothers. There appeared, therefore, no circumstance in the domestic situation of England which might endanger the public peace, or give any immediate apprehensions to the lovers of their country.

On the very day of Edward the Third's death, a solemn deputation from the citizens of London repaired to Kingston upon Thames, where Richard then resided; and with the warmest professions of attachment to his person and interest, pressed him to establish his residence in the metropolis. With this invitation the youthful monarch complied; he went to London on the following day; and on the 16th of July, 1377, was crowned at Westminster, amidst the acclamations of his subjects.

Though Edward had fixed the succession to the crown, he had taken no care to establish a plan of government during the minority of his grandson, it behoved the parliament to supply this defect; and the house of commons distinguished themselves by taking the lead on the occasion. This house, which had been rising to consideration during the whole course of the late reign, naturally received an accession of power during the minority; and as it was now becoming a scene of business, the members chose, for the first time, a speaker, who might preserve order in their debates, and maintain those forms which are requisite in all numerous assemblies. Peter de la More (q) was the person pitched on; the same gentleman that had been imprisoned, and detained in custody by the late king, for his freedom of speech in attacking the mistress and ministers of that prince. But though this election discovered a spirit of liberty in the commons, and was followed by farther attacks both on these ministers and on Alice Pierce, they were still too sensible of their great inferiority, to assume at first any immediate share in the administration of government, or the care of the king's person. They were content to apply by petition to the lords for that purpose, and desire them, both to appoint a council of nine, who might direct the public business, and to chuse men of virtuous life and conversation, who might inspect the conduct and education of the young prince. The lords complied with the first part of this request, and elected the bishops of London, Carlisle, and Salisbury, the earls of Marche and Stafford, sir Richard de Stafford, sir Henry le Scrope, sir John Devereux, and sir Hugh Segrave, to whom they gave authority, for a year, to conduct the ordinary course of business. But as to the regulation of the king's household, they declined interposing in an office which, they said, both was invidious in itself, and might prove disagreeable to his majesty.

The commons, as they acquired more courage, ventured to proceed a step farther in their applications. They presented a petition, in which they prayed the king to check the prevailing custom among the barons, of forming illegal confederacies, and supporting each other, as well as men of inferior rank, in the violations of law and justice. They received from the throne a general and obliging answer to this petition: but another part of their application, that all the great officers should, during the king's minority, be appointed by parliament, which seemed to require the concurrence of the commons, as well as that of the upper house, in the nomination, was not complied with: the lords alone assumed the power of appointing these officers: the commons tacitly acquiesced in the choice; and thought that, for the present, they themselves had proceeded a sufficient length, if they but advanced their pretensions, though rejected, of interposing in these more important matters of state.

On this foot then the government stood. The administration was conducted entirely in the king's name: no regency was expressly appointed: the nine counsellors and the great officers, named by the peers, did their duty, each in his respective department; and the whole system was for some years kept together by the secret authority of the king's uncles, especially of the duke of Lancaster, who was in reality the regent.

The parliament was dissolved, after the commons had represented the necessity of their being re-assembled once every year, as appointed by law; and after having elected two citizens, John Philpot and William Walworth, as their treasurers, to receive and disburse the produce of two fifteenths and tenths, which they voted to the crown. In the other parliaments called during the minority, the commons still discover a strong spirit of freedom, and a sense of their own authority, which, without breeding any disturbance, tended to secure their independence, and that of the people.

Edward had left his grandson involved in many dangerous wars. The pretensions of the duke of Lancaster to the crown of Castile made that kingdom still persevere in hostilities against England. Scotland, whose throne was now filled by Robert Stuart, nephew to David Bruce, and the first prince of that family, maintained such close connections with France, that war with one crown almost inevitably produced hostilities with the other. The French monarch, whose prudent conduct had acquired him the sirname of wise, as he had already baffled all the experience and valour of the two Edwards, was likely to prove a dangerous enemy to a minor king: but his genius, which was not naturally enterprizing, led him not, at present, to give any disturbance to his neighbours; and he laboured, besides, under many difficulties at home, which it was necessary for him to surmount before he could think of making conquests in a foreign country. England was master of Calais, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne; had lately acquired possession of Cherbourg from the cession of the king of Navarre, and of Brest from that of the duke of Bretagne; and having thus an easy entrance into France from every quarter, was able, even in its present situation, to give disturbance to his government. Before Charles could remove the English from these important posts, he died in the flower of his age, on the 16th of September, 1380, and left his kingdom to a minor son, then in the twelfth year of his age, who bore the name of Charles VI.

In the mean time the war with France was carried on in a manner somewhat languid, and produced no enterprize of lustre or renown. Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, making an incursion into Picardy with a detachment of the garrison, set fire to Boulogne. The duke of Lancaster conducted an army into Bretagne, and invested St. Malo; but, on the approach of the constable Du Guesclin, he raised the siege, and returned without being able to perform any thing worthy of record. In a subsequent year, the duke of Gloucester marched out of Calais with a body of two thousand cavalry, and eight thousand infantry; and scrupled not, with his small army, to enter into the heart of France, and to continue his ravages through Picardy, Champagne, the Brie, the Beausse, the Gatinois, the Orleanois, till he reached his allies in the province of Bretagne. Though the duke of Burgundy, at the head of a more considerable army, came within sight of him in his march, the French were so overawed by the former successes of the English, that no superiority of numbers could tempt them to venture a pitched battle with the troops of that nation. As the duke of Bretagne, soon after the arrival of these succours, formed an accommodation with the court of France, this enterprize also proved in the issue unsuccessful, and made no durable impression upon the enemy.

The expences of these military expeditions, and the usual want of œconomy attending a minority, when the private interests of many are to be gratified at the public expence, exhausted the English treasury, and obliged the parliament, besides making some alterations in the council, to impose a new and unusual tax of three groats on every person, male and female, above fifteen years of age; and they ordained that, in levying that tax, the opulent should relieve the poor by an equitable compensation. This salutary regulation, however, from the vague and indefinite terms in which it was expressed, being wholly neglected, and the impost levied with the most cruel rigour by a set of rapacious collectors, to whom the king, from his necessities, had compelled the government to farm it, a violent commotion ensued, which threatened to overturn the constitution of the kingdom.

That numerous class of men, distinguished in the feudal governments by the appellation of villans, had about this period begun to entertain some faint ideas of their own strength and importance. A growing spirit of independence was the natural consequence of those ideas; and that spirit made them spurn the yoke of slavery, which their fathers had borne with the most patient submission. These strong symptoms of increased civilization gave rise to popular insurrections both in France and Flanders; the report of which events being brought to England—where we are told that slavery was carried to a greater extent than in any other country in Europe—prepared the minds of the multitude for any desperate exertion that could effect their emancipation from that state of servitude to which they were reduced. Thus disposed, the smallest grounds for discontent were sufficient to impel them to the most dangerous attempts; and this disposition was greatly increased by the seditious efforts of one John Ball, an itinerant preacher, who had acquired a considerable share of popularity by favouring the ideas of the people, and by inculcating the doctrine of primitive equality, which gave all men an equal right to the enjoyment of civil as well as of natural liberty. He expatiated on the tyranny of artificial distinctions, and the abuses which had arisen from the degradation of the more considerable part of the species, and the aggrandizement of a few insolent rulers. These doctrines, so agreeable to the populace, and so conformable to the ideas of primitive equality which are engraven in the hearts of all men, were greedily received by the multitude; and scattered the sparks of that sedition, which the present tax raised into a conflagration (r).

The insurrection began in Essex; where a report was circulated with industry, that it was the intention of the nobles to put all the peasants and lower class of people to death. The gross improbability of this report did not prevent it from obtaining universal credit; and the populace, alarmed at the dreadful intelligence, assembled in great numbers, armed with such offensive weapons as they could hastily collect. A deputation was immediately sent to the inhabitants of Kent, to urge them to join in support of the common cause, and an incident, which had just occurred at Deptford, induced them to obey the summons with alacrity. The poll-tax gatherers went to the shop of a plebeian named Walter, a tyler by trade, and demanded payment for his daughter; which was refused, on the ground that she had not attained the age assigned by the statute. One of the ruffians, however, maintained the contrary, and, in order to prove his assertion, proceeded to acts of the most gross indecency, which the father immediately resented, by knocking out his brains with a hammer. The by-standers applauded the action, and exclaimed, that it was full time for the people to take vengeance on their tyrants, and to vindicate their native liberty. They immediately flew to arms: the whole neighbourhood joined in the sedition: the flame spread in an instant over the county: it soon propagated itself into that of Kent, of Hertford, Surrey, Sussex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln. Before the government had the least warning of the danger, the disorder had grown beyond control or opposition: the populace had shaken off all regard to their former masters; and being headed by the most audacious of their associates, who assumed the feigned names of Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, Hob Carter, and Tom Miller, by which they were fond of denoting their mean origin, they committed every where the most outrageous violence on such of the gentry or nobility as had the misfortune to fall into their hands (s).

(r) There were two verses at that time in the mouths of all the common people, which, in spite of prejudice, one cannot but regard with some degree of approbation:

Where was then the gentleman?"

The mutinous populace, amounting to a hundred thousand men, assembled on Blackheath under their leaders Tyler and Straw, on the 12th of June, 1381; and as the princess of Wales, the king's mother, returning from a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, passed through the midst of them, they insulted her attendants; and some of the most insolent among them, to shew their purpose of levelling all mankind, forced kisses from her; but they allowed her to continue her journey, without attempting any farther injury. They sent a message to the king, who had taken shelter in the Tower; and they desired a conference with him. Richard sailed down the river in a barge for that purpose; but on his approaching the shore, he saw such symptoms of tumult and insolence, that he put back and returned to that fortress. The seditious peasants, meanwhile, favoured by the populace of London, had broken into the city; had burned the duke of Lancaster's palace of the Savoy; cut off the heads of all the gentlemen whom they laid hold off; expressed a particular animosity against the lawyers and attornies; and pillaged the warehouses of the rich merchants. A great body of them quartered themselves at Mile-end; and the king, finding no defence in the Tower, which was weakly garrisoned, and ill supplied with provisions, was obliged to go out to meet them, and ask their demands. They required a general pardon, the abolition of slavery, freedom of commerce in market towns without toll or impost, and a fixed rent on lands, instead of the services due by villenage. These requests, which, though extremely reasonable in themselves, the nation was not sufficiently prepared to receive, and which it was dangerous to have extorted by violence, were, however, complied with; charters to that purpose were granted them; and this body immediately dispersed, and returned to their several homes.

During this transaction, another body of the rebels had broken into the Tower; had murdered Simon Sudbury, the primate and chancellor, with sir Robert Hales, the treasurer, and some other persons of distinction; and continued their ravages in the city. The king, passing along Smithfield, on the 15th of June, very slenderly guarded, met with Wat Tyler, at the head of these rioters, and entered into a conference with him. Tyler having ordered his companions to retire till he should give them a signal, after which they were to murder all the company except the king himself, whom they were to detain prisoner, feared not to come into the midst of the royal retinue. He there behaved himself in such a manner, that Walworth, the mayor of London, was not able to bear his insolence, struck him so violent a blow with his mace as brought him to the ground, where he was instantly dispatched by others of the king's attendants. The mutineers, seeing their leader fall, prepared themselves for revenge; and this whole company, with the king himself, had undoubtedly perished on the spot, had it not been for an extraordinary presence of mind which Richard discovered on the occasion. He ordered his company to stop; he advanced alone towards the enraged multitude; and accosting them with an affable and intrepid countenance, he asked them, "What is the meaning of this disorder, my good people? are ye angry that ye have lost your leader? I am your king: I will be your leader myself; follow me to the fields, and whatever you desire, I will grant." The populace, overawed by his presence, implicitly followed him: he led them into the fields, to prevent any disorder which might have arisen by their continuing in the city: being there joined by sir Robert Knolles, and a body of well-armed veteran soldiers, who had been secretly drawn together, he strictly prohibited that officer from falling on the rioters, and committing an undistinguished slaughter upon them; and he peaceably dismissed them with the same charters which had been granted to their fellows.

While the king was employed in suppressing the insurgents of London, the most violent commotions were raging in other parts of the kingdom. At St. Alban's, an immense mob, conducted by William Gryndicobbe, and William Cadyndon, a chandler, put several gentlemen to death; and, by threatening to murder the abbot and all his monks, extorted from them charters of freedom and manumission. At St. Edmundsbury, another mob, under the command of one Robert Westbroom, committed the most dreadful depredations; and beheaded sir John Cavendish, chief justice of England, with many others of inferior note. At the same time a great number of rustics had assembled in Norfolk, and chose for their leader John Littister, a dyer of Norwich; who, assuming the title of "King of the Commons," proceeded to emulate the violence of the other insurgents. But the duration of these popular tumults was fortunately short; for the nobility and gentry hearing of the king's danger, in which they were all involved, flocked to London with their adherents and retainers, and by that means enabled Richard to take the field with an army of forty thousand men. The rebels therefore were compelled to submit; the charters which had been granted by the king to them were formerly revoked by the parliament; the lower class of people were reduced to the same state of slavery as before; commissioners were appointed to try the insurgents in the different counties; and these executed their trusts with such severity, that fifteen hundred of the rioters were condemned and executed. Some were even executed without process or form of law (t). It was pretended, that the intentions of the mutineers had been to seize the king's person, to carry him through England at their head, to murder all the nobility, gentry, and lawyers, and even all the bishops and priests, except the mendicant friars; to dispatch afterwards the king himself, and having thus reduced all to a level, to order the kingdom at their pleasure. It is not impossible, but many of them, in the delirium of their first success, might have formed such projects; but of all the evils incident to human society, the insurrections of the populace, when not raised and supported by persons of higher quality, are the least to be dreaded: the mischiefs consequent to an abolition of all rank and distinction, become so great, that they are immediately felt, and soon bring affairs back to their former order and arrangement.

The king having now attained his sixteenth year, concluded a treaty of marriage with the princess Anne, daughter of the emperor Charles the Fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia; and that princess arriving in England at the commencement of the year 1382, the nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. Richard had discovered so much courage, presence of mind, and address, and had so dextrously eluded the violence of the late tumult, raised great expectations in the nation; and it was natural to hope, that he would, in the course of his life, equal the glories which had so uniformly attended his father and his grandfather in all their undertakings. But the expectations of the people soon proved fallacious; the glorious road to honour which the king had hitherto pursued, in imitation of his illustrious father, was now forsaken for the more alluring paths of voluptuousness. His uncles, who had the chief superintendence of his education, were too busy in accomplishing the projects of their own ambition, to pay the requisite attention to the mind and morals of their royal pupil. That important task, on which the glory of their sovereign and the welfare of the people so greatly depended, was resigned to a train of youthful sycophants, more studious to please than to instruct: struct; men of specious talents, but of dissolute manners, who corrupted with adulation the mind they should have strengthened with advice. Thus tutored, a love of ostentation and pleasure superseded every nobler impulse, and the prince was sunk in the sensualist. The first effect of this pernicious neglect which rendered him justly unpopular, was the removal of the seals from the hands of Henry le Scroop, to whom the parliament had entrusted them, because that nobleman, with a degree of firmness that reflects the utmost honour on his character, had refused to affix them to certain extravagant grants of land, which Richard had been persuaded to make to some of his profligate and interested retainers. The king incensed at this virtuous opposition to his will, put the seals to the different grants with his own hand, and then delivered them to the care of Robert Braybroke, bishop of London.

(s) They demolished the houses of the nobility, put all the lawyers they met with to instant death, burnt all the court-rolls and records, and compelled every man to swear that he would support them in opposing the collection of imposts.

The war with France still continued; and the French threatening to invest Calais, a parliament assembled in February, 1383, to adopt such resolutions as should appear necessary for the defence of the English possessions. They determined to send over a body of troops under the command of the bishop of Norwich, a martial prelate who had signalized himself during the late commotions. The bishop accordingly sailed for Calais with his army, in May; and, after refreshing his troops, marched to attack Gravelines, which he took by assault. He next engaged and defeated an army of thirty thousand French near Dunkirk, and made himself master of that place; after which he continued his successful progress, with wonderful rapidity, through great part of Flanders; taking the towns of Burburgh, Cassel, Dixmude, Furnes, Nieuport, and Poperiny. But these conquests were attended with more glory than advantage; for, having invested Ypres, the garrison made so resolute a defence, that the bishop was under the necessity of raising the siege; while his army, being apprized of the approach of the enemy, separated; a part of them retiring to Burburgh, (which place they were soon after obliged to surrender to the French,) and the remainder to Gravelines. The French army immediately laid siege to that town; and the bishop, having no prospect of relief from England, agreed to the proposals of the French commander, who offered to pay him fifteen thousand marks, and give him the liberty of demolishing the town, and retiring with his army whither he should please. Although this martial prelate had certainly evinced both skill and courage in this expedition, on his return to England he was arraigned by the parliament for its failure; and, finding his enemies too potent to be openly resisted, he was compelled to submit to the mercy of the king, who for some time deprived him of his temporalities.

The truce with the Scots being now expired, Richard, who had obtained the necessary supplies from the parliament, resolved to conduct an army into the north, and sixty thousand men were raised for that purpose. The Scots, sensible of their own deficiency in cavalry, had applied to the regency of Charles VI.; and John de Vienne, admiral of France, had been sent over with a body of one thousand five hundred men at arms, to support them in their incursions against the English. When Richard approached with his army, the Scots did not pretend to make resistance against so great a force: they abandoned without scruple their country to be pillaged and destroyed by the enemy; and when de Vienne expressed his surprize at this plan of operations, they told him, that all their cattle was driven into the forests and fastnesses; that their houses and other goods were of small value; and that they well knew how to compensate any losses which they might sustain in that respect, by making an incursion into England. Accordingly, when Richard entered Scotland by Berwick and the east coast, the Scots, to the number of thirty thousand men, attended by the French, entered the borders of England by the west, and carrying their ravages through Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire, collected a rich booty, and then returned in tranquillity to their own country. Richard in the mean time advanced towards Edinburgh, and destroyed in his way all the towns and villages on each side of him: he reduced that city to ashes: he treated in the same manner, Perth, Dundee, and other places in the low countries; but when he was advised to march towards the west coast, to await there the return of the enemy, and to take revenge on them for their devastations, his impatience to return to England, and enjoy his usual pleasures and amusements, outweighed every consideration; and he led back his army without effecting any thing by all these mighty preparations. The Scots, soon after, finding the heavy bodies of French cavalry very useless in that desultory kind of war to which they confined themselves, treated their allies so ill, that the French returned home, much disgusted with the country, and with the manners of its inhabitants. And the English, though they regretted the indolence and levity of their king, saw themselves for the future secured against any dangerous invasion from that quarter.

But it was so material an interest of the French court to wrest the sea-port towns from the hands of their enemy, that they resolved to attempt it by some other expedient, and found no means so likely as an invasion of England itself. They collected a great fleet and army at Sluys; for the Flemings were now in alliance with them: all the nobility of France were engaged in this enterprize: the English were kept in alarm: great preparations were made for the reception of the invaders: and though the dispersion of the French ships by a storm, and the taking of many of them by the English, before the embarkation of the troops, freed the kingdom from the present danger, the king and council were fully sensible that this perilous situation might every moment return upon them.

There were two circumstances, chiefly, which engaged the French at this time to think of such attempts. The one was the absence of the duke of Lancaster, who had sailed for Spain in August, 1386, and carried with him the flower of the English military force, to the amount of twenty thousand men, in prosecution of his vain claim to the crown of Castile; an enterprize in which, after some promising success, he was finally disappointed: the other was, the violent dissensions and disorders which had taken place in the English government.

A parliament having been summoned to meet on the first of October, 1386, to provide for the support of a considerable body of forces that were posted along the sea coast; the commons, instead of granting the supplies with that alacrity which the pressure of the occasion seemed to require, made vehement complaints against Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, the chancellor; and insisted on his immediate removal from the high office he enjoyed, as well as from the king's council. The king, averse to comply with their request, made no answer, and retired with his whole court to Eltham; whither the parliament sent the duke of Gloucester, with James Arundel, bishop of Ely, to desire he would return; and to assure him, that if he did not comply, they would immediately dissolve, and leave the kingdom in its present distracted state. Richard, still refusing to accede to their terms, they threatened him with a similar treatment to that which was experienced by Edward the Second, if he persisted in absenting himself from parliament. The king, at length, intimidated by their threats, gave up his opposition, and returned to parliament; when the bishop of Ely was appointed to the dignity of chancellor, which the earl of Suffolk had resigned. The bishop of Hereford was made treasurer in the place of the bishop of Durham; and John de Waltham was the keeper of the privy seal.

The parliament, having shewn their power, did not think proper at that time to exercise it against any of the other ministers; but they made an attack on the royal prerogative, more dangerous in its nature, and more fatal to the welfare of the constitution. They compelled the king to sign a commission, by which he delegated the regal authority for one year to fourteen commissioners, consisting of the newly appointed chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of the privy seal, with eleven of the principal barons. By this means the government was suddenly converted to an aristocracy; which, though nominally limited in its duration, was evidently designed to be rendered perpetual. Richard now found himself wholly divested of power, and enjoying the title of king without any one attribute of royalty. His person was treated with neglect; his court forsaken; and every application was made either to the duke of Gloucester, or to some of the other commissioners, who were all, except Nevil, archbishop of York, mere creatures of the duke. Thus reduced to a state of insignificancy, he could not fail to experience the most lively resentment against the authors of his disgrace; and these sentiments were encouraged by the few followers who still adhered to him, and he attempted to shake off the yoke his enemies had imposed upon him. Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young man of a noble family, of an agreeable figure, but of dissolute manners, had acquired an ascendant over him, and governed him with an absolute absolute authority. The king set so little bounds to his affection, that he first created his favourite marquis of Dublin, a title before unknown in England, then duke of Ireland; and transferred to him by patent, which was confirmed in parliament, the entire sovereignty for life of that island. He gave him in marriage his cousin-german, the daughter of Ingelram de Couci, earl of Bedford; but soon after he permitted him to repudiate that lady, though of an unexceptionable character, and to marry a foreigner, a Bohemian, with whom he had become enamoured. These public declarations of attachment turned the attention of the whole court towards the minion: all favours passed through his hands; access to the king could only be obtained by his mediation; and Richard seemed to take no pleasure in royal authority, but so far as it enabled him to load with favours and titles and dignities this object of his affections.

The jealousy of power immediately produced an animosity between the minion and his creatures on the one hand, and the princes of the blood and chief nobility on the other; and the usual complaints against the insolence of favourites were loudly echoed, and greedily received, in every part of the kingdom. Moubray earl of Nottingham, the mareschal, Fitz-Alan earl of Arundel, Percy earl of Northumberland, Montacute earl of Salisbury, Beauchamp earl of Warwick, were all connected with each other, and with the princes, by friendship or alliance, and still more by their common antipathy to those who had eclipsed them in the king's favour and confidence. No longer kept in awe by the personal character of the prince, they scorned to submit to his ministers; and the method which they took to redress the grievance complained of, well suited the violence of the age, and proves the desperate extremities to which every opposition was sure to be instantly carried.

Michael de la Pole, lately created earl of Suffolk, was the son of an eminent merchant; but had risen by his abilities and valour during the wars of Edward III., had acquired the friendship of that monarch, and was esteemed the person of greatest experience and capacity among those who were attached to the duke of Ireland and the king's secret council. The duke of Gloucester, who had the house of commons at his devotion, impelled them to exercise that power, which they seem first to have assumed against lord Latimer during the declining years of the late king; and an impeachment against the chancellor was carried up by them to the house of peers, which was no less at his devotion. The king foresaw the tempest preparing against him and his ministers. At the same time a member was encouraged to call for the record containing a parliamentary deposition of Edward II.; a plain intimation of the fate which Richard, if he continued refractory, had reason to expect from them. The king, finding himself unable to resist, was content to stipulate, that, except finishing the present impeachment against Suffolk, no attack should be made upon any other of his ministers.

Nothing can prove more fully the innocence of Suffolk, than the frivolousness of the crimes which his enemies, in the present plenitude of their power, thought proper to object against him. It was alledged, that being chancellor, and obliged by his oath to consult the king's profit, he had purchased lands of the crown below their true value: that he had exchanged with the king a perpetual annuity of four hundred marks a year, which he inherited from his father, and which was assigned upon the customs of the port of Hull for lands of an equal income; that having obtained for his son the priory of St. Anthony, which was formerly possessed by a Frenchman, an enemy, and a schismatic, and a new prior being at the same time named by the pope, he had refused to admit this person, whose title was not legal, till he made a composition with his son, and agreed to pay him a hundred pounds a year from the income of the benefice; that he had purchased, from one Tydeman of Limborch, an old and forfeited annuity of fifty pounds a-year upon the crown, and had engaged the king to admit that bad debt; and that, when created earl of Suffolk, he had obtained a grant of five hundred pounds a year, to support the dignity of that title (u). Even the proof of these articles, frivolous as they are, was found very deficient upon the trial: it appeared that Suffolk had made no purchase from the crown while he was chancellor, and that all his bargains of that kind were made before he was advanced to that dignity. It is almost needless to add, that he was condemned notwithstanding his defence; and that he was deprived of his office.

The duke of Gloucester and his assosiates observed their stipulation with the king, and attacked no more of his ministers; but, as we have mentioned above, they immediately attacked himself and his royal dignity, and framed a commission after the model of those which had been attempted almost in every reign since that of Richard I. and which had always been attended with extreme confusion (v). By this commission, which was ratified by parliament, a council was appointed, all of Gloucester's faction, except Nevil archbishop of York. The sovereign power was transferred to these men. The king, who had now reached the twenty-first year of his age, was in reality dethroned: the aristocracy was rendered supreme; and though the term of the commission was limited, it was easy to foresee that the intentions of the party were to render it perpetual, and that power would with great difficulty be wrested from those grasping hands to which it was once committed. Richard, however, was obliged to submit: he signed the commission; he took an oath never to infringe it; and though at the end of the session he publicly entered a protest, that the prerogatives of the crown, notwithstanding his late concession, should still be deemed entire and unimpaired, the new commissioners, without regarding this declaration, proceeded to the exercise of their authority.

The king, thus dispossessed of royal power, was soon sensible of the contempt into which he was fallen. His favourites and ministers, who were as yet allowed to remain about his person, failed not to aggravate the injury, which, without any demerit on his part, had been offered to him. And his eager temper was of itself sufficiently inclined to seek the means, both of recovering his authority, and of revenging himself on those who had invaded it. As the house of commons appeared now of weight in the constitution, he secretly tried some expedients for procuring a favourable election: he sounded some of the sheriffs, who being at that time both the returning officers and magistrates of great power in the counties, had naturally considerable influence in elections (w); but, as most of them had been appointed by his uncles, either during his minority, or during the course of the present commission, he found them, in general, averse to his enterprize. The sentiments and inclinations of the judges, to whom he applied, were more favourable to him. He met, at Nottingham, sir Robert Tresilian, chief justice of the King's Bench, sir Robert Belknappe, chief justice of the Common Pleas, sir John Cary, chief baron of the Exchequer, Holt, Fulthorpe, and Bourg, inferior justices, and Lockton, serjeant at law; and he proposed to them some queries; which these lawyers, either from the influence of his authority, or of reason, made no scruple of answering in the way he desired. They declared that the late commission was derogatory to the royalty and prerogative of the king; that those who procured it, or advised the king to consent to it, were punishable with death; that those who necessitated and compelled him were guilty of treason; that those were equally criminal who should persevere in maintaining it; that the king has the right of dissolving parliaments at pleasure; that the parliament, while it sits, must first proceed upon the king's business; and that this assembly cannot, without his consent, impeach any of his ministers and judges. Even according to our present strict maxims with regard to law and royal prerogative, all these determinations, except the two last, appear justifiable; and as the great privileges of the commons, particularly that of impeachment, were hitherto new, and supported by few precedents, there want not plausible reasons to justify these opinions of the judges (x). They signed therefore their answer to the king's queries in (u) It is probable that the earl of Suffolk was not rich, nor able to support the dignity without the bounty of the crown: for his father, Michael de la Pole, though a great merchant, had been ruined by lending money to the late king. See Cotton, p. 194. We may remark that the dukes of Gloucester and York, though vastly rich, received at the same time each of them a thousand pounds a year, to support their dignity. Rymer, vol. vii. p. 481. Cotton, p. 310.

(v) Knyghton, p. 2680. Statutes at Large, 10 Rich. II. cap. i.

(w) In the preamble to 5 Henry IV. cap. vii. it is implied, that the sheriffs in a manner appointed the members of the house of commons, not only in this parliament but in many others.

(x) The parliament, in 1341, exacted of Edward III. that, on the third day of every session, the king should resume all the great offices; and that the ministers should then answer to any accusation that should be brought against them: which plainly implies that, while ministers, they could not be accused or impeached in parliament. Henry IV. told the in the presence of the archbishops of York and Dublin, the bishops of Durham, Chichester, and Bangor, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, and two other counsellors of inferior quality.

The duke of Gloucester and his adherents soon got intelligence of this secret consultation, and were naturally very much alarmed at it (y). They saw the king's intentions; and determined to prevent the execution of them. With this view, they sent private orders to all their friends and followers to hold themselves in readiness to take arms at a moment's warning; and then dispatched the archbishop of Canterbury to the king, to persuade him to come to London; which he did on the 10th of November, 1387, and was received by the mayor and a great concourse of citizens, who conducted him to the palace. As soon as he came to London, which they knew was well disposed to their party, they secretly assembled their forces, and appeared in arms on the 13th, at Haringay park, near Highgate, with forty-thousand men, a power which Richard and his ministers were not able to resist. They sent him a message by the archbishop of Canterbury, and the lords Lovel, Cobham, and Devereux, and demanded that the persons who had seduced him by their pernicious counsel, and were traitors both to him and to the kingdom, should be delivered up to them. A few days after they appeared in his presence, armed and attended with armed followers; and they accused, by name, the archbishop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, sir Robert Tresilian, and sir Nicholas Brembre, as public and dangerous enemies to the state. They threw down their gauntlets before the king, and fiercely offered to maintain the truth of their charge by duel. The persons accused, and all the other noxious ministers, had withdrawn or had concealed themselves.

The duke of Ireland fled to Cheshire, and levied some forces, with which he advanced to relieve the king from the violence of the nobles. Gloucester encountered him on the 20th of December, at Radcot Bridge, in Oxfordshire, with much superior forces; routed him (z), dispersed his followers, and obliged him to fly into the Low-Countries, where he died in exile a few years after. The duke of Gloucester returned with his victorious army to London; and, arriving at Clerkenwell, on the 26th of December, was met by the lord mayor, who delivered him the keys of the city. The same day he had a conference with the king, in the Tower; and Richard being entirely at the mercy of the rebels, was compelled to submit to whatever terms they pleased to require of him. Every person they chose to accuse, was therefore committed by the king's orders; about fourteen peers, knights, and gentlemen, were put to different prisons, in order to take their trials at the approaching parliament. Two prelates, three peers, and as many peeresses, were arbitrarily banished the court; from whence every one was driven who had the misfortune to be distinguished by the partiality of his sovereign. The lords then appeared at London, with an army of forty thousand men; and having obliged the king to summon a parliament, on the 3rd of February, 1388, which was entirely at their devotion, they had full power, by observing a few legal forms, to take vengeance on all their enemies. Five great peers, men whose combined power was able at any time to shake the throne, the duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle; the earl of Derby, son of the duke of Lancaster; the earl of Arundel; the earl of Warwick, and the earl of Nottingham, mareschal of England, entered before the parliament an accusation or appeal, as it was called, against the five counsellors whom they had already accused before the king. The parliament, who ought to have been judges, were not ashamed to impose an oath on all their members, by which they bound themselves to live and die with the lords appellants, and to defend them against all opposition with their lives and fortunes.

The other proceedings were well suited to the violence and iniquity of the times. A charge, consisting of thirty-nine articles, was delivered in by the appellants; and, as none of the accused counsellors except sir Nicholas Brembre was in custody, the rest were cited to appear; and, upon their neglect to obey the citation, the house of peers, after a very short interval, without hearing a single witness, without examining a single fact, or deliberating on any one point of law, declared them guilty of high treason. The earl of Suffolk made his escape to Paris, where he died in a few months; the archbishop of York was taken at Shields, but the sacredness of his character saved him from an ignominious death; he was suffered to escape from confinement, and, retiring to Flanders, there passed the remainder of his days in the capacity of a country curate. Sir Nicholas Brembre, who was produced in court, had the appearance, and but the appearance, of a trial: the peers, though they were not by law his proper judges, pronounced, in a very summary manner, sentence of death upon him; and he was executed, together with sir Robert Tresilian, who had been discovered and taken in the interval; the latter on the 19th, the former on the 20th of February.

It would be tedious to recite the whole charge delivered in against the five counsellors; which is to be met with in several collections (a). It is sufficient to observe, in general, that if we reason upon the supposition, which is the true one, that the royal prerogative was invaded by the commission extorted by the duke of Gloucester and his associates, and that the king's person was afterwards detained in custody by rebels, many of the articles will appear, not only to imply no crime in the duke of Ireland and the ministers, but to ascribe to them actions which were laudable, and which they were bound by their allegiance to perform. The few articles impeaching the conduct of these ministers before that commission, which subverted the constitution, and annihilated all justice and legal authority, are vague and general; such as their engrossing the king's favour, keeping his barons at a distance from him, obtaining unreasonable grants for themselves or their creatures, and dissipating the public treasure by useless expences. No violence is objected to them; no particular illegal act (b); no breach of any statute; and their administration may therefore be concluded to have been so far innocent and inoffensive. All the disorders indeed seem to have proceeded, not from any violation of the laws, or any ministerial tyranny, but merely from a rivalship of power, which the duke of Gloucester and the great nobility, agreeably to the genius of the times, carried to the utmost extremity against their opponents, without any regard to reason, justice, or humanity.

These were not the only deeds of violence committed during the triumph of this inveterate party. All the other judges, who had signed the extra-judicial opinions at Nottingham, were condemned to death, and were, as a grace or favour, banished to Ireland; though they pleaded the fear of their lives, and the menaces of the king's ministers as their excuse. Lord Beauchamp of Holt, sir James Berners, and John Salisbury, were also tried and condemned for high treason; merely because they had attempted to defeat the late commission: but the life of the latter was spared. The fate of sir Simon Burley was more severe: this gentleman was much beloved for his personal merit, had distinguished himself by many honourable actions (c), was created knight of the garter, and had the commons, that the usage of parliament required them first to go through the king's business in granting supplies; which order the king intended not to alter. Parl. Hist. vol. ii. p. 65. Upon the whole, it must be allowed, that, according to ancient practice and principles, there are, at least, plausible grounds for all these opinions of the judges. It must be remarked, that this affirmation of Henry IV. was given deliberately, after consulting the house of peers, who were much better acquainted with the usage of parliament than the ignorant commons. And it has the greater authority, because Henry IV. had made this very principle a considerable article of charge against his predecessor; and that a very few years before. So ill grounded were most of the imputations thrown on the unhappy Richard!

(y) The day after this consultation it was imparted by Althorpe to the earl of Kent, who made the duke of Gloucester and his adherents acquainted with it.

(z) The duke of Ireland escaped with great difficulty, by passing the sis on horseback, at the hazard of his life.

(b) We must except the twelfth article, which accuses Brembre of having cut off the heads of twenty-two prisoners, confined for felony or debt, without warrant or process of law. But, as it is not conceivable what interest Brembre could have to treat these felons and debtors in such a manner, we may presume that the fact is either false, or misrepresented. It was in these men's power to say any thing against the persons accused: no defence or apology was admitted: all was lawless will and pleasure. They are also accused of designs to murder the lords: but these accusations either are general, or destroy one another. Sometimes, as in article fifteenth, they intend to murder them by means of the mayor and city of London: sometimes, as in article twenty-eighth, by trial and false inquests: sometimes, as in article twenty-eighth, by means of the king of France, who was to receive Calais for his pains.

(c) At least this is the character given of him by Froissard, lib. ii. who knew him personally: Walsingham, p. 334, gives a very different character had been appointed governor to Richard, by the choice of the late king and of the Black Prince: he had attended his master from the earliest infancy of that prince, and had ever remained extremely attached to him: yet all these considerations could not save him from falling a victim to Gloucester's vengeance. This execution, more than all the others, made a deep impression on the mind of Richard: his queen too (for he was already married to the sister of the emperor Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia) interested herself in behalf of Burley: she remained three hours on her knees before the duke of Gloucester, pleading for that gentleman's life; but though she was become extremely popular by her amiable qualities, which had acquired her the appellation of the good queen Anne, her petition was sternly rejected by the inexorable tyrant, and the worthy Burley underwent the sentence imposed on him by a venal and prostituted parliament.

The parliament concluded this violent scene, by a declaration that none of the articles, decided on these trials to be treason, should ever afterwards be drawn into precedent by the judges, who were still to consider the statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward, as the rule of their decisions. The house of lords seem not, at that time, to have known or acknowledged the principle, that they themselves were bound, in their judicial capacity, to follow the rules which they, in conjunction with the king and commons, had established in their legislative capacity (d). It was also enacted, that every one should swear to the perpetual maintenance and support of the forfeitures and attainders, and of all the other acts passed during this parliament. The archbishop of Canterbury added the penalty of excommunication, as a farther security to these violent transactions.

In the intervals of these trials, the parliament had found leisure to impose more taxes on the people, by granting the king three shillings on every ton of wine imported, and a shilling in the pound on all merchandize except wool; the highest duties on which, as well as wool fells and leather, were continued. The duke of Gloucester having gratified his revenge, now took care to do the same by his avarice, by obtaining a vote of twenty thousand pounds to himself and his associates; after which the parliament was dissolved on the 4th of June, the session having lasted four months, which was the longest that had ever been yet known in England.

A spirit of opposition, even at this period, betrayed itself among the people, who were divided into parties; and, though slaves themselves, maintained their political opinions with as much energy and virulence as is displayed on similar occasions in the present æra. The Gloucestrian party—which, as foes to government, was consequently most vociferous, and, what was of greater consequence, most powerful—called the late factious assembly, "The Parliament that wrought wonders;" while the loyalists termed it, with a much greater degree of justice, "The merciless Parliament."

It might naturally be expected, that the king, being reduced to such slavery by the combination of the princes and chief nobility, and having appeared so unable to defend his servants from the cruel effects of their resentment, would long remain in subjection to them; and never would recover the royal power, without the most violent struggles and convulsions: but the event proved contrary. In less than a twelvemonth, Richard, who was in his twenty-third year, declared in council, on the 23rd of May, 1389, that, as he had now attained the full age which entitled him to govern by his own authority his kingdom and household, he resolved to exercise his right of sovereignty; and when no one ventured to contradict so reasonable an intention, he deprived Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, of the dignity of chancellor, and bestowed that high office on William Wickham, bishop of Winchester; the bishop of Hereford was displaced from the office of treasurer, the earl of Arundel from that of admiral; even the duke of Gloucester and the earl of Warwick were removed for a time from the council: and no opposition was made to these great changes. The history of this reign is imperfect, and little to be depended on; except where it is supported by public records; and it is not easy for us to assign the reason of this unexpected event. Perhaps some secret animosities, naturally to be expected in that situation, had crept in among the great men, and had enabled the king to recover his authority. Perhaps the violence of their former proceedings had lost them the affections of the people, who soon repent of any cruel extremities to which they are carried by their leaders. However this may be, Richard exercised with moderation the authority which he had resumed. He never attempted to recal from banishment the duke of Ireland, whom he found so noxious to them: he confirmed, by proclamation, the general pardon which the parliament had passed for all offences; and he courted the affections of the people, by voluntarily remitting some subsidies which had been granted him; a remarkable and almost singular instance of such generosity.

At this juncture, the duke of Lancaster returned to England from Spain, having resigned to his rival all pretensions to the crown of Castile, upon payment of a large sum of money, and having married his daughter Philippa to the king of Portugal. The duke of Lancaster, the king's eldest uncle, who had never offended him, and who appeared to be more moderate in his views than the king's other uncles, effected an apparent reconciliation between the king and the duke of Gloucester: as a recompence for which service he was created duke of Aquitaine, by the parliament which met at Westminster in the month of January, 1390, and invested with the ensigns of honour appertaining to that dignity. Edward Plantagenet, eldest son of the duke of York, was gratified with the earldom of Rutland, and a pension of eight hundred marks a year. On the fourth day of the session, the bishop of Winchester resigned the great seal to the king; the bishop of St. David's delivered up the keys of the exchequer, which had been given into his custody as treasurer; and all the lords of the council were discharged at their own desire. They then asked, in open parliament, if any person had any thing to advance against their conduct; it was answered, both by the lords and commons, "That they had nothing to alledge against them, and that they had all conducted themselves with rectitude and propriety in their respective offices." The king immediately after this declaration, restored them to their places, and added the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester to the list of his counsellors; though he thought it necessary at the same time to declare, that nothing then done should be construed as a resignation of his right to remove, at his pleasure, any member of his council. There happened an incident, which produced a dissension between Lancaster and his two brothers. After the death of the Spanish princess, he espoused Catharine Swineford, daughter of a private knight of Hainault, by whose alliance York and Gloucester thought the dignity of the family much injured: but the king gratified his uncle, by passing in parliament a charter of legitimation to the children whom that lady had born him before marriage, and by creating the eldest earl of Somerset. After this restoration of the government to its natural state, there is an interval of some years wholly unproductive of important events.

The wars, meanwhile, which Richard had inherited with his crown, still continued; though interrupted by frequent truces, according to the practice of that age, and conducted with little vigour, by reason of the weakness of all parties. The French war was scarcely heard of; the tranquillity of the northern borders was only interrupted by one inroad of the Scots, which proceeded more from a rivalship between the two martial families of Percy and character of him: but he is a writer somewhat passionate and partial; and the choice made of this gentleman by Edward III. and the Black Prince for the education of Richard, makes the character given him by Froissard much more probable.

(d) In general, the parliament in those days never paid a proper regard to Edward's statute of treasons, though one of the most advantageous laws for the subject that has ever been enacted. In the 17th of the king, "the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester complain to Richard that sir Thomas Talbot, with others of his adherents, conspired the death of the said dukes in divers parts of Cheshire, as the same was confessed and well known: and praying that the parliament would judge of the fault. Whereupon the king and the lords in the parliament judged the same fact to be open and high treason: and hereupon they award two writs, the one to the sheriff of York, and the other to the sheriffs of Derby, to take the body of the said sir Thomas, returnable in the King's Bench in the month of Easter then ensuing. And open proclamation was made in Westminster Hall, that upon the sheriff's return, and at the next coming in of the said sir Thomas, the said Thomas should be convicted of treason, and incur the loss and pain of the same: and all such as should receive him, after the proclamation, shall incur the same loss and pain." Cotton, p. 354. It is to be observed, that this extraordinary judgement was passed in a time of tranquillity. Though the statute itself of Edward III. reserves a power to the parliament to declare any new species of treason, it is not to be supposed that this power was reserved to the house of lords alone, or that men were to be judged by a law ex post facto. At least, if such be the meaning of the clause, it may be affirmed that men were at that time very ignorant of the first principles of law and justice.

Douglas, than from any national quarrel: a fierce battle or skirmish was fought at Otterborne, on the 15th of August, 1388, in which young Percy, sirnamed Hotspur, from his impetuous valour, was taken prisoner, and Douglas slain; and the victory remained undecided.

In the summer of 1394, Richard resolved to undertake an expedition into Ireland, as well to settle some affairs which required arrangement, as to divert his grief for the loss of his amiable consort, who died on Whitsunday, at the palace of Shene, near Richmond. He accordingly embarked at Milford Haven about Michaelmas; and on his arrival in Ireland, found all the Irish chieftains, whose incursions had been the cause of his voyage, ready to make any kind of submission he should require; and Richard, by nature generous and humane, wisely preferred attaching them to his interest by acts of munificence, than to attempt to awe them into subjection by threats or punishment. He therefore received them kindly, and loaded them with presents. Having passed the winter in Dublin, where he assembled a parliament, he returned to England in the spring of 1395.

At last, the English and French courts began to think in earnest of a lasting peace; but found it so difficult to adjust their opposite pretensions, that they were content to establish a truce of twenty-five years: Brest and Cherbourg were restored, the former to the duke of Britanny, the latter to the king of Navarre: both parties were left in possession of all the other places which they held at the time of concluding the truce: and to render the amity between the two crowns more durable, Richard, who had been a widower about a year, was affianced to Isabella, the daughter of Charles. This princess was only seven years of age; but the king's object in agreeing to so unequal a match, was chiefly that he might fortify himself by this alliance, against the enterprizes of his uncles, particularly of the duke of Gloucester, and the incurable turbulence as well as inconstancy of his barons.

The English ambassadors having settled all the articles of the intended marriage, the contract was confirmed by the French monarch at Paris, on the 9th of March, 1396. As the contracting parties were within the degrees of consanguinity prohibited by the canons, a dispensation from the pope was requisite to be obtained; on which account the marriage was delayed till the first of November, when the nuptials were celebrated with great pomp in the church of St. Nicholas, at Calais, by the archbishop of Canterbury.

The administration of the king, though it was not, in this interval, sullied by any unpopular act, except the seizing of the charter of London, which was soon after restored, tended not much to corroborate his authority; and his personal character brought him into contempt, even while his public government appeared, in a great measure, unexceptionable. Indolent, profuse, addicted to low pleasures; he spent his whole time in feasting and jollity, and dissipated, in idle show, or in bounties to favourites of no reputation, that revenue which the people expected to see him employ in enterprizes directed to public honour and advantage. He forgot his rank by admitting all men to his familiarity; and he was not sensible, that their acquaintance with the qualities of his mind was not able to impress them with the respect which he neglected to preserve from his birth and station. The earls of Kent and Huntingdon, his two uterine brothers, were his chief confidents and favourites; and though he never devoted himself to them with so profuse an affection as that with which he had formerly been attached to the duke of Ireland, it was easy for men to see, that every grace passed through their hands, and that the king had rendered himself a mere cypher in the government. The small regard which the public bore to his person, disposed them to murmur against his administration, and to receive, with avidity every complaint which the discontented or ambitious grandees suggested against him.

The duke of Gloucester soon perceived the advantages which this dissolute conduct gave him; and finding, that both resentment and jealousy on the part of his nephew still prevented him from acquiring any ascendant over that prince, he determined to cultivate his popularity with the nation, and to revenge himself on those who eclipsed him in favour and authority. He seldom appeared at court or in council: he never declared his opinion but in order to disapprove of the measures embraced by the king and his favourites; and he courted the friendship of every man, whom disappointment or private resentment had rendered an enemy to the administration. The long truce with France was unpopular with the English, who breathed nothing but war against that hostile nation; and Gloucester took care to encourage all the vulgar prejudices which prevailed on this subject. Forgetting the misfortunes which attended the English arms during the later years of Edward, he made an invidious comparison between the glories of that reign and the inactivity of the present, and he lamented that Richard should have degenerated so much from the heroic virtues by which his father and his grandfather were distinguished. The military men were inflamed with a desire of war, when they heard him talk of the signal victories formerly obtained, and of the easy prey which might be made of French riches by the superior valour of the English: the populace readily embraced the same sentiments; and all men exclaimed that this prince, whose counsels were so much neglected, was the true support of English honour, and alone able to raise the nation to its former power and splendour. His great abilities, his popular manners, his princely extraction, his immense riches, his high office of constable, all these advantages, not a little assisted by his want of court-favour, gave him a mighty authority in the kingdom, and rendered him formidable to Richard and those who held the reins of government.

Froissard, a contemporary writer and very impartial, but whose credit is somewhat impaired by his want of exactness in material facts, ascribes to the duke of Gloucester more desperate views, and such as were totally incompatible with the government and domestic tranquillity of the nation. In the spring and summer of the year 1397, he had several private meetings with the principal prelates and nobles of his party, in which the most desperate designs are said—and with the greatest appearance of truth—to have been formed against the government, if not against the person of the king. According to that historian, he proposed to his nephew, Roger Mortimer earl of Marche, whom Richard had declared his successor, to give him immediate possession of the throne, by the deposition of a prince so unworthy of power and authority; and when Mortimer declined the project, he resolved to make a partition of the kingdom between himself, his two brothers, and the earl of Arundel; and entirely to dispossess Richard of the crown. The king, it is said, being informed of these designs, saw that either his own ruin or that of Gloucester was inevitable; and he resolved, by a hasty blow, to prevent the execution of such destructive projects. This is certain, that Gloucester, by his own confession, had often affected to speak contemptuously of the king's person and government; had deliberated concerning the lawfulness of throwing off allegiance to him; and had even borne part in a secret conference, where his deposition was proposed and talked of, and determined (e): but it is reasonable to think, that his schemes were not so far advanced as to make him resolve on putting them immediately in execution. The danger, probably, was still too distant to render a desperate remedy entirely necessary for the security of government.

But whatever opinion we may form of the danger arising from Gloucester's conspiracies, his aversion to the French truce and alliance was public and avowed; and that court, which had now a great influence over the king, pushed him to provide for his own safety, by punishing the traiterous designs of his uncle. The resentment against his former acts of violence revived; the sense of his refractory and uncompliant behaviour was still recent; and a man, whose ambition had once usurped royal authority, and who had murdered all the faithful servants of the king, was thought capable, on a favourable opportunity of renewing the same criminal enterprizes. The king's precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation: Gloucester was unexpectedly arrested at his castle of Pleshy in Essex; hurried on board a ship which was lying in the river; and carried over to Calais, where alone, by reason of Richard's numerous partizans, he could safely be detained in custody. The earls of Arundel and Warwick were seized at the same time: the malcontents, so suddenly deprived of their leaders, (e) Cotton, p. 378. Tyrrel, vol. iii. part 2. p. 972. from the records. Parliamentary History, vol. i. p. 473. That this confession was genuine, and obtained without violence, may be entirely depended on. Judge Rickhill, who brought it over from Calais, was tried on that account, and acquitted in the first parliament of Henry IV. when Gloucester's party was prevalent. His acquittal, notwithstanding his innocence, may even appear marvellous, considering the times. See Cotton, p. 393.

were

were astonished and overawed; and the concurrence of the dukes of Lancaster and York in those measures, together with the earls of Derby and Rutland, the eldest sons of these princes, bereaved them of all possibility of resistance.

A parliament was immediately summoned to meet at Westminster on the 17th of September, and the king doubted not to find the peers, and still more the commons, compliant with his will. This house had in a former parliament given him very sensible proofs of their attachment (f); and the present suppression of Gloucester's party made him still more assured of a favourable election. As a farther expedient for that purpose, he is also said to have employed the influence of the sheriffs; a practice which, though not unusual, gave umbrage, but which the established authority of that assembly rendered afterwards still more familiar to the nation. Accordingly the parliament passed whatever acts the king was pleased to dictate to them (g): they annulled for ever the commission which usurped upon the royal authority, and they declared it treasonable to attempt, in any future period, the revival of any similar commission (h): they abrogated all the acts which attainted the king's ministers, and which that parliament who passed them, and the whole nation, had sworn inviolably to maintain: and they declared the general pardon then granted to be invalid, as extorted by force, and never ratified by the free consent of the king. Though Richard, after he resumed the government, and lay no longer under restraint, had voluntarily, by proclamation, confirmed that general indemnity: this circumstance seemed not, in their eyes, to merit any consideration. Even a particular pardon, granted six years after to the earl of Arundel, was annulled by parliament; on pretence that it had been procured by surprize, and that the king was not then fully apprized of the degree of guilt incurred by that nobleman.

The commons then preferred an impeachment against Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, for his concurrence in procuring the illegal commission, and in attainting the king's ministers. The primate being found guilty, was punished by banishment, and the sequestration of his temporalities. An appeal or accusation was presented against the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, by the earls of Rutland, Kent, Huntingdon, Somerset, Salisbury, and Nottingham, together with the lords Spencer and Scrope, and they were accused of the same crimes which had been imputed to the archbishop, as well as of their appearance against the king in a hostile manner at Haringay Park. The earl of Arundel, who was brought to the bar, wisely confined all his defence to the pleading of both the general and particular pardon of the king; but his plea being over-ruled, he was condemned and conveyed immediately from the bar to Tower Hill, where he was beheaded, on the 21st of September. The earl of Warwick, who was also convicted of high treason, was, on account of his submissive behaviour, pardoned as to his life, but doomed to perpetual banishment in the Isle of Man. No new acts of treason were imputed to either of these noblemen. The only crimes, for which they were condemned, were the old attempts against the crown, which seemed to be obliterated, both by the distance of time and by repeated pardons. The reason of this method of proceeding, it is difficult to conjecture. The recent conspiracies of Gloucester seem certain from his own confession: but, perhaps, the king and ministry had not at that time in their hands any satisfactory proof of their reality; perhaps, it was difficult to convict Arundel and Warwick of any participation in them; perhaps, an inquiry into these conspiracies would have involved in the guilt some of those great noblemen who now concurred with the crown, and whom it was necessary to cover from all imputation; or perhaps the king, according to the genius of the age, was indifferent about maintaining even the appearance of law and equity, and was only solicitous by any means to ensure success in these prosecutions. This point, like many others in ancient history, we are obliged to leave altogether undetermined.

A warrant was issued to the earl mareschal, governor of Calais, to bring over the duke of Gloucester, in order to his trial; but the governor returned for answer, that the duke had died suddenly of an apoplexy in that fortress. It was then required by the lords appellants, and by the commons likewise, that the late duke of Gloucester should be declared to have been a traitor, and that all his estates should be confiscated; which requisition was instantly complied with. Nothing could be more suspicious, from the time, than the circumstances of that prince's death: it became immediately the general opinion, that he was murdered by orders from his nephew: in the subsequent reign undoubted proofs were produced in parliament, that he had been suffocated with pillows by his keepers (i). And it appeared that the king, apprehensive lest the public trial and execution of so popular a prince, and so near a relation, might prove both dangerous and invidious, had taken this base method of gratifying, and, as he fancied, concealing his revenge upon him. Both parties, in their successive triumphs, seem to have had no farther concern than that of retaliating upon their adversaries; and neither of them were aware, that, by imitating, they indirectly justified, as far as it lay in their power, all the illegal violence of the opposite party.

This session concluded with the creation or advancement of several peers: the earl of Derby was made duke of Hereford; the earl of Rutland, duke of Albemarle; the earl of Kent, duke of Surrey; the earl of Huntingdon, duke of Exeter; the earl of Nottingham, duke of Norfolk; the earl of Somerset, marquis of Dorset; lord Spenser, earl of Gloucester; Ralph Nevil, earl of Westmoreland; Thomas Percy, earl of Worcester; William Scrope, earl of Wiltshire. The parliament, after a session of twelve days, was adjourned to Shrewsbury. The king, before the departure of the members, exacted from them an oath for the perpetual maintenance and establishment of all their acts; an oath similar to that which had formerly been required by the duke of Gloucester and his party, and which had already proved so vain and fruitless.

Both king and parliament met in the same dispositions at Shrewsbury, on the 28th of January, 1398. So anxious was Richard for the security of these acts, that he obliged the lords and commons to swear anew to them on the cross of Canterbury; and he soon after procured a bull from the pope, by which they were, as he imagined, perpetually secured and established. The parliament, on the other hand, conferred on him for life the duties on wool, woolfells, and leather, and granted him, besides a subsidy of one tenth and a half, and one fifteenth and a half. They also reversed the attainder of Tresilian and the other judges, and, with the approbation of the present judges, declared the answers, for which these magistrates had been impeached, to be just and legal; and they carried so far their retrospect, as to reverse, on the petition of lord Spenser, earl of Gloucester, the attainder pronounced against the two Spensers in the reign of Edward II. The ancient history of England is nothing but a catalogue of reversals: every thing is in fluctuation and movement: one faction is continually undoing what was established by another; and the multiplied oaths, which each party exacted for the security of the present acts, betray a perpetual consciousness of their instability.

Before the parliament was dissolved they elected a committee of twelve lords and six commoners (k), whom they invested with the whole power both of lords and commons, and (f) In the preceding parliament the commons had shewn a disposition very complaisant to the king; yet there happened an incident in their proceedings which is curious, and shews us the state of the house during that period. The members were either country gentlemen or merchants, who were assembled for a few days, and were entirely unacquainted with business; so that it was easy to lead them astray, and draw them into votes and resolutions very different from their intention. Some petitions concerning the state of the nation were voted; in which, among other things, the house recommended frugality to the king; and for that purpose desired that the court should not be so much frequented as formerly by bishops and ladies. The king was displeased with this freedom: the commons very humbly craved pardon: he was not satisfied unless they would name the mover of the petitions. It happened to be one Haxey, whom the parliament, in order to make atonement, condemned for this offence to die the death of a traitor. But the king, at the desire of the archbishop of Canterbury and the prelates, pardoned him. When a parliament in those times, not agitated by any faction, and being at entire freedom, could be guilty of such monstrous extravagance, it is easy to judge what might be expected from them in more trying situations. See Cotton's Abridgement, 361, 362.

(g) The nobles brought numerous retainers with them to give them security, as we are told by Walsingham, p. 354. The king had only a few Cheshire men for his guard. It is said by Rymer and Hollinshed, that the nobles were attended by such prodigious retinues, that they not only filled all the vacant apartments in London and its vicinity, but in all the towns and villages within ten miles of the metropolis.

and endowed with full authority to finish all business which had been laid before the houses, and which they had not had leisure to bring to a conclusion. This was an unusual concession; and though it was limited in the object, might, either immediately or as a precedent, have proved dangerous to the constitution; but the cause of that extraordinary measure was an event singular and unexpected, which engaged the attention of the parliament.

After the destruction of the duke of Gloucester and the heads of that party, a misunderstanding broke out among those noblemen who had joined in the prosecution; and the king wanted either authority sufficient to appease it, or foresight to prevent it. The duke of Hereford appeared in parliament, and accused the duke of Norfolk of having spoken to him, in private, many slanderous words of the king, and of having imputed to that prince an intention of subverting and destroying many of his principal nobility. Norfolk denied the charge, gave Hereford the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by duel. The challenge was accepted: the time and place of combat were appointed: and as the event of this important trial by arms might require the interposition of legislative authority, the parliament thought it more suitable to delegate their power to a committee, than to prolong the session beyond the usual time which custom and general convenience had prescribed to it (l).

The duke of Hereford was certainly very little delicate in the point of honour, when he revealed a private conversation to the ruin of the person who had entrusted him; and we may thence be more inclined to believe the duke of Norfolk's denial, than the other's asseveration. But Norfolk had in these transactions betrayed an equal neglect of honour, which brings him entirely on a level with his antagonist. Though he had publicly joined with the duke of Gloucester and his party in all the former acts of violence against the king; and his name stands among the appellants who accused the duke of Ireland and the other ministers; yet was he not ashamed publicly to impeach his former associates for the very crimes which he had concurred with them in committing; and his name increases the list of those appellants who brought them to a trial. Such were the principles and practices of those ancient knights and barons during the prevalence of the aristocratical government, and the reign of chivalry.

The lists for this decision of truth and right were appointed at Coventry, before the king, on the 16th of September. All the nobility of England bandied into parties, and adhered either to the one duke or the other: the whole nation was held in suspense with regard to the event; but when the two champions appeared in the field, accoutred for the combat, the king interposed, to prevent both the present effusion of such noble blood, and the future consequences of the quarrel. By the advice and authority of the parliamentary commissioners he stopped the duel; and to shew his impartiality, he ordered, by the same authority, both the combatants to leave the kingdom; assigning one country for the place of Norfolk's exile, which he declared perpetual; another for that of Hereford, which he limited to ten years.

The duke of Norfolk was greatly affected at the cruelty of the king's judgement: he first retired to Germany, and from thence repaired to Venice, where his grief in a short time brought him to his grave. Hereford, on the contrary, was a man of great prudence and command of temper; and behaved himself with so much submission in these delicate circumstances, that the king, before his departure, shortened the term of his exile four years; and he also granted him letters patent, by which he was empowered, in case any inheritance should in the interval devolve to him, to enter immediately in possession, and to postpone the doing of homage till his return.

The weakness and fluctuation of Richard's counsels appear no where more evident than in the conduct of this affair. No sooner had Hereford left the kingdom, than the king's jealousy of the power and riches of that prince's family revived; and he was sensible, that, by Gloucester's death, he had only removed a counterpoise to the Lancastrian interest, which was now become formidable to his crown and kingdom. Being informed that Hereford had entered into a treaty of marriage with the daughter of the duke of Berry, uncle to the French king, he determined to prevent the finishing of an alliance which would so much extend the interest of his cousin in foreign countries; and he sent over the earl of Salisbury to Paris with a commission for that purpose. The death of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, which happened on the 3rd of February, 1399, in the fourth month after Hereford's exile, called upon him to take new resolutions with regard to that opulent succession. The present duke, in consequence of the king's patent, desired to be put in possession of the estate and jurisdictions of his father; but Richard, afraid of strengthening the hands of a man whom he had already so much offended, applied to the parliamentary commissioners, and persuaded them, that this affair was but an appendage to that business which the parliament had delegated to them. By their authority he revoked his letters patent, and retained possession of the estate of Lancaster; and by the same authority he seized and tried the duke's attorney, who had procured and insisted on the letters, and he had him condemned as a traitor, for faithfully executing that trust to his master (m). An extravagant act of power! even though the king changed, in favour of the attorney, the penalty of death into that of banishment.

Henry, the new duke of Lancaster, had acquired, by his conduct and abilities, the esteem of the public; and having served with distinction against the infidels in Lithunia, he had joined to his other praises those of piety and valour, virtues which have at all times a great influence over mankind, and were, during those ages, the qualities chiefly held in estimation. He was connected with most of the principal nobility by blood, alliance, or friendship; and as the injury done him by the king might in its consequences affect all of them, he easily brought them, by a sense of common interest, to take part in his resentment. The people, who must have an object of affection, who found nothing in the king's person which they could love or revere, and who were even disgusted with many parts of his conduct (n), easily transferred to Henry that attachment, which the death of the duke of Gloucester had left without any fixed direction. His misfortunes were lamented; the injustice which he had suffered was complained of; and all men turned their eyes towards him, as the only person that could retrieve the lost honour of the nation, or redress the supposed abuses in the government.

While such were the dispositions of the people, Richard had the imprudence to embark for Ireland, in order to revenge the death of his cousin, Roger earl of Marche, the presumptive heir of the crown, who had lately been slain in a skirmish by the natives; and he thereby left the kingdom of England open to the attempts of his provoked and ambitious enemy. Henry of Bolingbroke, the present duke of Lancaster, was at the court of France when he received intelligence of his father's death, and of the revocation of his letters patent; and, as his friends in England were both numerous and powerful, he received very pressing invitations to profit by the king's absence, in order to recover those estates which were unjustly with-held from him. Thus encouraged, he determined on the voyage; and having obtained a few ships from the duke of Britanny, he embarked at Nantz with a retinue of sixty armed men, accompanied by Thomas Arundel, the exiled primate, and the young earl of Arundel, nephew to the archbishop. After hovering some days on the coast, he landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, on the 4th of July, and was immediately joined by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, two of the most potent nobles in England. Here he took a solemn oath, that he had no other purpose in this invasion, than to recover the duchy of Lancaster, unjustly detained from him; and he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of their country, to second him in this reasonable and moderate pretension. Deceived by these specious pretensions, thus sanctioned earls of Marche, Salisbury, Northumberland, Gloucester, Winchester, and Wiltshire; John Bussey, Henry Green, John Russel, Robert Teyne, Henry Chelmeswicke, and John Golofre. It is to be remarked, that the duke of Lancaster always concurred with the rest in all their proceedings, even in the banishment of his son, which was afterwards so much complained of.

(l) In the first year of Henry VI. when the authority of parliament was great, and when that assembly could least be suspected of lying under violence, a like concession was made to the privy council, from like motives of convenience. See Cotton, p. 564.

(m) Tyrrel, vol. iii. part 2. p. 991, from the records.

(n) He levied fines upon those who had ten years before joined the duke of Gloucester and his party: they were obliged to pay him money, before he would allow them to enjoy the benefit of the indemnity; and in the articles of charge against him, it is asserted, that the payment of one fine did not suffice. It is indeed likely, that his ministers would abuse the power put into their hands; and this grievance extended to very many people. Historians agree in representing this practice as a great oppression. See Otterbourne, p. 199.

by the much prostituted solemnity of an oath, every place was in commotion; the malcontents in all quarters flew to arms; London discovered the strongest symptoms of its disposition to mutiny and rebellion; and Henry's army, increasing on every day's march, soon amounted to the number of sixty thousand combatants.

The duke of York was left guardian of the realm; a place to which his birth entitled him, but which both his slender abilities, and his natural connexions with the duke of Lancaster, rendered him utterly incapable of filling in such a dangerous emergency. Such of the chief nobility as were attached to the crown, and could either have seconded the guardian's good intentions, or have overawed his infidelity, had attended the king into Ireland; and the efforts of Richard's friends were every where more feeble than those of his enemies. The duke of York, however, appointed the rendezvous of his forces at St. Alban's, and soon assembled an army of forty thousand men; but found them entirely destitute of zeal and attachment to the royal cause, and more inclined to join the party of the rebels. He hearkened therefore very readily to a message from Henry, who entreated him not to oppose a loyal and humble supplicant in the recovery of his legal patrimony; and the guardian even declared publicly that he would second his nephew in so reasonable a request. His army embraced with acclamations the same measures; and the duke of Lancaster, reinforced by them, was now entirely master of the kingdom. He hastened to Bristol, into which some of the king's ministers had thrown themselves; and soon obliging that place to surrender, he yielded to the popular wishes, and without giving them a trial, ordered the earl of Wiltshire, Sir John Bussy, and Sir Henry Green, whom he there took prisoners, to be led to immediate execution.

The king, receiving intelligence of this invasion and insurrection, hastened over from Ireland, and landed in Milford Haven with a body of twenty thousand men: but even this army, so much inferior to the enemy, was either overawed by the general combination of the kingdom, or seized with the same spirit of disaffection; and they gradually deserted him, till he found that he had not above six thousand men who followed his standard. It appeared, therefore, necessary to retire secretly from this small body, which served only to expose him to danger; and he fled to Conway Castle in the isle of Anglesea, where it was discussed, with all the deliberation which the emergency would admit of, whether it would be most proper to leave the kingdom, and repair for shelter to his French dominions, or to open a negociation with the duke of Lancaster, who had not yet promulgated his designs on the crown. Unfortunately the last of these measures was adopted, and the duke of Exeter dispatched for the purpose of proposing a treaty; but that nobleman was detained by Lancaster, who sent the earl of Northumberland to Conway Castle, with demands of such specious moderation, that the king was impelled to an immediate compliance. The earl then prevailed on Richard to hold a personal conference with Lancaster at Flint Castle, in order to complete the negociation; but the king was seized on the road by a body of armed men, and conducted to the duke of Lancaster; who conveyed him first to his head quarters at Chester; and then, by easy journies, to the Tower of London, where he was safely lodged on the second of September. It is pretended that the recorder met him on the road, and in the name of the city, entreated him, for the public safety, to put Richard to death, with all his adherents who were prisoners; but the duke prudently determined to make many others participate in his guilt, before he would proceed to those extremities. For this purpose, he issued writs of election in the king's name, and appointed the meeting of a parliament at Westminster, on the 30th of the same month.

Such of the peers as were most devoted to the king, were either fled or imprisoned; and no opponents, even among the barons, dared to appear against Henry, amidst that scene of outrage and violence, which commonly attends revolutions, especially in England during those turbulent ages. It is also easy to imagine, that a house of commons, elected during this universal ferment, and this triumph of the Lancastrian party, would be extremely attached to that cause, and ready to second every suggestion of their leaders. That order, being as yet of too little weight to stem the torrent, was always carried along with it, and served only to increase the violence, which the public interest required it should endeavour to control. The duke of Lancaster, therefore, sensible that he should be entirely master, began to carry his views to the crown itself; and he deliberated with his partizans concerning the most proper means of effecting his purpose. He first extorted a resignation from Richard, on the day previous to the meeting of parliament; but as he knew that this deed would plainly appear the result of force and fear, he also purposed, notwithstanding the danger of the precedent to himself and his posterity, to have him solemnly deposed in parliament, for his pretended tyranny and misconduct. With this view, a charge, consisting of thirty-three articles, was accordingly drawn up against him, and presented to that assembly. The coronation oath was prefixed to it, for the purpose of proving that by particular acts specified in those articles, he had violated that oath.

If we examine these articles, which are expressed with extreme acrimony against Richard, we shall find that, except some rash speeches which are imputed to him, and of whose reality, as they are said to have passed in private conversation, we may reasonably entertain some doubt; the chief amount of the charge is contained in his violent conduct during the two last years of his reign, and naturally divides itself into two principal heads. The first and most considerable is the revenge which he took on the princes and great barons, who had formerly usurped, and still persevered in controlling and threatening, his authority; the second is the violation of the laws and general privileges of his people. But the former, however irregular in many of its circumstances, was fully supported by authority of parliament, and was but a copy of the violence which the princes and barons themselves, during their former triumph, had exercised against him and his party. The detention of Lancaster's estate was properly speaking, a revocation by parliamentary authority, of a grace, which the king himself had formerly granted him. The murder of Gloucester (for the secret execution, however merited, of that prince, certainly deserves this appellation,) was a private deed, formed not any precedent, and implied not any usurped or arbitrary power of the crown, which could justly give umbrage to the people. It really proceeded from a defect of power in the king, rather than from his ambition; and proves that instead of being dangerous to the constitution, he possessed not even the authority necessary for the execution of the laws.

Concerning the second head of accusation, as it mostly consists of general facts, was framed by Richard's inveterate enemies, and was never allowed to be answered by him or his friends, it is more difficult to form a judgement. The greater part of these grievances, imputed to Richard, seems to be the exertion of arbitrary prerogatives; such as the dispensing power (o), levying purveyance (p), employing the marshal's court (q), extorting loans (r), granting protections from law-suits (s); prerogatives which, though often complained of, had frequently been exercised by his predecessors, and continued to be so by his successors. But whether his irregular acts of this kind were more frequent, and injudicious, and violent than usual, or were only laid hold of and exaggerated by the factions to which the weakness of his reign had given birth, we are not able, at this distance, to determine with certainty. There is, however, one circumstance in which his conduct is visibly different from that of his grandfather: he is not accused of having imposed one arbitrary tax, without consent of parliament, during his whole reign (t): scarcely a year passed during the reign of Edward, which was free from complaints with regard to this dangerous exertion of authority. But, perhaps, the ascendant which Edward had acquired over the people, together with his great prudence, enabled him to make a use very advantageous to his subjects of this and other arbitrary prerogatives, and rendered them a smaller grievance in his hands, than a less absolute authority in those of his grandson. This is a point which it would be rash for us to decide positively on either side; but it is certain, that a charge drawn up by the duke of Lancaster, and assented to by a parliament situated in those circumstances, forms no manner of pre-

(o) Art. 13, 17, 18. (p) Art. 22. (q) Art. 27. (r) Art. 14. (s) Art. 16.

(t) We learn from Cotton, p. 362, that the king, by his chancellor, told the commons, "that they were sunderly bound to him, and namely in forbearing to charge them with desmes and fifteens, the which he meant no more to charge them in his own person." These words no more, allude to the practice of his predecessors: he had not himself imposed any arbitrary taxes: even the parliament, in the articles of his deposition, though they complain of heavy taxes, affirm not that they were imposed illegally or by arbitrary will.

When the charge against Richard was presented to the parliament, though it was liable, almost in every article, to objections, it was not canvassed, nor examined, nor disputed in either house, and seemed to be received with universal approbation. One man alone, Thomas Merks, bishop of Carlisle, had the courage, amidst this general disloyalty and violence, to appear in defence of his unhappy master, and to plead his cause against all the power of the prevailing party. Though some topics, employed by that virtuous prelate, may seem to favour too much the doctrine of passive obedience, and to make too large a sacrifice of the rights of mankind; he was naturally pushed into that extreme by his abhorrence of the present licentious factions; and such intrepidity, as well as disinterestedness of behaviour, proves, that whatever his speculative principles were, his heart was elevated far above the meanness and abject submission of a slave. He represented to the parliament, that all the abuses of government which could justly be imputed to Richard, instead of amounting to tyranny, were merely the result of error, youth, or misguided counsel, and admitted of a remedy, more easy and salutary than a total subversion of the constitution. That even had they been much more violent and dangerous than they really were, they had chiefly proceeded from former examples of resistance, which, making the prince sensible of his precarious situation, had obliged him to establish his throne by irregular and arbitrary expedients. That a rebellious disposition in subjects was the principal cause of tyranny in kings: laws could never secure the subject, which did not give security to the sovereign: and if the maxim of inviolable loyalty, which formed the basis of the English government, were once rejected, the privileges belonging to the several orders of the state, instead of being fortified by that licentiousness, would thereby lose the surest foundation of their force and stability. That the parliamentary deposition of Edward II. far from making a precedent which could control this maxim, was only an example of successful violence; and it was sufficiently to be lamented, that crimes were so often committed in the world, without establishing principles which might justify and authorize them. That even that precedent, false and dangerous as it was, could never warrant the present excesses, which were so much greater, and which would entail distraction and misery on the nation, to the latest posterity. That the succession, at least of the crown, was then preserved inviolate: the lineal heir was placed on the throne; and the people had an opportunity, by their legal obedience to him, of making atonement for the violence which they had committed against his predecessor. That a descendant of Lionel duke of Clarence, the elder brother of the late duke of Lancaster, had been declared in parliament successor to the crown: he had left posterity; and their title, however it might be overpowered by present force and faction, could never be obliterated from the minds of the people. That if the turbulent disposition alone of the nation had overturned the well-established throne of so good a prince as Richard; what dreadful commotions must ensue, when the same cause was united to the motive of restoring the legal and undoubted heir to his authority? That the new government, intended to be established, would stand on no principle; and would scarcely retain any pretence, by which it could challenge the obedience of men of sense and virtue. That the claim of lineal descent was so gross as scarcely to deceive the most ignorant of the populace: conquest could never be pleaded by a rebel against his sovereign: the consent of the people had no authority in a monarchy not derived from consent, but established by hereditary right; and however the nation might be justified in deposing the misguided Richard, it could never have any reason for setting aside his lawful heir and successor, who was plainly innocent. And that the duke of Lancaster would give them but a bad specimen of the legal moderation which might be expected from his future government, if he added to the crime of his past rebellion, the guilt of excluding the family, which, both by right of blood, and by declaration of parliament, would, in case of Richard's demise, or voluntary resignation have been received as the undoubted heirs of the monarchy (v).

All the circumstances of this event, compared to those which attended the late revolution in 1688, shew the difference between a great and civilized nation, deliberately vindicating its established privileges, and a turbulent and barbarous aristocracy, plunging headlong from the extremes of one faction into those of another. The noble freedom of the bishop of Carlisle, which from men of honour and honesty must have extorted applause, was rewarded by an order, from the rebellious tyrant who now aspired to the crown, to the earl mareschal, to take the virtuous prelate into custody, and send him prisoner to the abbey of St. Alban's—an act of violence infinitely more arbitrary and unconstitutional than any that had been committed during the reign of Richard. No farther debate was attempted: thirty-three long articles of charge were, in one meeting, voted against Richard; and voted unanimously by the same peers and prelates who a little before had, voluntarily and unanimously, authorized those very acts of violence of which they now complained. That prince was deposed by the suffrages of both houses; and the throne being now vacant, the duke of Lancaster stepped forth, and having crossed himself on the forehead and on the breast, and called upon the name of Christ, he pronounced these words, which we shall give in the original language, because of their singularity:

"In the name of Fadher, Son, and Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster challenge this rewme of Ynglonde, and the crowne, with all the membres, and the apeurtenances; als I that am descendit by right line of the blode, comyng fro the gude Lord King Henry Therde, and throghe that ryght that God of his grace hath sent me, with helpe of my kyn, and of my frendes to recover it; the whiche rewme was in point to be ondone by defaut of governance, and ondoying of the gude lawes."

In order to understand this speech, it must be observed, that there was a silly story, received among some of the lower orders of the people, that Edmund earl of Lancaster, son of Henry III. was really the elder brother of Edward I.; but that, by reason of some deformity in his person, he had been postponed in the succession, and his younger brother imposed on the nation in his stead. As the present duke of Lancaster inherited from Edmund by his mother, this genealogy made him the true heir of the monarchy; and it is therefore insinuated in Henry's speech: but the absurdity was too gross to be openly avowed either by him or by the parliament. The case is the same with regard to his right of conquest: he was a subject who rebelled against his sovereign: he entered the kingdom with a retinue of no more than sixty persons: he could not therefore be the conqueror of England; and this right is accordingly insinuated, not avowed. Still there is a third claim derived from his merits in saving the nation from tyranny and oppression; and this claim is also insinuated: but as it seemed, by its nature, better calculated as a reason for his being elected king by a free choice, than for giving him an immediate right of possession, he durst not speak openly even on this head; and to obviate any notion of election, he challenges the crown as his due, either by acquisition or inheritance. The whole forms such a piece of jargon and nonsense, as is almost without example: no objection, however, was made to it in parliament: the unanimous voice of lords and commons placed Henry on the throne: he became king, nobody could tell how or wherefore: the title of the house of Marche, formerly recognized by parliament, was neither invalidated nor repealed; but passed over in total silence; and as a concern for the liberties of the people seems to have had no hand in this revolution, their right to dispose of the government, as well as all their other privileges, was left pre(u) To shew how little credit is to be given to this charge against Richard, we may observe, that a law, in the 13 Edw. III. had been enacted against the continuance of sheriffs for more than one year: but the inconvenience of changes having afterwards appeared from experience, the commons, in the twentieth of this king, applied by petition, that the sheriffs might be continued; though that petition had not been enacted into a statute, by reason of other disagreeable circumstances which attended it. See Cotton, p. 361. It was certainly a very moderate exercise of the dispensing power in the king to continue the sheriffs, after he found that that practice would be acceptable to his subjects, and had been applied for by one house of parliament: yet is this made an article of charge against him by the present parliament. See art. 18. Walsingham, speaking of a period early in Richard's minority, says, "But what do acts of parliament signify, when after they are made they take no effect; since the king, by the advice of the privy council, takes upon him to alter, or wholly set aside all those things which by general consent had been ordained in parliament?" If Richard, therefore, exercised the dispensing power, he was warranted by the examples of his uncles and grandfather, and, indeed, of all his predecessors from the time of Henry III. inclusive.

cisely on the same footing as before. But Henry having, when he claimed the crown, dropped some obscure hint concerning conquest, which, it was thought, might endanger these privileges, he soon after made a public declaration, that he did not thereby intend to deprive any one of his franchises or liberties; which was the only circumstance, where we shall find meaning or common sense, in all these transactions.

The subsequent events discover the same headlong violence of conduct, and the same rude notions of civil government. The deposition of Richard dissolved the parliament: it was necessary to summon a new one; and Henry, October 6, 1399, called together, without any new election, the same members; and this assembly he denominated a new parliament. They were employed in the usual task of reversing every deed of the opposite party. All the acts of the last parliament of Richard, which had been confirmed by their oaths, and by a papal bull, were now abrogated: all the acts which had passed in the parliament where Gloucester prevailed, which had also been confirmed by their oaths, but which had been abolished by Richard, were anew established. The answers of Tresilian, and the three other judges, which one parliament had annulled, but which another parliament, and new judges, had approved, here received a second condemnation. The peers who had accused Gloucester, Arundel, and Warwick, and who had received higher titles for that piece of service, were all of them degraded from their new dignities: even the practice of prosecuting appeals in parliament, which bore the air of a violent confederacy against an individual, rather than of a legal indictment, was wholly abolished; and trials were restored to the course of common law. The natural effect of this conduct was to render the people giddy with such rapid and perpetual changes, and to make them lose all notions of right and wrong in the measures of government.

The earl of Northumberland made a motion, on the 23rd of October, in the house of peers, with regard to the unhappy prince whom they had deposed. He asked them what advice they would give the king for the future treatment of him; since Henry was resolved to spare his life. They unanimously replied, that he should be imprisoned under a secure guard, in some secret place, and should be deprived of all commerce with any of his friends or partizans. It was easy to foresee, that he would not long remain alive in the hands of such barbarous and sanguinary enemies. In a very short time Richard was murdered, though historians differ with regard to the manner in which he was put to death. It was long the prevailing opinion, that Sir Piers Exton, and others of his guards, fell upon him in the castle of Pomfret, (Pontefract) in Yorkshire, where he was confined, and dispatched him with their halberts. But it is more probable, that he was starved to death in prison; and after all sustenance was denied him, he prolonged his unhappy life, it is said, for a fortnight, before he reached the end of his miseries (w). He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign. He was buried at Westminster. He left no posterity, either legitimate or illegitimate. At the death of Richard the Second the Saxon race of princes became extinct.

All the writers, who have transmitted to us the history of Richard, lived during the reigns of the Lancastrian princes; and candour requires, that we should not give entire credit to the reproaches which they have thrown upon his memory. But, after making all proper allowances, he still appears to have been a very weak prince, and unfit for the government of a large kingdom, less for want of natural parts and capacity, than of solid judgement and a good education. He was violent in his temper; profuse in his expence; fond of idle show and magnificence; devoted to favourites; and addicted to pleasure: passions, all of them, the most inconsistent with a prudent œconomy, and consequently dangerous in a limited and mixed government. Had he possessed the talents of gaining, and still more those of overawing, his great barons, he might have escaped all the misfortunes of his reign, and been allowed to carry much farther his oppressions over the people, if he really was guilty of any, without their daring to rebel, or even to murmur against him. But when the grandees were tempted, by his want of prudence and of vigour, to resist his authority, and execute the most violent enterprizes upon him, he was naturally led to seek an opportunity of retaliation; justice was neglected; the lives of the chief nobility were sacrificed; and all these enormities seem to have proceeded less from a settled design of establishing arbitrary power, than from the insolence of victory, and the necessities of the king's situation. The manners indeed of the age were the chief source of such violence: laws, which were feebly executed in peaceable times, lost all their authority during public convulsions: both parties were alike guilty: or if any difference may be remarked between them, we shall find, that the authority of the crown, being more legal was commonly carried, when it prevailed, to less desperate extremities than was that of the aristocracy.

On comparing the conduct and events of this reign, with those of the preceding, we shall find equal reason to admire Edward, and to blame Richard; but the circumstance of opposition, surely, will not lie in the strict regard paid by the former to national privileges, and the neglect of them by the latter. On the contrary, the prince of small abilities, as he felt his want of power, seems to have been more moderate in this respect than the other. Every parliament assembled during the reign of Edward, remonstrates against the exertion of some arbitrary prerogative or other: we hear not any complaints of that kind during the reign of Richard, till the assembling of his last parliament, which was summoned by his inveterate enemies, which dethroned him, which framed their complaints during the time of the most furious convulsions, and whose testimony must therefore have, on that account, much less authority with every equitable judge (x). Both these princes experienced the encroachments of the Great upon their authority. Edward, reduced to necessities, was obliged to make an express bargain with his parliament, and to sell some of his prerogatives for present supply; but as they were acquainted with his genius and capacity, they ventured not to demand any exorbitant concessions, or such as were incompatible with regal and sovereign power: the weakness of Richard tempted the parliament to extort a commission, which, in a manner, dethroned the prince, and transferred the sceptre into the hands of the nobility. The events of these encroachments were also suitable to the character of each. Edward had no sooner gotten the supply, than he departed from the engagements which had induced the parliament to grant it; he openly told his people, that he had but dissembled with them when he seemed to make them these concessions; and he resumed and retained all his prerogatives. But Richard, because he was detected in consulting and deliberating with the judges on the lawfulness of restoring the constitution, found his barons immediately in arms against him; was deprived of his liberty; saw his favourites, his ministers, his tutor, butchered before his face, or banished and attainted; and was obliged to give way to all this violence. There cannot be a more remarkable contrast between the fortunes of two princes: it were happy for society, did this contrast always depend on the justice or injustice of the measures which men embrace; and not rather on the different degrees of prudence and vigour with which those measures are supported. Richard's domestic virtues incontestably prove that he was not born to be a tyrant--as a husband, he was mild and affectionate; as a master, liberal and indulgent; and as a friend, steady and sincere.

It cannot be supposed that, during a reign of turbulence and disorder, a very strict and impartial administration of justice could be preserved. The laws, despised by those who should have been most studious to enforce an observance of them, must naturally have fallen into general contempt. The following is the preamble to the statute against Maintenance, which was enacted by parliament at the beginning of the reign of Richard II. in the year 1377: "Whereas divers persons of small revenue of land, rent, or other possessions, do make great retinue of people, as well of esquires as of others, in many parts of the realm, giving to them hats and other livery of one suit by year, taking again towards them the value of the same livery, or percase the double value, by such covenant and assurance, that every of them shall maintain other in all quarrels, be they reasonable or unreasonable, to the great (w) This account is more consistent with the story, that his body was exposed in public, and that no marks of violence were observed upon it.

(x) Peruse, in this view, the abridgement of the records by sir Robert Cotton, during these two reigns.

mischief and oppression of the people, &c."(y) This preamble contains a true picture of the state of the kingdom. The laws had been so feebly executed, even during the long, active, and vigorous reign of Edward III. that no subject could trust to their protection. Men openly associated themselves, under the patronage of some great baron, for their mutual defence. They wore public badges, by which their confederacy was distinguished. They supported each other in all quarrels, iniquities, extortions, murders, robberies, and other crimes. Their chief was more their sovereign than the king himself; and their own band was more connected with them than their country. Hence the perpetual turbulence, disorders, factions, and civil wars of those times: hence the small regard paid to a character or the opinion of the public: hence the large discretionary prerogatives of the crown, and the danger which might have ensued from the too great limitation of them. If the king had possessed no arbitrary powers, while all the nobles assumed and exercised them, there must have ensued an absolute anarchy in the state. One great mischief attending these confederacies, was the extorting from the king pardons for the most enormous crimes. The parliament often endeavoured, in the reign of Edward III. to deprive the prince of this prerogative; but, in that of Richard II. they were content with an abridgement of it. They enacted, that no pardon for rapes or for murder from malice prepense should be valid, unless the crime were particularly specified in it (z). There were also some other circumstances required for passing any pardon of this kind: an excellent law; but ill observed, like most laws that thwart the manners of the people, and the prevailing customs of the times.

It is easy to observe, from these voluntary associations among the people, that the whole force of the feudal system was in a manner dissolved, and that the English had nearly returned, in that particular, to the same situation in which they stood before the Norman conquest. It was, indeed, impossible that that system could long subsist under the perpetual revolutions to which landed property is every where subject. When the great feudal baronies were first erected, the lord lived in opulence in the midst of his vassals: he was in a situation to protect and cherish and defend them: the quality of patron naturally united itself to that of superior: and these two principles of authority mutually supported each other. But when, by the various divisions and mixtures of property, a man's superior came to live at a distance from him, and could no longer give him shelter or countenance; the tie gradually became more fictitious than real: new connections from vicinity or other causes were formed: protection was sought by voluntary services and attachment: the appearance of valour, spirit, abilities in any great man, extended his interest very far: and if the sovereign were deficient in these qualities, he was no less, if not more exposed to the usurpations of the aristocracy, than even during the vigour of the feudal system.

During the reign of Richard II. the constitution appears to have undergone a regular analysis. By the separation of its component parts, in an early period of this reign a democracy (though of a very short duration) was visible; at another time, a perfect aristocracy prevailed; and, in the interval, a monarchy, nearly approaching to absolute, predominated.

The hereditary revenues of the crown were now become inadequate to the expences of government, particularly in time of war; which obliged Richard, whose personal expences considerably increased the deficit, to make frequent applications to parliament for supplies. Among other taxes imposed for the discharge of these continual demands, there was one which, from its singularity, merits particular attention. This was a capitation tax, proportioned to the different ranks and degrees which men held in society. The established proportions were as follow:

A duke, ten marks; an earl four pounds; a baron, banneret, or knight, of equal estate with a baron, two pounds; every bachelor or esquire, who by estate ought to be made a knight, twenty shillings; widows of such bachelors and esquires, twenty shillings; esquires of less estate, four shillings and seven pence; widows of such esquires, six shillings and eight pence; esquires without lands, but who bear arms, three shillings and three pence; chief prior of the hospital of St. John, forty shillings; every commander of the order twenty shillings; every knight of the order, thirteen shillings and four pence; every brother of the order three shillings and four pence; judges of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, and chief baron of the exchequer, each one hundred shillings; every serjeant and great apprentice of the law, forty shillings; other apprentices of the law, twenty shillings; attornies, six and eight pence; the mayor of London, four pounds: aldermen of London, forty shillings; mayors of great towns, forty shillings; mayors of smaller towns, from twenty shillings to six and eight pence; jurats of towns, and capital merchants, twenty shillings; sufficient merchants, eight shillings and four pence; inferior merchants, artificers, and husbandmen, according to the value of their estates, four shillings and eight pence, three and four pence, two shillings, or one and six pence; every serjeant and freeman of the country, six shillings and eight pence, or forty pence; the farmers of manors, parsonages, and granges, dealers in cattle, and other tradesmen, according to the value of their estates, six shillings and eight pence, forty pence, two shillings, or one shilling; advocates, notaries, and proctors, who are married, according to their estates, three shillings and four pence, two shillings, or one shilling; inn-keepers, according to their estates, forty pence, two shillings, or one shilling; every married man, above the age of sixteen, for himself and wife, four pence; every unmarried man or woman, above sixteen, four pence; and every foreign merchant, according to his abilities.

Notwithstanding the partial distribution of justice, some wise and salutary laws for the encouragement of navigation, trade, and commerce, were passed in this reign. By one of these it was enacted, that the merchants of England should neither export nor import merchandize of any denomination in foreign vessels. This act may be considered as our first navigation act.

The greatest novelty introduced into the civil government during this reign was the creation of peers by patent. Lord Beauchamp of Holt was the first peer that was advanced to the house of lords in this manner. The practice of levying benevolences is also first mentioned in the present reign.

This prince lived in a more magnificent manner than perhaps any of his predecessors or successors. His household consisted of ten thousand persons: he had three hundred in his kitchen; and all the other offices were furnished in proportion (a). It must be remarked, that this enormous train had tables supplied them at the king's expence, according to the mode of that age. Such prodigality was probably the source of many exactions by purveyors, and was one chief reason of the public discontents.

CHAP. IX.

The History of the Church from the Accession of Henry the Second till the Death of Richard the Second.

IT is an incontrovertable fact, that whenever the throne of England has been filled by an usurper, the power and jurisdiction of the church of Rome has increased in an astonishing degree. These usurpers were so desirous of procuring the pope's confirmation of their precarious royalty, that they scrupled not to purchase it by concessions of the utmost importance. Such was the case with Stephen, who permitted the sovereign pontiffs to interfere with more direct authority in the government of the English church, than they had ever done in any of the preceding reigns. But, when Henry the Second acceded to the sovereignty of this country, whose hereditary right rendered it unnecessary to court the recognition of his holiness, it was natural to expect that he would endeavour to check the progress of that arbitrary interference which the vicar of St. Peter, prompted by priestly ambition, operating on the pliancy of an usurper, had endeavoured to establish as the prerogative of his see. The vigour and policy of Henry, with the great popularity which he enjoyed at the time of his accession, qualified him for a defender of the liberties of his church against the arrogant claims of the encroaching pontiffs. But, in the earlier part of his reign, he adopted a measure which rather encouraged than repressed the pretensions of the Romish see to a general dominion over Christian states. We allude to the application which he made to Adrian IV. in 1155, for the permission of invading Ireland. Though a papal papal bull was likely to be of some service in promoting the submission of the Irish, among whom the authority of the pope had already been exerted, it was not very judicious in Henry to take any step which tended in the least to the recognition of the exorbitant claims of Romish superiority.

The prelate who ruled the English church at the time of Stephen's death, was Theobald, who sat for above twenty-two years in the archiepiscopal chair of Canterbury. Having favoured the claims of Henry Plantagenet in his competition with Stephen, he enjoyed the confidence of that prince, which he retained till his death. Although Theobald was disposed to resist the royal exercise of compulsive power over the church, as appeared in his contests with Stephen, he was, on the whole, a moderate and unambitious ecclesiastic. His character in this respect was more particularly noticed after his decease, by a comparison between him and his turbulent successor, Thomas à Becket, who, when the primacy had been vacant for a twelvemonth, was removed, in 1162, from the station of high chancellor to that which his patron Theobald had occupied.

The conduct which Thomas à Becket pursued after his elevation to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, which placed him at the head of the church in England, has been so amply related in our account of the reign of Henry the Second, that it is unnecessary to recapitulate in the present chapter his long and pertinacious contest with his sovereign, on the subject of ecclesiastical exemptions and immunities; his inflexible obstinacy in maintaining the cause of the church against the interposition of the civil power; his intrigues with pope Alexander III. for the diminution of the royal prerogative; his long exile from his see; his outward reconciliation with Henry; his return to England, and his tragical death in 1170. It would likewise be superfluous to re-state the terms of accommodation which Henry concluded with Alexander, in 1172, and which, when compared with those which the sovereign pontiff had exacted from other European princes with whom she had been involved in contention, were far from being severe or oppressive.

During Henry's quarrel with Thomas à Becket and the pope, a party of German heretics made their appearance in England, and attracted the immediate attention of the heads of the church. Their leader was one Gerard, who, when examined before a synod at Oxford, replied that he and his brethren were Christians, and that they believed the apostolic doctrines. It is said, that they rejected baptism, marriage, the eucharist, and the invocation of saints; and being condemned as obstinate heretics by the council, they were ordered by the king, who, on this occasion, gave way to clerical intolerance, to be branded on the forehead, whipped through the streets of Oxford, and turned out into the fields, all persons being prohibited from affording them any relief or protection. It was then the midst of winter; and the sentence being rigorously executed, they perished by cold and famine. This was in the year 1165. It is said, that they succeeded in converting one person (a woman) to their doctrines.

When Henry was inclined to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Thomas à Becket, a dispute arose between the monks of Christ Church, Canterbury, and the suffragans of the province, the former being eager to have the sole and unbiassed election of the new primate. The king recommended the bishop of Bayeux, as a proper person to sit in the archiepiscopal chair; but the monks rejected him. After some consultation they agreed to compromise the affair by nominating three ecclesiastics, one of whom should be chosen by the king and the suffragans. Roger, abbot of Bec, in Normandy, was fixed on in 1173; but, either from an unaspiring temper, or from a dread of the sufferings of his predecessor, he obstinately refused the dignity to which he had been elected. Two persons were then proposed by the monks and the bishops, namely, Odo, prior of Canterbury, and Richard, prior of Dover. The latter was the object of royal appointment; but, before he received consecration, Henry's son, the young king, protested against the election, as it had not been honoured with his consent. This opposition produced an appeal to the pope, who, after various hearings, confirmed the nomination of Richard, consecrated him archbishop, and invested him with the legatine authority, in 1174.

With the consent, and in the presence of the two kings, Richard held a council at Westminster for the regulation of the affairs of the church, May 18, 1175. In this assembly a new law was enacted for the enforcement of celibacy among the clergy. By other canons, they were forbidden to wear long hair, to demand any fees for baptism, extreme unction, or other sacraments, to frequent houses of public entertainment, to execute civil or military offices, &c.

The old disputes between the archbishops of Canterbury and York were not yet effectually composed. Roger, the occupant of the latter see, had declined appearance in the late synod; but had sent some of his clergy to it, to claim the right of carrying his cross erect within the province of Canterbury, and to demand that the bishops of Lincoln, Chester, Worcester, and Hereford, should be considered as his suffragans. These claims were rejected by the council, and Roger's agents gave notice of an appeal to the sovereign pontiff on the subject. Other differences subsisting between the two archbishops, Henry requested the pope to send a legate for the decision of the controversy. Cardinal Huguezun was accordingly dispatched to England by the pope in 1176, who prevailed on Richard to give up some inferior points of difference; and it was agreed that a truce should take place between him and his rival for five years. This suspension of clerical hostility, however, was not long observed; for in the lent following Huguezun summoned an assembly of the clergy at Westminster; and when the cardinal had taken his seat, a contest arose between the two metropolitans for the honour of sitting at the right hand of the legate, which Richard claimed as the established privilege of his see, while Roger affirmed that it was due to him by reason of his priority of consecration. Roger having first entered, possessed himself of the envied seat, which Richard so resented, that the monks and retainers of Canterbury, pulled Roger from the seat, threw him on the ground, trampled on him, and so cruelly beat him, that he was taken up half dead; and it was with difficulty he escaped with his life. The cardinal was so hurt at this scene of violence, that he precipitately left the chapel; and the assembly broke up without doing any business. The archbishop of Canterbury was obliged to pay a large sum of money to the cardinal, to suppress all complaints that might be preferred against him for this enormous outrage (b).

Cardinal Huguezun, with the king's permission, made a progress through many parts of the kingdom, to visit the opulent churches and abbeys. "As his business," says Gervase of Canterbury, "was to root out and to plant, he performed it with great diligence and assiduity, by rooting out money from the purses of others, and planting it in his own coffers."

Archbishop Richard differed widely from his predecessor, Thomas à Becket, with respect to the propriety of exempting clerical offenders from the civil judicature, to which, he thought, all criminals ought to be subject. He warmly inveighed against the practice of suffering the murderers of clergymen to escape with no other punishment than that of excommunication. Henry remedied this complaint by enacting a law, purporting that all who murdered ecclesiastics should be tried in his court, and suffer the punishment, annexed to the murder of laymen. But while the king thus endeavoured to deter the licentious public from the murder of the clergy, he did not act with consistency in giving up (as he did about this time) that article of the Constitutions of Clarendon which rendered all ecclesiastics amenable to a civil tribunal for murder, theft, and other crimes not included under the denomination of spiritual offences.

Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, died on the 16th of February, 1184, and was succeeded, after the usual opposition, by Baldwin, bishop of Worcester. Soon after the election of the new primate, in the year 1185, Heraclius, patriarch of Jerusalem, arrived in England with the grand master of the knights hospitallers, to solicit the aid of Henry for the Christians of the East. Baldwin was a warm friend to this service; but his sovereign, having consulted the states of the realm, was dissuaded from engaging in an enterprize with which he had so little concern. Some time afterwards the archbishop of Tyre came from the Holy Land with fresh intelligence of the distressful predicament to which the kingdom of Jerusalem had been reduced by the arms of Saladin, who had taken the capital of that declining monarchy. From this prelate Henry and the king of France, and many of their respective nobles, received the cross; and archbishop Baldwin, being seized with the epidemic frenzy of the age, likewise assumed the cross. Having spent about three years in preaching up the crusade in Wales and other parts of Britain, he embarked at Dover for Palestine, in the month of March, 1191, joined Richard Cœur de Lion at Acre, and died in November following before that place, which was then besieged by the Christians.

William de Longchamp, bishop of Ely, who acted as regent in the absence of Richard I. procured from pope Clement the commission of legate, and held two councils in that capacity; but these synods were attended with nothing remarkable. This prelate tyrannized over the church as well as over the state; and his expulsion from the kingdom was amply merited by his insolent deportment and arbitrary administration.

Walter, archbishop of Roüen, who had the principal share in the government after the ejection of Longchamp, aspired to the see of Canterbury after the death of Baldwin; but towards the close of the year 1192, the monks of Canterbury chose Reginald, bishop of Bath and Wells to succeed to the vacant see. Reginald, however, dying within a month after his election, and the whole kingdom being thrown into confusion on account of the captivity of Richard, their sovereign, no steps were taken for some time to fill the vacant see. Richard conceiving that the appointment of a zealous friend to that important station might greatly contribute to raise the money requisite for his ransom, wrote to his mother, queen Eleanor, and to his ministers, earnestly entreating them to procure the advancement of Hubert Fitz-Walter, bishop of Salisbury, (who had accompanied him in his expedition to Palestine,) to the primacy; and the affair was accordingly conducted with that address, that Hubert was unanimously elected by the monks of Canterbury, on the 20th of May, 1193, and as unanimously approved by the bishops of the province on the subsequent day. In the second year of his archiepiscopate, 1195, Hubert received a legatine commission from pope Celestine III. and by virtue of his new character he held a synod at York for regulating the affairs of that province. The person who then filled that see was Geoffrey (the illegitimate son of Henry II.) who had shewn himself a spirited opposer to the arbitrary interposition of the court of Rome in the concerns of the English church. By this conduct he had involved himself in quarrels both with the pope and with his own clergy; and the old rivalry between the metropolitan sees, as well as a personal animosity between Hubert and Geoffrey, rendered the former desirous of displaying his authority over the church of York on the present occasion. The consequence was, that Geoffrey was shortly after suspended from his functions by the pope; but Hubert did not long retain the favour of his holiness.

The king, as well as the bishops of the province of Canterbury, had long been exasperated at the conduct of the monks of that cathedral, in claiming an exclusive right to the election of the archbishops. To effect a diminution of that influence, Baldwin, the late primate, had attempted to establish a society of Secular Canons at Hackington, near Canterbury: and though, by the interposition of the pope, he had been prevented from accomplishing his scheme; his successor, Hubert, formed the design of establishing a similar society at Lambeth, hoping that its distance from Canterbury would prevent any opposition. But it was impossible to elude the vigilant suspicion of the crafty monks; who resisting all the offers of the king and primate, dispatched two of their body to Rome, where they obtained a bull from pope Innocent the Third, dated the 25th of April, 1197, and addressed to the archbishop of Canterbury, commanding that prelate, in the most imperious manner, to demolish all the buildings he had erected at Lambeth within thirty days, under the penalty of suspension: "For it is not fit," said that insolent pontiff, "that any man should enjoy the smallest portion of authority, who doth not revere and obey the apostolic see." The king, justly incensed at this application to the pope, which was made without his knowledge, seized all the treasures and possessions of the monks; and the primate dispatched agents to Rome, to operate a change in the sentiments of his holiness. But all their resistance proved fruitless; for the pontiff obstinately persisted in his design, and issued another bull, in which he threatened the archbishop with excommunication, and peremptorily commanded the king to restore what he had taken from the monks; adding, "That he would not endure the smallest contempt of himself, or of God, whose place he held on earth; but would punish without delay, and without respect of persons, every one who should presume to disobey his commands, in order to convince the world that he was determined to act in a royal manner." Such was the intolerable arrogance and impiety of this audacious priest; who, by his pertinacity, enabled the factious monks to obtain a compleat victory over the king and primate, by procuring the demolition of the buildings which formed the subject of their complaints.

Since the pope could conduct himself in so imperious a manner towards the lion-hearted Richard, it is not wonderful that he should display his insolence in a still greater degree to his pusillanimous successor, John. He gave an early indication of his design to exert his authority over him at the very commencement of his reign, by bestowing the revenues of the vacant see of St. David's, which were the undoubted property of the king, on the famous Giraldus Cambrensis. This unwarrantable invasion of the rights of the crown was the more insulting, as Giraldus was the inveterate and avowed enemy of the king; a circumstance well known to the pope.

All the misfortunes that had befallen the Christians in the Holy Land were insufficient to deter the sovereign pontiff from promoting another crusade. He accordingly issued a bull, towards the conclusion of the year 1199, addressed to all the prelates of the Christian church, commanding them and all their clergy, by the authority of the Apostolic See, of Almighty God, and of the Holy Ghost, and under the penalty of eternal damnation, to pay the fortieth part of all their revenues, for defraying the expences of this expedition, which was to be commanded by two cardinals, named by the pope (c). The money thus peremptorily demanded was speedily raised, and carried to Rome; and the king, far from resenting an insult sufficient to provoke meekness itself to resentment, voluntarily granted the fortieth part of his own revenues to the pope, and exhorted the barons to follow his example. Innocent having, by these means, accumulated a sufficient sum, dispatched emissaries into the different kingdoms of Europe, to exhort the laity to assume the cross; but, when he had collected a powerful army, instead of employing it to rescue the Holy Land from the hands of the Infidels, he sent it to dethrone the Christian emperor of Constantinople, in order to reduce that empire to a state of subjection to the see of Rome.

In the second year of the reign of king John, (1200,) Hubert held a general assembly of the clergy at Westminster. The canons then enacted by him were chiefly borrowed from the decrees of the Romish councils, and contained nothing very important. On the death of this prelate, 1205, who had ably discharged the different characters of a warrior, a statesman, and an ecclesiastic, a warm contest arose between the monks and the suffragans of Canterbury, in consequence of the clandestine appointment of a successor by the former. This dispute, in which John was also concerned, involved that prince in a rupture with Innocent; the most remarkable circumstances of which we have related in our account of the reign of that monarch, who, though he at first opposed the pontiff with spirit, finally submitted to the ignominious conditions of tributary vassalage imposed on him by the haughty Innocent in 1213.

Cardinal Langton, whom the pope had compelled John to receive as archbishop of Canterbury, was not distinguished by that obsequiousness to the court of Rome which might have been expected from the manner of his promotion, and from his former connexions with that court. The bishop of Tusculum, having been sent into England as legate after John's degrading reconciliation with Innocent, excited, by his arbitrary and partial proceedings, the clamours of Langton, who appealed to the pope

(c) This was the first attempt to impose a tax on the clergy of all nations by the authority of the pope, as sovereign of the church, which ought to have excited the most universal indignation; but superstition was too prevalent in these unhappy times to admit of resistance to papal usurpations, however daring and violent.

against his representative; but the negociations of the primate's agents had not the desired effect. When the barons concerted an insurrection against their sovereign, Langton was one of the heads of the confederacy, though he was conscious that such a scheme was repugnant to the wishes of his spiritual father, to whom John was now a subservient vassal. For his concurrence in designs of the insurgents, he was suspended by the pope from his archiepiscopal dignity in 1215.

The pope, having established his superiority over the kingdom of England through the imbecility of its monarch, had now attained the acme of his power; and, in order to display his own greatness in all the pomp of priestly ostentation, he assembled a general council in the church of St. Saviour de Lateran, at Rome, in the month of November, 1215; which was attended by no less than four hundred and twelve bishops, besides an incredible number of abbots, priors, and inferior clergy. The seventy canons enacted in this council had been previously prepared, and passed without any deliberation or debate: it was not, therefore, to discuss them that the council was convened, but merely to gratify the vanity of Innocent. In the Confession of Faith contained in the first of these canons, the new doctrine of transubstantiation is inserted, in the following strong terms: "The body and blood of Christ are contained really in the sacrament of the altar under the species of bread and wine; the bread being transubstantiated into the body of Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood, by the power of God." For this miracle of miracles the following curious reason is assigned: "That we might receive of Christ's nature what he had received of ours!" The third canon commands kings and princes to extirpate all heretics that should be found in their territories, under the penalty of excommunication and deposition; which gave rise to scenes of cruelty and bloodshed, as disgraceful to the tyrant who commanded them as they were repugnant to the mild and beneficent spirit of the Christian religion (d).

The ecclesiastical history of this period chiefly consists of the disputes between the crown of England and the popes; who, after the resignation of John, ever treated this country as a conquered province, which they had a right to impoverish at their pleasure. The extortions of the sovereign pontiff during the reign of Henry III. with the wonderful increase of Italian clergy in England, we have already noticed in our history of the reign of that monarch, whose barons, by a spirited exertion of their power, procured a temporary relief from an evil which their sovereign had not the resolution to eradicate. But, unfortunately for the nation, the imbecility of Henry continued to encourage the papal encroachments, which all the efforts of the English prelates were inadequate to repress.

We have before mentioned that Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, was suspended by the pope from his archiepiscopal function; but he recovered his rank and authority under the reign of Henry III. and as he had been engaged at Rome on the accession of that prince, he procured the second coronation of that monarch, in 1220, that he might officiate in this established prerogative of his see. He held a synod at Oxford in 1222, the sixth year of Henry's reign: on which occasion canons were enacted against the adduction of false testimony, the non-residence of incumbents, the practice of simony, &c. (e).

When the primacy was vacated in 1228, by the death of Langton, who was a person of some literary reputation, fresh disputes arose with regard to the choice of a successor. The monks elected Walter de Hemesham; but the king, as well as the bishops of the province, opposed the appointment. An appeal being made to pope Gregory IX. Walter's election was annulled; and Richard le Grand, chancellor of Lincoln, was appointed to the archbishopric, which he did not long enjoy. Three different elections were made on his death in 1231, by the monks, and successively invalidated by the pope, who prevailed on them in 1233, to concur in the choice of Edmund Rich, treasurer of the church of Salisbury.

The reign of Henry the Third was fertile in papal encroachments. The pontiffs took advantage of that prince's weakness to procure the chief ecclesiastical dignities of England for persons of their own choice, to the prejudice of the rights of the crown; and frequently invaded the privileges of private patrons by compelling them to admit Italian clergymen to their benefices. These usurpations at length produced an association against the foreign intruders, who were insulted and plundered by the enraged natives. As the circumstances attending these transactions have been already mentioned (f), there is no occasion to repeat them.

In the Collection of English Councils (g), some canons are ascribed to Edmund Rich; and while he filled the chair of Canterbury, Otho, a cardinal legate, held a council in St. Paul's church, London, in which twenty-nine canons were enacted. Of these, the eleventh prohibited the invasion of benefices; for it was not unusual, in those unsettled times, for persons to intrude into a benefice, in the absence of the incumbent, by false pretences of his death or of his abdication; while others obtained preferments by forcibly taking possession of them. The fifteenth decreed the deprivation of married clergymen. The twentieth ordained, that archdeacons, in their visitations, should particularly avoid extortion. The twenty-third, and all the following ones, related to the due administration of justice in the spiritual courts.

When the death of Edmund was notified to Henry, he resolved to promote Boniface of Savoy, his queen's uncle, to the primacy of England. Some difficulties, however, occurred to obstruct his desire of serving this foreign favourite; but these at last gave way to his promises and threats; and Boniface was elevated to the metropolitan dignity.

The pope continuing to send legates to plunder the English clergy, and usurp the rights of patronage in behalf of Italian ecclesiastics, a general clamour pervaded the nation. The laity joined the clerical orders in expressing their detestation of the unjustifiable conduct of the court of Rome; and a remonstrance was dispatched to his holiness in 1245, in the name of the states of the realm, enumerating the grievances to which they were subjected by his flagrant encroachments on the rights of their church, and his systematic series of exactions, and threatening him with their determined resolution to oppose his future acts of injustice and oppression. The pope, Innocent IV. seemed to be alarmed at this specimen of English spirit, and tortured with shame and vexation at the bold harangues of some of the envoys who presented the memorial. But these emotions were transient, and had no effect towards the reformation of his behaviour; for, though he soon after published a bull in favour of the rights of patrons, he was not so conscientious as to scruple the violation of that instrument by the clause of non obstante (h), which was frequently used by pontiffs of little integrity.

The strongest opposition made to the pope was by Robert Gros-teste, bishop of Lincoln (i), a prelate of extensive learning and exemplary piety; who, having received a bull from Innocent the Fourth, containing a clause of non obstante, (so justly reprobated in that age,) and commanding him to bestow a considerable living in his gift on his nephew, who was then an infant; instead of complying with its contents, sent the pope a letter, in which he exposed the injustice and impiety of his commands with the greatest freedom and severity. Speaking of the clause non obstante, he says, "It brings in a deluge of mischief upon Christendom, and gives occasion to a great deal of inconstancy and breach of faith; it even shakes the very foundations of trust and security amongst mankind, and makes language and letters almost insignificant." Then proceeding to the request of bestowing a benefice upon an infant, he says, "Next to the sins of Lucifer and Antichrist, there cannot be a greater defection, or one which carries a more direct opposition to the doctrine of our Saviour and his apostles, than that which destroys people's souls, by depriving them of the benefits of the pastoral office; and yet those persons are guilty of this sin, who undertake the sacerdotal function, and receive the profits without discharging the duty annexed to it. From hence it is evident, that those who bring such unqualified persons into the church, and debauch the hierarchy, are much to blame; and that their crimes rise in proportion to the height of their station." The sovereign pontiff, little accustomed, and less willing to hear the language of truth, burst into the most passionate exclamations on the perusal of this spirited epistle. He swore by his favourite saints, Peter and Paul, that he would utterly confound "that old, impertinent, deaf, doating fellow," and render him a topic of conversation, a subject of astonishment, and a striking example of the whole world. "What!" exclaimed this insolent priest, "is not the king of England, his master, our vassal, or rather our slave? and will he not, at the smallest sign from us, cast him into prison?" But when his holiness had somewhat recovered his senses, the cardinals ventured to remonstrate; they observed to him, "that the world began to discover the truth of many things in the bishop's letter; and that, if he persecuted a prelate so justly renowned for piety, learning, and sanctity of life, it might prove the means of raising up many enemies to the court of Rome." This prudent observation had the desired effect; the pope listened to their advice, and took no farther notice of the letter (k). Innocent, however, soon recovered himself from the consternation into which he had been thrown: and although fresh complaints were made by the nation in the following year, (1246,) he still prosecuted his career of insolence and rapacity. The superstition of the times, the weakness of the king, and the enterprising perseverance of the pontiff, occasioned the continuance of the same practices by which the English had been before oppressed.

(d) The spirit of these canons sufficiently demonstrates the darkness of the times we have been delineating; and affords the strongest proof that the court of Rome had made the most daring and dangerous encroachments on the civil and religious rights of mankind.

(e) Under the government of Langton, some severities were practised against ecclesiastical delinquents; and a deacon, in particular, was committed to the flames for having become a proselyte to the Jewish religion, with a view of marrying a woman of that persuasion.

(h) This clause was so called from the practice of inserting, in a bull, deed, or charter, a declaration importing that the new grants were made non obstante, or any former privilege to the contrary notwithstanding.

Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, was a strenuous advocate for ecclesiastical immunities, as the constitutions enacted under his auspices clearly evince. During his archiepiscopate, cardinal Othobon, legate for Britain and Ireland, held a council in the English metropolis, in April 1268, in which, among other regulations, it was ordained that the laity, in cases of necessity, should be permitted to administer the baptismal rite; that all priests who should exercise secular jurisdiction should be punished with a suspension of their clerical rank and benefice; and that no pluralities should be enjoyed without a papal dispensation (l).

The successor of Boniface in the primacy was Robert Kilwardby, an ecclesiastic belonging to the order of Black Friers; a community which was then in high reputation. The monks of Canterbury had elected another person; but the pope superseded their choice by the appointment of Robert. In the absence of Edward I. in 1272, the guardians of the realm did not oppose the reception of the archbishop thus obtruded by the pontiffs, though they protested against the encroachment, and insisted that it should not serve as a precedent. The monks were greatly displeased at the arbitrary interference of his holiness; and, that their rights might not be forgotten, renewed the forms of an election, which, however, fell on Kilwarby. This prelate was confirmed in the see by Edward, whom he crowned after his return from Palestine in 1274.

In the beginning of the reign of Edward I. the Roman yoke had become so intolerable, that the English, with their vigorous king at their head, began to concert measures for their redemption from the state of abject servitude to which they had been reduced by the machinations of the sovereign pontiffs. The clergy during the reign of Henry III. had claimed an exemption from civil jurisdiction; but Edward took upon him the task of limiting the prerogatives they had assumed, and of rendering them subservient to the civil power. He ordained, that every churchman accused of felony should be tried in his court: he suffered no canons to be enacted that seemed to infringe any of his royal rights: by the Statute of Mortmain he set bounds to their rapacious avarice, which would, in time, have led them to monopolize all the landed estates in the kingdom; and he obliged the reluctant clergy to grant him supplies for the purposes of national expenditure. But, though ecclesiastical encroachments were considerably repressed under the government of that politic prince, the progress of superstition was by no means impeded.

His holiness having presented Kilwardby with a cardinal's hat, and with the valuable bishopric of Oporto, he resigned the see of Canterbury in 1278; and with the monks chose Robert Burnell to fill the vacancy. But the pope rejected this appointment, and preferred John Peckham, a Franciscan frier, to the vacant see. Edward, unwilling at that time to disoblige the court of Rome, acquiesced in Peckham's promotion. This prelate, in a synod at Reading, held in 1279, revived several former canons, and passed some new ones, several of which were so displeasing to the king, that he summoned the archbishop to appear before him in parliament, and give his assent to the abrogation of the noxious articles (m). It is observable, that, among the clauses thus annulled, there was one for affixing a copy of Magna Charta on the doors of churches; a proof how much Edward had the liberties of his people at heart.

In the year 1281, the ninth of Edward I. archbishop Peckham held another council at Lambeth; but, in this meeting, he was cautious of adopting any provisions which might arouse the jealousy of the king. A singular canon, however, was promulgated, relative to the administration of the Eucharist; by which it was decreed that the bells should ring at the elevation of the host; and that all who heard them, even out of the church, should fall down on their knees! It also contains directions to the priests, as to the instructions they should give to the people; one of which is so remarkable as to merit particular notice: "Let priests also be careful, when they give the holy communion at Easter, or any other time, to the simple, diligently to instruct them, that the body and blood of our Lord is given them at once under the species of bread; nay, the very living and true Christ, who is entirely under this species in the sacraments. And let them also instruct them, that what is given them to drink at the same time, is not the sacrament, but mere wine, to be drank for the more easy swallowing of the sacrament which they have just taken (n)."

The primate, who presided at the Lambeth council, having been elected by the pope, was ever strenuous in supporting the ecclesiastical in opposition to the regal power; and, in the year 1281, he wrote an epistle of reproof to his sovereign, complaining of the oppressions which the church suffered under that monarch's sway; but Edward was a prince whom neither his arguments could convince, nor his threats intimidate: he was therefore compelled to turn the force both of his eloquence and his anger on some object who was less capable of resisting them. In the year 1286, he had an opportunity of displaying his talents in the condemnation of various propositions maintained and promulgated by one Richard Knapwell, a Dominican frier, the only heretic that appeared in England during the thirteenth century, (unless the person who became a convert to Judaism, mentioned above, can be called so.) As these propositions shew what were the chief subjects of controversy and disquisition among the divines and philosophers of this period, they may justly be deemed curious; and we shall therefore give them, as specified by Wykes, Knyghton, and Spelman:

"1. That the body of Jesus Christ, when dead, had not the same substantial form as it had when living.

"2. That if the Eucharistical Bread had been consecrated with these words, 'This is my body,' during the three days that Jesus Christ lay in his grave, the bread would have been transubstantiated into the new form which the body of Christ assumed at its separation from the soul.

(k) Had the virtuous bishop of Lincoln been properly supported by his brethren, and countenanced by his sovereign, a salutary restraint might certainly have been imposed on papal exactions; but Henry, at variance with his subjects, supposed it to be his interest, to maintain an unnatural alliance with the pope; from whence his subjects experienced the most cruel oppressions, and were burthened with the most onerous imposts.

(m) Vid. Ryley, Placit. Parliament.

(n) Thus it appears that the famous doctrine of Transubstantiation was raised on such a sandy foundation, that one half of it was already demolished. As they had dared to deprive the water of its miraculous properties, it is a pity that they had not ventured one step farther, and reduced the bread likewise to its primitive state. But, unfortunately, a very different motive to that of reformation influenced the conduct of the council in this particular; these sapient instructions being merely intended to prepare the minds of the unsanctified laics for a regulation afterwards adopted, by which they were totally deprived of the cup when they received the sacrament, and compelled to swallow the bread with such moisture only as their own mouths could afford.

"3. That

"3. That, after the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, the Eucharistical Bread is transubstantiated, by virtue of these words, 'This is my body,' into the whole living body of Christ; that is, the matter of the bread is converted into the matter of his body, and the substantial form of the bread into the substantial form of his body; that is to say, into his intellectual soul, so far as it constitutes the form of his body.

"4. That in man there is only one form, namely, his rational soul, without any other substantial form.

"5. That in articles of faith, a man is not bound to rest on the authority of the pope, or of any priest or doctor; but that the Holy Scriptures, and right reason, are the only foundations of our assent."

It is almost inconceivable, that the same head which engendered the unintelligible nonsense of the four first propositions could give birth to that important truth which is contained in the last! Had not that truth, however, been uttered, the frier might have passed uncensured, nor have incurred the imputation of heresy.

Archbishop Peckham died in the year 1292, with the reputation of a learned divine, a severe exactor of discipline, and a warm advocate for clerical privileges. After an interval of two years, Robert de Winchelsey was elected by the monks of Canterbury to the archiepiscopate in 1294, in which he was confirmed both by the king and the pope. This prelate, however, had very little reason to be contented with his station; for the demands of Edward upon the church—arising from the expensive wars in which he was almost continually engaged—were so frequent, that the king and the clergy were perpetually at variance. In the fifth year of the primate's promotion, Edward, having summoned an assembly of the clergy to meet at Westminster, in the month of September, demanded from them one half of their revenues, both spiritual and temporal. This demand was productive of great dissension; the particulars of which are given above under the reign of Edward the First.

Some new regulations in the doctrines and discipline of the church took place towards the close of the thirteenth century. The chief of these were the alteration which we have noticed in the doctrine of Transubstantiation; a more strict injunction of Auricular Confession; and the introduction of general Excommunications. By these last all who were guilty of certain vices and crimes, though known only to God and themselves, were declared to be excommunicated. Excommunications of this kind were at first confined to such only as injured the clergy, by detaining their tythes, defrauding them of their dues, or stealing any thing which belonged to the church. They were ordered to be published by the priest in every parish with the utmost solemnity, before the whole congregation, in the mother tongue, on Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and All-Hallows day; and, to render them more impressive and terrible to weak minds, they were made to contain the most horrid maledictions which priestly depravity could devise. The following specimen, taken from Wanly's Catalogue, will suffice to shew, that the heart which could dictate, and the tongue which could utter them were equal strangers to the mild and beneficent spirit of true Christianity: "Let them be accursed, eating and drinking, walking and sitting, speaking and holding their peace, waking and sleeping, rowing and tiding, laughing and weeping, in house and in field, on water and on land, in all places. Cursed be their head and their thoughts, their eyes and their ears, their tongues and their lips, their teeth and their throats, their shoulders, and their breasts, their feet and their legs, their thighs and their inwards. Let them remain accursed from the foot to the crown of the head, unless they bethink themselves, and come to satisfaction; and, just as this candle is deprived of its present light, so let them be deprived of their souls in hell."

During this time, the ambition of the popes, which could only be equalled by their avarice, had arisen to such an extraordinary height, as to induce them to claim a superiority, as well in temporal as in spiritual matters, over the whole Christian world; and to regard, not only the kings of England, but all the monarchs of Europe, as their vassals. The bull addressed to Philip the Fair, king of France, by pope Boniface the Eighth, dated the 5th of December, 1301, affords a strong instance of papal humility. It runs thus: "Boniface the Bishop, a servant of the servants of God, to Philip, king of France. Fear God, and keep his commandments. We will you to know, that you are subject to us, both in spirituals and temporals. You have no right to bestow benefices and prebends, &c. We declare them heretics who believe the contrary."

The commencement of the fourteenth century was distinguished by general complaints against the rapacity of the popes, which still continued to increase, and to thrive, as it were, by opposition. At a parliament held at Carlisle in 1307, some laws were enacted to restrain their oppressive proceedings in England; but, being ill executed, they were not productive of any good consequence.

Immediately after the accession of Edward the Second, Robert de Winchelsey, archbishop of Canterbury, was recalled from exile (o); but refusing to dispense with the canons against pluralities and non-residences in favour of royal chaplains and court clergy, he soon incurred the displeasure of his sovereign.

The disputes between the civil and ecclesiastical courts, which had been productive of so many civil commotions, were at this time renewed with additional virulence, every attempt to regulate the boundaries of the different jurisdictions having proved abortive. Many complaints on this subject were laid by the clergy before the king; who, pursuing the advice of his ministers, neglected to give any satisfactory answers, notwithstanding the interference of the pope, who issued a bull, commanding him to redress, without delay, the grievances complained of, in order to save himself and his kingdom from total destruction. The chief subject of complaint in this curious bull seems to be, "That clerks, invested with the sacerdotal character, and shining with the splendour of pontifical dignity, were tried by laymen, condemned and hanged, when found guilty of murder or robbery, to the great provocation of the Supreme King, who hath forbidden the secular power to touch his anointed." Never, surely, were the scriptures so grossly perverted, or applied to the support of a doctrine more replete with infamy and danger!

We have before mentioned the dissolution of the Knights Templars, which took place while Robert de Winchelsey was archbishop of Canterbury. This body of men, so unjustly accused and cruelly tortured in France, experienced a more lenient treatment in England. It is true they lost their possessions, but most of the English templars were distributed among the monastic foundations, the archbishop of York setting the example, in order to provide for their decent maintenance. Archbishop Winchelsey did not long survive the dissolution of the order of Knights Templars. He died on the 11th of May, 1313, about nineteen years after his elevation to the primacy; and as he had been an advocate for public liberty, his memory was long respected by the people. He was celebrated as a man of learning, a liberal rewarder of merit, and a munificent friend to the indigent. For his strenuous assertion of the privileges of the clergy, his character has been variously drawn by writers of opposite parties.

The monks of Christ Church, Canterbury, provided a successor for Winchelsey in the person of Thomas de Cobham, dean of Salisbury, who was distinguished by the appellation of The Good Priest; but the object of their choice was rejected by the pope, who, at the king's desire, promoted Walter Reynolds, bishop of Worcester, to the archiepiscopate. He took possession of his see on the first of October. This prelate appears to have been highly favoured by the sovereign pontiff, Clement the Fifth; since he granted him very unusual and extraordinary powers. By one bull, he authorized him to visit the several dioceses within his province by proxy; by another he empowered him to absolve one hundred persons, who lay under the sentence of excommunication and interdict; and, by others, he enabled him to grant a remission of one hundred days penance to all those who heard him preach or say mass; to bestow holy orders on one hundred illegitimate children; to allow twelve clerks, under age, to enjoy benefices with cure of souls; and to dispense with the canons of the church against pluralities in favour of forty clergymen. The privilege claimed by the pope, in this instance, of not only exercising the power of dispensation himself, but of delegating it to another, affords a sufficient proof that his authority was most dangerously extensive.

In the year 1316, a singular statute, commonly called "Articulus Cleri," was made, for terminating the disputes between the spiritual and temporal courts. As this law was procured by the clergy, at a time when their assistance was much wanted, it was highly favourable to their exorbitant claims of exemption from civil authority. By the last chapter it is enacted, "That when clerks confess before temporal judges their heinous offences, such as theft and murder, they cannot be condemned by those judges upon their own confession, without violating the privilege of the church; and the privilege of the church being demanded in due form by the ordinary, shall not be denied." One of the prelates, who had contributed to the obtaining this statute, had soon occasion to plead it as a protection from that punishment which was due to his crimes. This was Adam de Orleton, bishop of Hereford, a martial and factious prelate, who had joined the rebellious barons, and shared in their defeat at Borough Bridge, in 1321. Being accused of high treason before the House of Peers, he pleaded his privilege as a clerk, to prevent his trial by laymen; and his plea, being supported by the other bishops, was deemed valid. The king, some time after, attempted to bring him to trial for the same crime, in the court of King's Bench; but the three archbishops of Canterbury, York, and Dublin, came into the court with their crosses carried before them, and bore him away in triumph, prohibiting all who were present, "in the name of God, and on pain of excommunication," from laying violent hands on him. Edward, enraged at this instance of clerical presumption, directed the jury to give their verdict; and when they had declared the prelate guilty of the crimes imputed to his charge, he ordered his temporalities to be seized.

Some constitutions have been published under the name of archbishop Reynolds; but they are of little importance. This prelate lived to witness the deposition of his royal benefactor, whom he had served in the offices of chancellor and treasurer. He was a friend to the ambitious designs of queen Isabella, whom he supplied with money after her invasion. He survived, by a few weeks, the murdered Edward, to whom, from a supple courtier, he had become an ungrateful rebel. His death happened on the 15th of November, 1327.

On the death of Walter Reynolds, Simon Mepham, one of the canons of Chichester, was elected to the primacy. In 1328, soon after his consecration, he held a council at London, in which he regulated the observance of certain festivals, menaced all violators of ecclesiastical liberties with the sentence of the greater excommunication, and subjected to the same censure all persons who obstructed the collection of tythes. One of the canons of this synod was calculated for the benefit of prædial slaves, or such as were annexed to the lands of their lords. Though these were allowed to have some property, their masters would not allow them to dispose of it by will; but the council now ordained, that all who should hinder the execution of the testaments of these individuals should be excommunicated (p).

Archbishop Mepham was involved in a long contest with the monks of St. Augustine, at Canterbury, who refused to submit to his authority, because the sovereign pontiff, they alleged, had exempted them from his jurisdiction. While the dispute continued, some of the primate's servants wounded two of the monks, and assaulted a notary, who had summoned him to appear before a papal commissioner. Mepham was obliged to make a humble apology for the conduct of his domestics, and to discharge them from his service. The commissioner afterwards decided the contest in favour of the monastery, and condemned the archbishop in heavy costs.

Mepham had another violent dispute in the course of his primacy. Attempting a visitation of the diocese of Exeter, he was met by John Grandison, bishop of that see, who had assembled a body of armed men to oppose the exertion of metropolitan authority. He did not long survive this incident, for he died at Magfield, in October, 1333, in the sixth year of his archiepiscopate.

The metropolitan see being now vacant, John Stratford was, by the interest of Edward III. at the court of Rome, translated from the see of Winchester to the archiepiscopacy. The new primate was high in favour with his sovereign, to whom he was for some time chancellor. Being of a more intrepid spirit than his predecessor, he humbled the monks of St. Augustine into a dereliction of the sentence which had lately been pronounced in their favour.

The particulars of the obstinate contest between this prelate and his sovereign we have already related in the history of the reign of Edward III. After the reconciliation between them, Stratford was more careful to conduct himself in a manner consistent with the character he had to support. In the year 1342, he published at Lambeth, certain Statutes and Constitutions for regulating the proceedings in the Archbishop's Court, commonly called The Court of Arches, from the place in which it was held. He also held several synods for the reformation of abuses. In 1342 he held two provincial councils at London, in which several canons were enacted, among which were the following, viz. one for checking the corruption and extortions of ecclesiastical officers; another for repressing luxury and extravagance; others prohibiting the seizure of oblations by laymen; another against the admission of any persons except relations to the nocturnal watchings over a corpse, (which, says the archbishop had become scenes of adultery, fornication, theft, and other misdeeds;) another against the contraction of clandestine marriages, &c.

During the primacy of Stratford, the pope continued his encroachments on the rights of the crown, particularly in the articles of reservations and provisions; by the former of which he reserved to himself the next presentation to any benefice he chose to fix on; and by the latter, he secured the reversion of a living to whomsoever he pleased to nominate. These abuses induced Edward to send a very pointed remonstrance to his holiness, pope Clement the Sixth; in which he observed, "That, by these provisions and reservations, all incitements to religious exertion were bestowed on unqualified and mercenary foreigners, who neither resided in the country, nor understood its language; by which means the ends of the priesthood were frustrated; his own subjects were discouraged from the prosecution of their studies; the treasures of the kingdom were carried off by strangers; the jurisdiction of its courts rendered useless by constant appeals to a foreign power; and both the crown and private patrons were deprived of their most unquestionable rights." "These mischiefs," added the king, "are now become intolerable; and our subjects in parliament have requested us to put a stop to them by some speedy and effectual remedy." This just and spirited remonstrance had no effect on his holiness, whom the dictates of interest rendered deaf to the demands of equity: so rooted was the arrogance of "the servant of servants of God," as the pontiffs usually stiled themselves. Edward was at this time so busily occupied in the prosecution of his continental wars, that he neglected to pay much attention to the religious state of his dominions; so that the matter by degrees lost its efficacy, and the people of England still continued to be tyrannized over by the pope.

John Stratford filled the archiepiscopal chair nearly fifteen years. He was a man of some talents, a good politician, and not inattentive to the interests of the church. On his decease, in August, 1348, the same dispute, which had frequently occurred on the death of the archbishop, was now renewed; and one of the worst consequences which resulted from these spiritual dissensions, was an augmentation of the power of the court of Rome, occasioned by the appeals made to the pope by the contending parties. On the decease of Stratford, the monks of Christ Church, Canterbury, supplied the vacancy with Thomas Bradwardin, the king's confessor. The king, however, intended the primacy for another, and therefore made immediate application to the pope, by which mean he counteracted his own efforts, and gave strength and plausibility to those claims which he had before evinced an anxiety to invalidate. He now requested his holiness to promote John Ufford, dean of Lincoln, to the see of Canterbury; and the pope was too well pleased with the application not to comply with his request: Ufford was accordingly nominated, but died before his consecration, on the 7th of June, 1349.

About this time a most dreadful pestilence raged in England, which proved so particularly destructive to the clergy, that in many churches, not a priest could be found to officiate. "Before this plague," says Knyghton, ton, "you might have hired a curate for four or five marks a year, or for two marks and his board; but after it, you could scarcely find a clergyman who would accept a vicarage of twenty marks, or twenty pounds a year."

Upon the death of Ufford, the king withdrew his opposition to the promotion of his confessor, Thomas Bradwardin, who was again chosen primate by the canons of Christ Church, and the pope acquiesced in their choice. He was accordingly consecrated at Avignon, where the pope then resided; but he did not long enjoy his elevated station, for he died at Lambeth on the 26th of August, 1349, only seven days after his return to England.

The successor of Bradwardin was Simon Islip, keeper of the privy seal, who proved a most rigid disciplinarian in all affairs of the church. Even in his first visitation of his province, he deprived several ecclesiastics of their preferments for the irregularity of their lives. The king and the temporal peers having complained, that the clerical magistrates neglected the due enforcement of the laws on delinquents of their own order, Islip published a constitution in 1351, purporting that all clerks who had been delivered up by the civil power to their ordinaries, and sentenced by them to perpetual confinement, should be kept under very strict regulations, and should undergo a course of abstinent mortification. During the primacy of Simon Islip, the second statute of provisors was passed, as an additional check to papal encroachments; by which it was enacted, "That if any person shall procure reservations or provisions from the pope in disturbance of free elections, or of the presentees of the king, or other patrons; that the said provisors, their procurators, and notaries, shall be apprehended and brought to answer; and, in case they are convicted, they shall be kept in prison till they have made fine and ransom to the king, at his will, and have satisfied the party aggrieved, by paying his damages." But this was not the only subject of complaint which the English had at this time against the court of Rome: the frequency of appeals to his holiness was, if possible, a grievance of a more alarming nature, and attended with greater vexation and expence. As a remedy for this evil, a statute was formed, by which it was enacted, "That all people of the king's legiance, who shall draw out of the realm in a plea, whereof the cognizance pertains to the king's court, shall have two months warning (q) given them to appear in the king's courts to answer the contempt; and if, they do not appear in their proper persons to be at the law within the time appointed, they, their procurators, &c. shall, from that day forth, be put out of the king's protection; and their lands, goods, and chattels, shall be forfeited to the king; and their bodies imprisoned, and ransomed at the king's will." But these statutes, like others which had been enacted against the court of Rome, proved inadequate to remedy the evils they were intended to restrain; which continued to increase, till the connection between England and his holiness was happily dissolved.

A second pestilence which raged in the kingdom in the year 1360, proved as destructive to the clergy as the former one; and in that year no less than seven bishoprics became vacant, which, notwithstanding the statute of provisors, were all filled by papal provisions. No other transaction of importance occurred during the primacy of Islip, who died on the 16th of April, 1366.

On the death of Islip, the pope, as if determined to shew his contempt of those laws which had been made to restrain the illegal and arbitrary exertion of his power, resolved to appoint his successor; and though the chapter of Canterbury had elected William Edyndon, bishop of Winchester, he granted a provision to the archiepiscopacy to Simon Langham, bishop of Ely, and chancellor of England, who was received without the smallest opposition, the king also confirming his nomination. But Langham did not derive much comfort from his promotion; for, having been imprudent enough to accept, without the king's permission, the dignity of a cardinal, conferred on him by the pope, Edward, incensed at his presumption, seized the temporalities of his see, which affected him so deeply, that he resigned his archbishopric in 1368, and retired to the papal court of Avignon.

Upon the resignation of Langham, William Wittlesey, bishop of London, was translated to the see of Canterbury, by a papal provision. About this time almost all the great places in the kingdom, either of honour or emolument, being possessed by the clergy; a petition was presented by the parliament, in the year 1371, setting forth, "That the government of the kingdom had for a long time been managed by men of the church, whereby many mischiefs and damages had happened in time heretofore, to the disherison of the crown, and to the great prejudice of the kingdom:" for which reason they prayed, "That it would therefore please the king, that laymen, and no others, might, for the future, be made chancellor, treasurer, clerk of the privy seal, barons of the Exchequer, comptroller, or other great officers and governors of the kingdom." But the king, deeming this an improper interference with his royal prerogative, returned for answer, "He would do in this point what seemed best to him by advice of the council."

The pope still continued to exercise his usurped right of appointing foreigners to the best livings in the kingdom. The king, in order to ascertain the extent of a grievance which occasioned such just and general complaint, issued writs to all the bishops, in the year 1374, requiring them to return certificates into Chancery of all the benefices in their respective dioceses which were in the possession of foreigners. During this investigation William Wittlesey, the primate died, about six years after he was chosen to fill the archiepiscopal chair, and the monks re-elected Cardinal Langham; but the king would not suffer him to accept the appointment, and prevailed on the pope to agree to the choice of Simon Sudbury, bishop of London, who was accordingly invested with the primacy in 1375.

In 1376, the Commons, in consequence of the information they had received from the bishops, presented a remonstrance to the king against the intolerable extortions of the court of Rome; in which they affirmed—though the assertion almost exceeds credibility—"That the taxes paid to the pope yearly, out of England, amounted to five times as much as the taxes paid to the king."

The universal disgust created by the tyrannical exactions of the pontiffs gave rise to a bold and spirited attack, not only on the authority of the court, but on the doctrines of the church of Rome. This attack was conducted by John Wickliffe, a secular priest, equally renowned for his piety and for his learning. He endeavoured to dispel the clouds of prejudice and error from the religious horizon, and to expose the absurdity of those opinions which had originated in superstition, and had been fostered by artful policy on the part of the clergy, and supine ignorance on that of the laity. Wickliffe's numerous good qualities having recommended him to the notice of archbishop Islip, he was appointed, in 1365, to be warden of Canterbury College, Oxford. During his residence in that university, the lectures which he read on divinity attracted universal admiration, though they contained some severe censures on the clergy in general, and particularly on the Mendicant Friers. A discourse which he published against the pope's demand of homage and tribute from Edward the Third, procured him the favour of that monarch, who not only conferred on him several valuable livings, but employed him in various embassies; in one of which—to Rome, in 1374—he discovered so many of the corruptions of that court, and of the errors of the Romish church, that, convinced by ocular demonstration of the justice of his opinions, his strictures became more severe, and were delivered with less reserve.

It has been supposed by some writers, that the real sentiments of this spirited Reformer could hardly be developed, since the fear of martyrdom seems to have impelled him to make some partial recantations, and since many tenets were ascribed to him by his enemies which he certainly never entertained: but his doctrines being chiefly derived from the Scriptures, and from a studious attention to the practice of the primitive Christians, appear to have been nearly the same with those which were more successfully propagated by the celebrated Reformers of the sixteenth century. The austerity of his manners, and the purity of his life, obtained him many disciples of all ranks and stations, who were distinguished by the appellation of Wickliffites, or Lollards; but his denial of the pope's supremacy, and his exposure of that prelate's tyrannical conduct, excited the indignation of his holiness, who issued a bull for his apprehension in 1377, and for examining into the scope of his opinions, which he emphatically termed damnable heresies. Wickliffe, however, had by this time acquired acquired protectors of sufficient consequence to screen him from the effects of ecclesiastical persecution. The duke of Lancaster, who then governed the kingdom, not only favoured his principles, but did not hesitate, when he went to the primate, and Courteney, bishop of London, who had been appointed by the pope to be his judges, to appear openly in court with him, accompanied by Henry Lord Percy, mareschal of England, in order to countenance him on his trial. The duke of Lancaster insisted that Wickliffe should be seated in the presence of his judges; but this being opposed by Courteney, a violent altercation arose between the duke and the bishop, which occasioned so great a tumult in the court, that it broke up without proceeding to business. Wickliffe again appeared before the papal commissioners at Lambeth; but the two prelates, perceiving that he was attended by a vast concourse of the citizens of London, were afraid to pronounce sentence against him, and contented themselves with prohibiting him from the further propagation of such dogmas as were repugnant to the established tenets of the church of Rome; and their commission soon after terminated by the death of the pope, which happened in March, 1378.

The prosecution against Wickliffe was now suspended for some time, by the schism in the papacy which succeeded the death of Gregory the Eleventh, and by the insurrection of the commons in England under Wat Tyler, which involved the kingdom in confusion. But no sooner had these commotions—(during which Simon Sudbury, the primate, had fallen a victim to the rage of the populace, who beheaded him; and William Courteney, bishop of London, had been translated to the see of Canterbury by a bull of pope Urban the Sixth, in 1381;)—subsided, than the new primate applied himself with great zeal to suppress the heretical opinions of the Lollards (r), or Wickliffites. For this purpose he convoked a synod of his suffragans, to meet in the priory of the Preaching Friers at London, on the 17th of May, 1382, which he reinforced by many doctors of divinity and law. To this assembly he submitted for their examination twenty-four positions, extracted from the writings of Wickliffe; when ten of these opinions were unamously pronounced to be heretical, and fourteen of them founded in error. Several of Wickliffe's most conspicuous disciples were then summoned to appear before the council, and commanded to declare their opinion of his doctrines; and, their answers appearing evasive and unsatisfactory, they were declared to stand convicted of heresy.

In order to give additional weight to the decrees of this council, the clergy prevailed upon the king (Richard the Second) to issue a proclamation, on the 12th of July, authorizing and commanding the bishops to seize and imprison all persons who were suspected of favouring any of those doctrines which they had recently condemned. But where authority is made to supply the place of argument, and force is employed where reason alone should be exerted, the consciousness of a bad cause is evidently betrayed; and its success in general proves adequate to its deserts. Thus it was with Wickliffe; whose followers, acquiring fresh strength from opposition, daily increased in numbers and in consequence: insomuch that the king revoked the order for their imprisonment at the solicitation of the commons. The virtuous reformer himself retired from the scene of action to his living at Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, where he passed the two last years of his life in translating the Bible, and in other works of piety. On the 28th of December, 1384, he was seized with a paralytic affection, which deprived him of his speech, and he died on the last day of that year.

It is a matter of compleat astonishment, if we consider the character of the age in which he lived, that a person so odious to the principal clergy as John Wickliffe, should have been permitted to descend to his grave in peace; but although capital severities were not exercised against the Lollards in the reign of Richard the Second; yet in the reign of his successor, Henry the Fourth, they experienced the most horrid persecutions and the most violent deaths.

After the death of Wickliffe, the clergy (who had persecuted him during his life with the most inveterate malice) displayed the most indecent and unchristian-like joy at his demise, which they attributed to the immediate vengeance of Heaven. "On the day of St. Thomas the Martyr, archbishop of Canterbury," says Walsingham, a contemporary writer, "that limb of the devil, enemy of the church, seducer of the people, idol of heretics, mirror of hypocrites, author of schism, propagator of hatred, and fabricator of falsehood, John Wickliffe, was, by the immediate judgement of God, suddenly stricken with a palsy, which seized all the members of his body, when he was ready, as they say, to vomit forth his blasphemies against the blessed St. Thomas, in a sermon which he had prepared to preach that day (s)."

The joy, however, occasioned by the death of Wickliffe, was not of long duration; for the clergy soon found that his doctrines had outlived their founder, and continued, after his decease, to be propagated with great zeal and success. Knyghton, a contemporary historian, affirms that the New Doctrines, as they were called, were received, with such avidity, that "more than one half of the people of England, in a few years, became Lollards:" The same writer, who was himself an ecclesiastic, and consequently an inveterate enemy to the reformers, acknowledges that Wickliffe excelled the most learned men of the age in religious disputation; and that some of his disciples, in a short time, acquired great reputation for the same powers, and for their eloquence in preaching, which he wisely ascribes to the assistance of the devil; who, he says, took possession of them as soon as they became Lollards.

This rapid success roused the indignation of the clergy, who had once more recourse to their powerful instrument—persecution. They had sufficient art and influence to obtain a statute, in a surreptitious manner, which had the formality of an enrolment, without the previous consent of the Commons, (though this glaring defect has not caused it to be expunged from our Statute Book, where it still remains,) by which the sheriffs were summoned to seize and imprison all preachers of heresy, and their abettors. They also prevailed on the king, in the year 1387, to grant a commission to certain persons to seize all the books and manuscripts of Wickliffe, and other writers whom they called heretical; and to imprison all who transcribed, sold, bought, or concealed, such books or manuscripts. But Knyghton observes, with infinite regret, "that these laws and edicts were but slowly and faintly executed, because the time of correction was not yet come."

Notwithstanding all the efforts of the votaries of the papal church, the opinions of Wickliffe were openly maintained, by his numerous converts; though his writings were burned wherever they could be found, many copies escaped destruction; and though his doctrines were condemned by successive councils, they flourished in the midst of opposition. Though some of his followers purchased the forgiveness of the church by recantation or by a promise of silence, others persisted in the dissemination of what they conceived to be the dictates of religious truth. In the mean time the English parliament continued to check the clergy, and the court of Rome, by expedients more suitable to their wisdom and consequence. When a clerk had been inducted to a living by the bishop of the diocese, in consequence of a sentence in his favour by the king's court, it was usual for the pope, when appealed to by the party who conceived himself prejudiced by the sentence, to excommunicate the bishop; and when an English bishop had by any means incurred the displeasure of his holiness, he (r) Whence the appellation of Lollard arose, is a matter of doubt. It has been supposed that it arose from the words of pope Gregory XI. who, in one of his bulls against Wickliffe, censures the clergy for suffering lolium, or darnel, to spring up among the wheat, and urges them to aim at the extirpation of this lolium. This, however, has the appearance of a forced etymology; and we may more reasonably adopt the opinion of those who affirm that the Wickliffites derived the name of Lollards from their resemblance to a sect which appeared in Germany about the beginning of the fourteenth century, whose leader is said to have been one Walter Lollard.

(s) This passage, which is taken from Walsingham, p. 312, may serve to shew the extreme virulence of the clergy of the church of Rome, falsely called orthodox ministers, against the man who dared to expose the wickedness and villainy of the sovereign pontiffs, and the doctrines they promulgated. The merits of the man, who could extort such virulent abuse even from prejudice itself, must have been great indeed; and in a more enlightened and liberal age, would doubtless have experienced that commendation which it so eminently deserved.

frequently

frequently translated him to a foreign see, by way of punishment, without his own consent, or even that of the king. To prevent a repetition of these flagrant abuses, in a parliament held at Winchester, in the year 1392, a law was enacted, which inflicted a very severe punishment on such persons as should solicit or bring into the kingdom any papal bulls of excommunication, translation, or, in short, any bulls or other instruments which should tend to detract from the rights and dignities of the crown. In the following year, (1393,) the Commons prayed "that remedy might be had against such religious persons as cause their villans to marry free women inheritable, whereby the estate comes to those religious hands by collusion." This petition was designed to prevent the consequences of a new device invented by the clergy for the purpose of eluding the Statute of Mortmain.

These contests between the Commons and the clergy encouraged the Lollards to act with more boldness than they had hitherto ventured to assume, by making a direct attack on the Established Church. During the king's absence in Ireland, in the year 1394, they presented to a parliament, assembled by the duke of York at Westminster, a remonstrance, containing twelve articles of complaint against the church and clergy, praying for redress and reformation. The chief subjects of complaint were: The exorbitant power, excessive wealth, and profligate lives of the clergy, which last they ascribed chiefly to their vows of celibacy: Transubstantiation, and the superstitious practices which the belief of that absurd doctrine gave rise to: Prayers for the dead: The worship of images: Pilgrimages: Auricular confession, which, they affirmed, furnished the priests with opportunities to debauch the morals and persons of their penitents: Female celibacy, which was productive of infamous connections, abortion, and murder: And several other particulars, some of which were similar to those which constitute the principal difference between the present Protestant church and that of Rome. We are not informed what kind of reception this remonstrance experienced from the parliament; but the clergy were so much alarmed at this spirited attack, that they dispatched the archbishop of York, the bishop of London, and some other commissioners to Richard the Second, to request that he would immediately return to England, and adopt some effectual mode of affording protection to the church, which, they affirmed, was in danger of destruction. "So soon," says the fanatical Walsingham, "as the king heard the representation of the commissioners, being inspired by the divine Spirit, he hastened into England, thinking it more necessary to defend the church than to conquer kingdoms." On Richard's arrival, he cited several noblemen who favoured the Lollards to appear before him; and, by threatening them with instant death if they gave any farther encouragement to heretical preachers, induced them to withdraw their protection. He likewise directed the chancellor of Oxford, in 1395, to expel from the university all those who had adopted the principles of that sect. Discouraged by this defection of their patrons, several of the chief preachers recanted their principles, and returned into the bosom of Holy Mother Church. Thomas Arundel, archbishop of York, one of their most inveterate persecutors, obliged the Lollards of his diocese to take the following curious oath: "I ———, before you, worshipful Fadher and Lord Archbishop, and your clergy, with my free will and full avysed, swere to God, and to all his seyntes, upon this holy gospel, that fro this day forthword I shall worship images, with praying and offering unto them, in the worship of the seyntes that they may be made after; and also, I shall never more despise pylgremage, ne states of holy chyrche, in no degre. And also, I shall be buxum to the laws of holy chyrche, and to yhowe, as to myn archbishop, and myn other ordinaries and curates, and keep the laws up with my power, and meyntein them. And also, I shall never meyntein, ne techen, ne defenden, errors, conclusions, ne techeng, of the Lollards, ne swych conclusions and techengs that men clopeth Lollards doctrine; ne shall her books, ne swych-books, ne hem or any suspect or diffamed of Lollardary, receyve or company with all, willingly, or defend in tho matters; and if I know any swych, I shall, with all the hast that I may, do yhowe, or else your nex officers, to wyten and of ther bokes," &c.

The factious prelate Thomas Arundel, who framed this curious oath, succeeded to the primacy, on the death of Courteney, who departed this life on the 16th of July, 1396; but the troubles in which he was soon involved, hindered him from extending his persecutions against the Lollards so far as he proposed. His attachment to that factious party which had effected the virtual deposition of Richard II. in 1386, proved the cause of his disgrace, and procured his exile. Having been found guilty of high treason, in the manner we have already related, in the reign of Richard the Second, he was deprived of his see, and banished the kingdom, about a year after his promotion. Roger Walden, treasurer of England, had been appointed to the metropolitan see on the exile of Thomas; but he did not long enjoy his station; for those troubles which occasioned the murder of the king (t), effected the deposition of the primate, and produced the recal of Arundel, who took possession of his archbishopric towards the commencement of the year 1399.

CHAP. X.

Biographical Account of celebrated Persons, from the Accession of Henry the Second till the Death of Richard the Second.

HAVING brought down our history of the affairs of the church from the year 1154, when Henry the Second ascended the throne, till the year 1399, when Richard the Second was murdered, we deem it necessary to communicate some particulars with regard to such Englishmen of learning, genius, and science, as flourished during that period. These persons being principally of the clerical order, we are justified in giving in a separate chapter a sketch of their character and attainments, because they were intimately connected with the progress of our ecclesiastical history.

Nicolas Breakspear, a native of Hertfordshire, was distinguished by his extraordinary rise from indigence and obscurity, to rank and power, and by having been the only person of English birth who ever had worn the triple crown (u). Being rejected from the abbey of St. Alban's by the abbot for insufficiency of learning, he resolved to seek his fortune on the continent; and having, by indefatigable industry and study, obtained, in the metropolis of France, a competent share of erudition, he was admitted into the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, of which he was at length chosen abbot. Some of his monks complaining of his conduct in this capacity, he was obliged to vindicate himself before pope Eugenius III. who, pleased with his learning and capacity, promoted him to the bishopric of Alba, and enrolled him among the members of the sacred college. He was afterwards sent as legate of the holy see to Denmark and Norway, where he greatly contributed to the propagation of Christianity. On the death of Anastasius IV. in 1154, he was elected to the papal chair, which he filled under the name of Adrian IV. This pontificate was signalized by firmness and vigour; but it was of short duration, and is said to have been terminated by a violent death; though this circumstance is destitute of confirmation. Some of his epistles and homilies are extant.

John of Salisbury was one of the most ingenious and learned men of the twelfth century. He was the confidential friend of archbishop Theobald, who died in 1161, and his successor Thomas à Becket; and, for his intimacy with the latter, he was banished from his native country by Henry II. Splendid offers were made him by the king to induce him to desert this prelate; but he rejected them with scorn. After the murder of his patron, he was preferred to the bishopric of Chartres, by the favour of Louis le Jeune and pope Alexander III. He died in 1182, between the age of sixty and seventy. His principal work is his "Poly-craticon," in which he keenly satirizes the manners of the age. His style is far from being inelegant or unclassical; and he displays a considerable knowledge of the sciences which were then in vogue. Contemporary with him was Peter of Blois, who, though an Englishman, deserves to be here mentioned as one of the ornaments of the court of Henry the Second, who employed him as his private secretary, and gave him several preferments in this kingdom. Peter was a man of strong abilities, and had no small share of erudition. Many of his letters, sermons, and tracts, have been printed.

(u) Cardinal Pole, an Englishman, was indeed chosen to succeed pope Paul III. in 1549; but, regarding his election as informal, he declined the acceptance of the offered dignity.

Roger de Hoveden, one of the chaplains of Henry the Second, wrote a series of annals, commencing at the year 732, and terminating in 1201. He has borrowed largely from Simeon of Durham; and, even in his own time, from Benedict of Peterborough. These authors he, in general, copies verbatim. Where he appears to be an original writer, he is dull and jejune, though he merits praise for fidelity of narration.

William Little, generally styled William of Newburgh, from the monastery to which he belonged, was, next to William of Malmsbury, the most elegant and philosophical of the monkish writers. His history commences at the Conquest, and ends at the year 1197.

Benedict, abbot of Peterborough, was a faithful historian of his own times, to which his work is confined, being only an account of English affairs from the year 1170 to 1192. He enjoyed, for a short time, the office of keeper of the great seal in the reign of Richard I. in whose fifth year he died.

Gervase, a monk of Canterbury, and Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Paul's, cultivated historic composition with success. They flourished in the reigns of Richard and John.

Girald Barry, a native of Wales, whence he is usually styled Giraldus Cambrensis, was a learned ecclesiastic of this period. He had some connection with the court of England, and several benefices in that kingdom. He was appointed chaplain to Henry II. who sent him over to Ireland with prince John. Here he collected materials for his topography of that island, as well as for his history of the conquest of it by the English. In the reign of Richard I. he refused some valuable preferments; but when the see of St. David's became vacant, he offered himself a candidate for it, and was unanimously elected by the chapter; but the powerful opposition of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, prevented him from obtaining the object of his wishes. He wrote a copious account of a progress which he made through Wales, in the train of Baldwin, the English primate. He was also the author of a description of Wales, as well as of many other works, which are debased by the insertion of legendary fictions and miraculous tales. His style is, in general, affected and verbose; but it is occasionally pleasing and elegant.

John Hanville, a monk of St. Alban's, who lived in the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. was eminent as a poet. His "Architrenius" is a work of merit; and he produced several other Latin poems, which are not unworthy of modern perusal. But this writer was inferior to Joseph of Exeter, who seems to have been the first Latin poet of his time, and whose poem on the Trojan war is yet extant, while only a fragment is preserved of his "Antiocheis," of which Richard Cœur de Lion was the hero. Alexander Neckham was contemporary with these two authors; and he acquired great reputation in the same line of composition. Walter Mapes, archdeacon of Oxford, one of the chaplains of Henry II. was also a poetical Latinist; and as his productions are, for the most part, of the lighter species, he may be termed the Anacreon of the twelfth century.

Robert Grosteste, bishop of Lincoln, was distinguished by his genius and his erudition, by the integrity of his life, and by his resolute opposition to papal tyranny, which we have related in the last chapter. He was the author of a great number of treatises in natural philosophy, divinity, ethics, philology, &c. He died about the middle of the thirteenth century.

Roger Bacon, a Franciscan friar, was, without controversy, the greatest man of the age in which he lived. He studied at the universities of Oxford and Paris; and acquired, by the union of a surprizing genius and intense application, such a degree of knowledge as far surpassed the attainments even of his most celebrated contemporaries. His skill in astronomy, and in the various branches of natural philosophy, subjected him to the suspicion of being conversant in the magic art. His great superiority of knowledge excited the envy of his own fraternity; and being accused of holding intercourse with evil spirits, he was imprisoned by the direction of the general of the order. He continued many years in confinement; and it is not improbable, that this rigorous treatment might partly arise from the liberality of his sentiments on the subject of religion, which rendered him hateful to the bigots of that dark age. Notwithstanding the persecutions which he endured from the prejudices of the times, he was enabled to make such discoveries and improvements in art and science, as must excite the astonishment of those who consider the imperfect lights afforded him by the learning of the thirteenth century. He discovered the art of constructing reading glasses, telescopes, and several other constituent parts of philosophical apparatus. He was so conversant in the nature of the mechanical powers, as to invent or improve machines of general utility. He explained the composition and use of gunpowder, though that destructive combustible was not publicly known in Europe till near the middle of the fourteenth century, when Schwartz, a German monk, claimed the honour of its invention. He observed that error in the Gregorian calendar which afterwards occasioned the Gregorian correction of the style. He devised most of the operations practised in chemistry, and improved the art of healing the disorders of the human frame. In short, he was endued with a most perspicacious and comprehensive genius, which penetrated into the recesses of knowledge and science, which enlightened the obscurity of former ages, and paved the way for the progress of a Verulam and a Newton. This extraordinary man, who, though assisted in a pecuniary way by some of his learned friends, of whom bishop Grosteste was the principal, never attained any important preferment, died in 1292, at the age of seventy-eight, in a monastery belonging to his order at Oxford. Of his writings, some have been printed, others are lost, and some are yet in manuscript. His "Opus Majus," of which he sent a copy to pope Clement IV. is a valuable collection of scientific tracts.

Matthew Paris, the historian, was contemporary with Roger Bacon. He assumed the monastic habit at St. Alban's in 1217; and, by his learning and integrity, soon acquired the esteem of the monks of his society. He was at length favoured with the friendship of Henry III. by whom, as he informs us, he was assisted in the composition of his history. He corresponded with Haco king of Norway, at whose request he repaired to that country, to visit and reform the conventual foundations. His principal work was his "Historia Major," in which he has recounted the affairs of England from the Conquest to 1259, the year of his death. In the earlier part of this work, he is supposed to have derived much aid from the labours of Roger de Wendover, who preceded him in the office of historiographer to the monastery of St. Alban's. In the boldness and freedom of his remarks, he exceeded all the writers of his time; for he ventured to exhibit a strong picture of the arbitrary, rapacious, and fraudulent proceedings of the court of Rome, notwithstanding the dangerous height of power to which it had then arrived. He is, on the whole, a faithful historian, but too fond of superstitious tales and relations of miracles said to have been wrought by Romish saints. His style is perspicuous, and sometimes elegant; and the information which he affords us respecting the events of his own time is copious and interesting.

Nicolas Trivet, a Dominican frier, son of Sir Thomas Trivet, one of the justiciaries in the reign of Henry III. is a writer of merit. His Annals deserve our praise for their apparent sincerity, and the chronological accuracy with which they are arranged. About the same time with Trivet, lived Thomas Wikes and Matthew of Westminster, who respectively wrote histories of their native country.

Of the English schoolmen who flourished in this period, William Ockham seems to have been the most celebrated. He was a disciple of Duns Scotus, the formidable opponent of Thomas Aquinas; and, as these two divines were the founders of the Scotists and Thomists, Ockham was the head of another sect of scholastic theologians, called from him Ockhamists. He defended the rights of the Christian princes against the usurpations of the Roman pontiffs; and for this conduct, as well as for some bold opinions in divinity, which they considered as heretical, he was harassed with the spiritual hostilities of three successive occupants of the papal throne, namely, John XXII. Benedict XII. and Clement VI. His works evince, that he was a man of great learning, acuteness, and ability.

Walter Hemingford, a monk of Gisbourne in Yorkshire, flourished in the reign of Edward III. He composed a history of his native country, which is more estimable for fidelity of narration than for beauty of style. The reader of the earlier part of it will perhaps be inclined to dispute this this criticism, till we inform him that the part alluded to was principally borrowed from William of Newburgh.

Adam de Murimuth was a man of considerable eminence in his day, both as a negociator and as an author. His history is principally confined to his own times. He lived in the reigns of Edward II. and III.

Ralph Higden, a monk of Chester, flourished in the fourteenth century, and acquired the character of an assiduous collector of historical facts. His work, which is entitled "Polychronicon," contains some valuable materials. Contemporary with him was John of Tinmouth, who wrote a voluminous work, to which his vanity induced him to give the pompous appellation of "Historia Aurea."

Robert of Avesbury wrote a history of a part of the reigns of Edward II. and III. but his work is more useful for the original papers it contains, than distinguished by the peculiar merit of the writer.

Henry Knyghton, canon of Leicester, obtained some reputation in the historic department. His history of England, which is continued to the year 1395, is not unworthy of the attention of his countrymen, being generally faithful and authentic. At the same time with him flourished John Froissart, a native of Hainault, who chiefly resided at the English court. Froissart was both a poet and an historian. His Chronicle, (a new and elegant edition of which has been lately reprinted,) though not confined to England, is particularly copious with regard to the affairs of that nation. He is, for the most part, a writer of good authority. It may not be improper to remark, that all the above histories, mentioned in this chapter, have been consulted in the progress of the former period of our history.

The principal ornaments of the fourteenth century were Geoffrey Chaucer and John Gower, the fathers of English poetry. Both of them were students in the law, and both were possessed of a great share of general learning. Chaucer was patronized by John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and obtained the favour of Edward III. by whom he was employed in some official departments. In the subsequent reign he fell into disgrace at court, by supporting the doctrines of Wickliffe, and adhering to John of Northampton, mayor of London, who, being prosecuted by the ministry for seditious practices, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. To avoid the vengeance of the court, Chaucer fled to the continent, whence he returned to England in a state of poverty, after an absence of several years. He was soon discovered, and thrown into prison; but, being prevailed on, by menace and promise, to disclose the contrivances of his party, he was restored to liberty. He afterwards recovered the good graces of king Richard, from whom he procured several grants, which were increased by his successor Henry. He died in the last year of the fourteenth century, at an advanced age. He was a man of uncommon genius, which he cultivated with great success. His poems, though they may appear harsh and uncouth to modern readers, soar above the general barbarism of the age in which he lived. By his contemporaries they were deemed elegant and harmonious: and the good sense with which they abound, recommends them to more enlightened ages. Many editions have been printed of his "Canterbury Tales," and they still continue to delight those who have a taste for the poetical compositions of our ancestors.

John Gower enjoyed the patronage of Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester. With the events of his life we are little acquainted: but we find that he was eminent for his knowledge of the law, and we know, from his productions, that he was a respectable poet for the age in which he wrote. His versification is more rugged than that of Chaucer; but his poems merit our praise for the multifarious knowledge which they display, and for the justness of the remarks they contain. To Chaucer and Gower the English language is greatly indebted for its improvement.

CHAP. XI.

Progress of the Arts, Sciences, and Literature, in England.

TO trace and delineate the progress and improvement in the arts and sciences in this country with the minute accuracy of a chronologist, would lead to the transgression of those bounds which the plan of our history has compelled us to prescribe to ourselves; but to omit it altogether would be a mark of remissness; we shall therefore make a few general remarks on their progressive advancement, which will be amply sufficient to convey adequate ideas of their influence on the manners and characters of the people.

Although in the period we have been delineating, science had begun to emerge from that state of obscurity in which it had been unhappily involved during the middle ages, the circumscribed circle of its votaries prevented any material extension of its influence. The little learning which was to be found in the country was still confined to the clergy; though the gross ignorance of the laity was rather owing to the rude taste and manners of the age than to the want of opportunity for the acquisition of knowledge, for, exclusive of the universities and other important seminaries, there was not a city or considerable town in the kingdom, but had its schools, in which youth were instructed, not only in reading, writing, and the principles of grammar, but in the more sublime arts of rhetoric, logic, and other branches of erudition. The modes of improvement in the art of disputation, practised by the pupils of those days, bear so striking a resemblance to the most celebrated modern theatres for the display of oratorical abilities, that the following short account of them, taken from Fitz-Stephens, a contemporary writer, cannot prove unacceptable to the reader: "On holidays," says that author, "it is usual for these schools to hold public assemblies in the churches, in which the scholars engage in demonstrative or logical disputations: some employing enthymemes; others, perfect syllogisms. The sole object of many of them is to obtain the victory, and make an ostentatious display of their acuteness; while others aim at the investigation of truth. Artful sophists, on these occasions, acquire great applause; some by a wonderful copiousness and fluency of expression; others, by gilding the most fallacious arguments with the most specious embellishments. When the disputations are finished, another class of scholars deliver rhetorical declamations, in which every rule of art is carefully preserved, and no topic of persuasion neglected."

The revival of literature, however, in this period, as well in England as in other European countries, was generally attempted by persons who had received instruction, or derived their principles of science, either from the Greeks in the Eastern Empire, or from the Arabians in Spain and Africa. Both these people, as an elegant and profound historian has justly observed, being acute and inquisitive to excess, corrupted those sciences which they cultivated: the former rendered theology a system of speculative refinement, or of endless controversy; the latter communicated to philosophy a spirit of metaphysical and frivolous subtlety. Misled by these fallacious guides, the persons who first applied to science were involved in a maze of intricate enquiries. Instead of allowing their fancy to take its natural range, and to produce such works of invention as might have improved their taste and refined their sentiments, they were fettered by authority, they were led astray by example, and wasted the whole force of their genius in speculations which were equally difficult and unavailing.

Having imbibed this spirit, they were continually employed, either in the penetration of mysteries, and the decision of questions, to the solution or even comprehension of which the limited faculties of the human mind are utterly inadequate; or else in the examination of subjects which reason could not stoop to investigate without degradation. Among the sublime and incomprehensible objects of their enquiries, Peter of Blois mentions "the substantial form of sounds," and "the essence of universals." As a proof that they were likewise addicted to the opposite extreme, we are told by John of Salisbury, that the following question, among others of equal importance, was frequently agitated with infinite warmth, viz. "When a hog is taken to market with a rope about its neck, which is held at one end by a man, whether is the hog taken to market by the rope, or by the man?"

The same spirit of subtlety which distinguished the philosophical writings and disputations of this age, extended its pernicious effects to divinity, and produced that scholastic theology which degraded the schools with its infinite train of daring disquisitions and absurd distinctions, which are not the object of human reason. When the divines composed commentaries on the Scriptures, it was not with the view of illustrating the important truths they contain, but but merely to extract from them certain mystical or allegorical senses, which tended to perplex, but not to enlighten; and to form subjects for disputation, some of which were not only useless, but impious; many of them tinctured with the grossest obscenity; and others so trifling and ridiculous, as to render those who proposed, and those who discussed them, equal objects of contempt. Of the latter class, the following examples will suffice: "Was Christ the same between his death and resurrection that he was before his death and after his resurrection?—Doth the glorified body of Christ stand or sit in heaven?—Is the body of Christ, that is eaten in the sacrament, dressed or undressed?—Were the cloaths in which Christ appeared to the disciples real, or only apparent?"

The various canons enacted, in different councils, by the bishops of Rome, for the purpose of governing that spiritual monarchy which their ambition had urged them to erect, formed an essential part of the study of bishops and their officials, as their decisions, as judges of the ecclesiastical courts, were guided by those laws. But it was not till after the publication of the Decretals of Gratian, about the middle of the twelfth century, that the canon law attained the rank of a science, and was taught and studied in the schools. Its students and practitioners were speedily infected with the same corruption that pervaded every other branch of science, as may be seen by the assertion of Peter de Blois, who speaks thus of them: "It is the chief study of the ecclesiastical judges of our days, to multiply litigations, to invent delays, to invalidate contracts, to suppress truth, to encourage falsehood, to encrease extortions, and, in a word, to confound all law and justice by their quirks and subtleties."

Medicine, which had hitherto been practised as an art, now began to be studied as a science: but, though the professors of it seem to have been perfectly satisfied with their own abilities, it does not appear that their knowledge was equal to their vanity. The state of medicine at this period may be more accurately known by the following passage from John of Salisbury, one of the most learned and ingenious men of the twelfth century, than by the most ample dissertation of any modern author: "The professors of the theory of medicine are very communicative: they will tell you all they know, and, perhaps, through excess of kindness, a little more. You may learn from them the nature of things in general; the causes of sickness and of health; how to banish the one, and to preserve the other: for they can do both at pleasure. They will describe to you, with wonderful minuteness, the origin, the beginning, the progress, and the cure, of all diseases. In short, I am charmed with their harangues: I think them equal to Mercury and Esculapius; and almost persuade myself that they are able to raise the dead. There is but one thing that staggers me: their theories are as directly opposite to one another as light and darkness. This idea cannot but create doubts: two contradictory propositions cannot be true. But what shall I say of the practical physicians? I must say nothing to offend them; since it pleaseth God, for the punishment of my sins, to suffer me to fall too frequently into their hands. They must be soothed, and not exasperated. That I may not experience too rough treatment in my next illness, I dare scarcely allow myself to think in secret what others speak aloud." In another work, written at a subsequent period, and probably at a time when he enjoyed a better state of health, he speaks with greater freedom of the medical practitioners: "They soon return from college, full of flimsy theories, to practise what they have learned. Galen and Hippocrates are continually in their mouths. They speak aphorisms on every subject; and inspire their audience with wonder by their long, technical, high-sounding words. The good people believe they can do any thing, because they lay claim to universal knowledge. They have but two maxims which they hold inviolate:---Never regard the poor---Never refuse money from the rich."

There were three circumstances which appear to have contributed to the revival of learning at this period: the accession of the Norman princes to the English throne, who were themselves scholars, and to whose court the most learned men on the continent repaired, diffusing, by their example and instruction, a love and knowledge of letters—the increase of monasteries in England, which augmented the number both of teachers and students; multiplied the inducements to pursue, and the opportunities to acquire, knowledge; and rendered books more common and easy of attainment than they had been at any former period—and, lastly, the art of making paper, which was invented about this time, considerably decreased the value of books, and promoted their circulation.

The introduction of the Normans into England proved as favourable to the promotion of the arts as to the culture of the sciences. Agriculture, which from its extensive utility claims particular attention, was considerably improved by the importation of many thousands of husbandmen from the fertile and well cultivated plains of Flanders, France, and Normandy; who, having obtained lands in this island, employed the same modes of cultivation which they had successfully used in their native countries. Nor did the proud barons of those times disdain to superintend the improvement of their estates: some of them are even celebrated in history for their skill in agriculture. But the Norman clergy, and the monks in particular, paid still greater attention to this necessary art; and the lands of the church, especially those of the convents, were distinguished for their superior cultivation: for the monks of every monastery retained such of their lands as were most conveniently situated in their own possession, and cultivated them with great care, under their own immediate inspection, and frequently with their own hands. Indeed the custom of assisting in the practice of agriculture was so prevalent with the monks at this period, especially in seed and harvest times, that the famous Thomas à Becket, after he was promoted to the archbishopric of Canterbury, used frequently to repair to the fields, accompanied by the monks of the monasteries where he happened to reside, and assist them in reaping their corn and making their hay.

That the protection and encouragement of all who were employed in agricultural pursuits was an object of attention to the church, appears from the twenty-sixth canon of the general council of Lateran, held in the year 1179; by which it was decreed, "That all presbyters, clerks, monks, converts, pilgrims, and peasants, when they are engaged in the labours of husbandry, together with the cattle that draw their ploughs, and the seed which they carry into the field, shall enjoy perfect security; and that all who molest or interrupt them, if they do not desist when they have been admonished, shall be excommunicated."

Gardening too, in all its various branches, appears to have been cultivated with peculiar assiduity by the Normans. William of Malmsbury tells us, that the Vale of Gloucester produced great quantities of the finest fruits; and that it was thickly planted with vineyards that yielded grapes in the greatest abundance, and of the sweetest taste, of which wine was made little inferior in flavour to the wines of France.

Architecture likewise received great improvement during this period, owing to the universal rage for building which prevailed throughout the kingdom in the twelfth century, when great numbers of churches and monasteries were erected in all parts of the island. The sacred architecture of the Anglo-Normans, which at the commencement of this period strongly resembled, in style and manner, that of the Anglo-Saxons, yielded by degrees to structures more airy, elevated, and embellished, which led to that bold magnificent style of building denominated, for what reason we know not, the later Gothic. This mode of architecture, which with some variations flourished more than three centuries, produced many stupendous edifices, which are still viewed with pleasure and admiration. Many of these magnificent structures, being built with stones brought from the quarries near Caen, in Lower Normandy, must have been attended with an immense expence.

This improvement in architecture did not, however, affect the habitations of the lower class of people, who were extremely depressed in the times we are now delineating. Even in the metropolis all the houses inhabited by mechanics and common burgesses were built of wood, and covered either with straw or reeds, towards the conclusion of the twelfth century: but the palaces or castles of the kings, barons, and prelates, were materially different from the residences of persons of the same rank among the Saxons. Indeed they were prompted to the erection of fortified castles, not only by the custom of their native country, but by the more potent consideration of personal safety, arising from the dangerous situation in this island, where they were surrounded by multitudes, whose abhorrence they had justly incurred by plunder and oppression. Indeed William the First was sensible that the want of fortified places in England had greatly promoted his conquest, and might might possibly accelerate his expulsion; he therefore hastened to remedy this important defect, by building castles of great strength and magnificence in all the towns within the royal demesnes. This example was soon followed by his nobles; and the first care of every person who received the grant of an estate from the crown, was to erect a castle for its defence. This spirit of building fortresses was maintained by the disputes about the succession in the subsequent reigns; and increased to such a degree during the turbulent reign of Stephen, that we are told by the author of the Saxon Chronicle, that the poor people were worn out with the toil of these buildings, and the whole kingdom was covered with castles: an expression that will not appear exaggerated, when we are informed that, in the short space of nineteen years, from 1135 to 1154, no fewer than eleven hundred and fifteen castles were raised from the foundation, exclusive of those which had been erected before that period (f).

The arts of refining and working metals, which are of such extensive utility, both intrinsic and relative, were highly improved in the present period. The art of making defensive armour, in particular, had arrived at such perfection, that a knight, completely armed, was deemed almost invulnerable. But the artists who wrought in the more precious metals of gold and silver, had attained to a still greater degree of excellence, as appears from the positive testimony of contemporary writers, and from the description of their productions.

The importation of a considerable number of cloth manufacturers from Flanders tended greatly to promote the improvement of the different clothing arts; for the encouragement whereof, the weavers in all the principal towns were formed into gilds or corporations; and had various privileges bestowed upon them by royal charters, for which they paid certain fines into the Exchequer.

It is almost superfluous to observe, that the art of war was an object of universal attention in this martial age: but there was a considerable defect in the military system, owing to the feudal regulations, which were highly subversive of discipline and subordination, as they gave to every earl the command of the troops of his own county, and to every baron those of his barony; by which means such important commands, being hereditary, were frequently entrusted to persons wholly unqualified to hold them. "In our time," says a contemporary writer, "military skill and discipline have much declined, and are indeed almost totally destroyed, because many possess the highest offices without having passed through the subaltern degrees; who are proud indeed of their commands and titles, but despise the most necessary qualifications. Young men, who are gamesters, hunters, hawkers, and even fools by nature, who have never handled arms, or acquired any knowledge of the art of war, take upon them to act the part of generals."

The progress of the English, at this period, in the Fine Arts, appears to have been equal to their more useful improvements. Sculpture has in all ages attracted the particular attention of a people inclined to idolatry, and endued with wealth; and as the inhabitants of England were at this time much addicted to a superstitious veneration for the images of saints, they were sedulous in the cultivation of it: every church had an image of its patron saint; and the cathedrals were absolutely crouded with these inanimate objects of fanatical adoration.

Painting, historical, portrait, and ornamental, was as much cultivated as sculpture, as well for religious purposes as for those of vanity and ostentation. We are told by Henry the Second's chaplain, Peter de Blois, archdeacon of Bath, that the great barons and chief officers of his time had their shields and saddles ornamented with the representations of battles. "They carry shields into the field," says that author, "so richly gilded, that they present the enemy with a prospect of booty rather than of danger; and they return with them untouched; and, as I may say, in a virgin state. They also cause their shields and saddles to be decorated with representations of battles and equestrian combats, that they may please their imaginations with the contemplation of scenes in which they are averse to engage."

The art of Painting Glass, it is imagined, was brought into England in the reign of king John; but this is a conjecture, rather founded on the circumstance of its being practised in France at that time than supported by tradition. There was another kind of painting, however, that was certainly practised in this country during that period: this was called illuminating—from whence limning is derived---and was chiefly used for the illustration and embellishment of the Bible and other books.

As the Normans were more learned than the Anglo-Saxons, and not less devoted to the Muses, the delightful art of Poetry was cultivated with equal ardour, and greater success, in this than in the former period. Though the vernacular language of England was in such a state of imperfection as not only to render it improper for the sublimer strains of poetry, but even to be deemed unfit for the purposes of teaching the sciences, maintaining an epistolary correspondence, or for prosaic compositions; yet so prevalent was the furor poeticus, that a prodigious number of poems, on various subjects, were composed in that crude and unformed tongue. The minstrels had a set of songs, which they sang to their harps in the courts of kings, and in the halls of barons, on Sundays, instead of those on love and war, which they sang on other days.

The poets of this age seem to have indulged themselves in satirical compositions, as well personal as general, though they must have exercised their wit at the risk of their lives, as appears from an incident which occurred in the reign of Henry the First; who, in the year 1124, sentenced one Luke de Barra to lose his eyes, for having written defamatory ballads against him: and, notwithstanding the strenuous intercession of the count of Flanders, the sentence was executed with such rigour, that the unfortunate poet died in consequence of the wounds he received. But though the monarchs and nobles of those times were thus impatient of satire, they were not averse to the courtly strains of panegyric. The celebrated William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, chancellor and chief justiciary of England, the pope's legate, and chief favourite of Richard the First, is said to have kept a number of poets in his pay to compose songs and poems in his praise; and to have allowed the best singers and minstrels, by considerable presents, to come from the continent, and sing these compositions in the streets of the different cities of England.

Some of the best poems of these times were written in the Latin language, which the imperfection of the English had rendered extremely prevalent. Some fragments of these may be seen in Camden's Remains, which in elegance and harmony may justly vie with the most polished productions of the Augustan age.

The language which the Normans imported into England was that which was called Lingua Romana, or the Romance Language, which was the vulgar tongue of all the provinces of France in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. It was in this language,---a base corruption of the Latin, which had itself superseded the Celtic of the ancient Gauls, at the time when the Roman arms had made a conquest of their country, and from whence the French is derived---that many metrical romances were composed by the poets of France and Normandy during the eleventh and twelfth centuries; and it was from the language in which they were written, rather than from the extravagant fables which they commonly contained, that these compositions received the denomination of Romances.

(f) The following description of one of these abodes of feudal tyranny, chiefly taken from Mr. Grose's Antiquities of England and Wales, will convey an adequate idea of their strength and structure. It was generally situated on an eminence, and near to a river: the whole site of the castle, which was frequently of great extent and irregular figure, was surrounded by a broad ditch, sometimes filled with water, and sometimes dry, called the Fossé. Before the great gate was an outwork, called a Barbacan, or Antemural, which consisted of a strong high wall, provided with turrets, for the defence of the gate and drawbridge. On the inside of the fossé stood the wall of the castle, about eight or ten feet thick, and between twenty and thirty feet high, with a parapet, and a species of embrasures, called Crennels, on the top. On this wall, at equal distances, were erected square towers, two or three stories high, in which some of the principal officers of the castle generally resided; and, on the inside, apartments were made for the common servants or retainers of the proprietor; beside granaries, storehouses, and other necessary offices. On the top of this wall, and on the flat roofs of these buildings, stood the defenders of the castle when it was besieged, and from thence discharged arrows, darts, and stones on the assailants. In this wall also was placed the great gate of the castle, protected by a tower on each side, and rooms over the entrance, which was closed with thick folding doors made of oak, often plated with iron, and defended by an iron portcullis, or grate, let down from above. Within this outward wall was a large open space or court, called the Outer Bayle, or Ballium, in which a church or chapel commonly stood. Within this outer bayle was another ditch, wall, gate, and towers, inclosing the Inner Bayle or court; within which the chief tower, or Keep, was built. This was a spacious square fabric, four or five stories high, the walls of which were of a prodigious thickness, and the windows extremely small, which rendered the apartments dark and gloomy. This grand tower was the mansion of the proprietor, and the residence of the constable, or governor. As beneath it were dark, dismal vaults, for the purpose of confining prisoners, it was sometimes called the Dungeon. In this building also was the great hall, in which the lord of the castle displayed his hospitality. At one end of the hall was a place somewhat elevated above the floor, called the Dais, where the chief table was placed, at which sate persons of the highest rank.

The Provençal Poets were justly celebrated in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in most of the countries of Europe; they were called Troubadours, or Finders, from the fertility of their invention; and were, in fact, the fathers of modern poetry. No bards ever received a greater encouragement or protection: they were invited to the courts of the greatest princes, where they were equally respected by the brave and the fair, as they celebrated the atchievements of the one, and the charms of the other. So flattering was the applause they attracted, that several crowned heads devoted their leisure hours to the Muses, became Troubadours, and composed poems in the Provençal language, which was then the most perfect of all the European tongues. Richard the First was one of these royal poets; some of whose poems in the Provençal dialect, are still extant; and one of them has been published in the first volume of Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors of England.

In times when Poetry was so much esteemed and cultivated, we may be sure that Music could not be neglected; particularly as these two arts were much more intimately connected in those days than they are at present: for most of the poets of France and England, like the ancient bards of Gaul and Britain, were musicians, and sung their verses to the music of their harps. These poetical musicians, known by the name of Minstrels, were entertained in the courts and castles of princes, barons, and prelates, who lavished on them a great part of their wealth. Matilda, consort to Henry the First, was so fond of music and poetry, and so profuse in her gifts to the professors and votaries of these sciences, that she expended almost the whole of her revenues upon them, and even oppressed her family in order to procure money to reward them for their labours. An art so highly cherished, and so liberally rewarded, could not fail to flourish.

Sacred Music was likewise cultivated with equal ardour during this period; and many of the dignified clergy paid such application to it as to become considerable proficients in this pleasing art (g). The church music of England did not long preserve that grave and solemn style which was so peculiarly calculated to inspire the mind with religious sentiments; for, before the end of the twelfth century, its primitive simplicity had degenerated into softness and effeminacy. John of Salisbury complains, that this effeminate kind of church music had even debased the dignity, and polluted the purity of religious worship; that the sweet modulations of the choristers rather resembled a concert of syrens than of men; that, by attending to their artificial sounds, the ear lost its capacity of discrimination; and the mind, overpowered with sweetness, was unable to decide on the merits of the performers, who, exceeding the bounds of moderation, were more apt to raise unhallowed passions in the hearts of men than excite devout affections. If this description be not grossly exaggerated, though such music was highly improper for a place of worship, the skill of the composers, and abilities of the performers, must have been far from contemptible.

The arts and sciences, however, continued to advance and improve; but their progress was slow, and their improvement was gradual; so that little remains to be said in addition to what is above stated. Among the principal excitements to study may be reckoned the considerable additions that were made to the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the foundation of numerous schools in different parts of the kingdom. In Oxford, from the year 1249 to 1386, no less than seven colleges were founded and endowed; viz. University, Baliol, Merton, Exeter, Oriel, Queen's, and New College: and in Cambridge, nine halls and colleges were founded in the same period; viz. Peter House, Michael College, (now Trinity,) University Hall, (which was burnt down soon after its foundation,) King's Hall, (united to Trinity College by Henry the Eighth,) Clare Hall, Pembroke Hall, Corpus Christi, (now Ben'et College,) Trinity Hall, and Gonvil Hall.

Although the arts were by no means neglected in the period we are now delineating, yet there were many circumstances which prevented them from making a rapid progress towards perfection. The situation of the country was peculiarly unfavourable to the improvement of the necessary arts. Agriculture was so little encouraged, that the preference which Edward the Second evinced to it over martial exercises, exposed him to the reproach and contempt of his subjects. The attention of the people too, and especially of the nobility, was almost constantly diverted from the cultivation of their lands by foreign wars and domestic commotions; and, as they could not find time to bestow on agriculture, that primary source of subsistence, it is not to be expected that arts of an inferior consequence could be promoted with any degree of assiduity. The great barons and prelates, who were the chief proprietors of the soil, kept a vast quantity of land in their own possession, which was cultivated, partly by their slaves or villans, and partly by their tenants; who, whenever they were called upon, were under the necessity of neglecting the cultivation of their own land, to attend to that of their lords: and, as these slaves and tenants could have no interest in the produce of their labours, it is natural to suppose that they would perform them with negligence and inattention (h).

It is a circumstance not less curious than singular, that not only treatises composed at this period for the instruction of farmers and their servants, down to the very swineherd, were written in Latin; but even the accounts of the profits and expences of farms and dairies were kept in that language. The Latin employed for these purposes was not indeed strictly classical, as will appear from the following specimen, which we have extracted from Kennet's Parochial Antiquities: "Et pro uno seedcod empto iii d. Et pro uno cartsadel uno colero cum uno pari tractuum emptis xiv d. Et pro fractura de drawgere iii d. Et pro uno dongecart empto xiv d. Et pro serratione et dolatione unius carthody vi d."

The useful art of clock-making was introduced into England during this period. The first clock we hear of in this country was placed in the old clock tower, opposite to the gate of Westminster Hall, and was purchased, as we are told by Selden, with part of a fine of eight hundred marks imposed on Randolf de Hengham, chief justice of the King's Bench, in 1288. In 1292, another clock, which cost thirty pounds---equivalent to four hundred pounds of our present money---was placed in the cathedral of Canterbury. About seventy or eighty years afterwards the art of clock-making in England had attained to a considerable degree of perfection. Leland gives an account of a very curious clock, made by Richard de Wallingford, abbot of St. Alban's, in the reign of Richard II. which he describes as representing the revolutions of the sun and moon, the fixed stars, and the ebbing and flowing of the sea. He informs us, that the abbot composed a book of directions for the management of this curious piece of mechanism, to prevent its being spoiled by the ignorance of the monks.

It is not possible to fix, with precision, the time when the use of gunpowder and fire-arms were introduced into England, though we know it was during this period. We have already mentioned, in the last chapter, that Roger Bacon invented the art of making it; but as he was endued with those principles of humanity which prevent the perversion of knowledge to destructive purposes, so he dreaded to communicate his dangerous discovery to the world: therefore, by an artful transposition of the letters contained in the (g) The invention of the Gamut, by an Italian monk named Guido Aretin, a native of Arezzo, about the year 1022, contributed in a great degree to increase the ardour of the clergy in their application to Music, by facilitating the acquisition of musical knowledge. This invention made a great noise in the church; and the author was thrice sent for to Rome, to explain and teach it to the clergy of that metropolis. Aretin, in a letter to the pope, affirms, that any person, by the aid of his invention, may make as great proficiency in Music, in one year, as he could before have made in ten. He insinuates to his Holiness, that he had been inspired by Heaven with this happy thought, which had procured him an ample atonement for all his sins, and secured the salvation of his soul!

(h) Some idea of the immense tracts of land which the barons and prelates retained in their own possession may be formed from the following account of the stock upon the lands belonging to the see of Winchester, delivered to bishop Wykeham, in the year 1367, by the executors of his predecessor, viz. One hundred and twenty-seven draught horses; fifteen hundred and fifty-six head of black cattle; three thousand eight hundred and seventy-six wethers; four thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven ewes; and three thousand five hundred and forty-one lambs; besides the sum of one thousand six hundred and sixty-two pounds ten shillings—equivalent to upwards of twenty thousand pounds of our present money—which they paid for a deficiency in the stock.

Latin

Latin words, which signified charcoal, he rendered the passage obscure, and consequently useless. The passage is this: "Sed tamen salis petræ, luru mope can vbre (carbonum pulvere) et sulphuris; et sic facies tonitrum et coruscationem, si scias artificium." By this mean the knowledge of the materials made use of in the composition of gunpowder was concealed till it was accidentally discovered by Barthold Schwartz, a German monk and chemist, towards the commencement of the fourteenth century, as he was pounding the ingredients for medical purposes.

Though fire-arms were frequently used in these times, their invention did not produce any material change in the art of war. This may be ascribed to a variety of causes; but principally to the difficulty of procuring gunpowder, the art of making which was known only to a few persons, and that but imperfectly. The English too, were at this time in possession of many destructive instruments of war, which they were unwilling to change for others with which they were but imperfectly acquainted. The chief of these instruments were, the cross-bow, and engines for throwing stones: some of which would throw stones of three hundred weight to a considerable distance.

The Fine Arts, during the present period, experienced much greater encouragement than those which tend to gratify the wants and to supply the comforts of life. The superstitious spirit of the age, with the extreme opulence of the clergy, which is almost a necessary consequence of that spirit, rendered the cultivation of Sculpture, Painting, or Music, a study of great honour and immense profit. The sculptor and statuary supplied the external embellishments of the churches, palaces, and castles, of the nobles; while they joined their skill to that of the painter, in order to stock the inside of the buildings with such immoderate numbers of their productions, that they bore a much stronger resemblance to modern exhibition-rooms than to places of public worship, or private residence.

The love of poetry still prevailed; though the barbarism of the language in which the poets of that age wrote has prevented their works from being generally known to posterity, except those of Chaucer, and his successor, John Gower, whose poetical talents are thus described by Mr. Warton: "In elevation and elegance, in harmony and perspicuity of versification, Chaucer surpasses his predecessors in an infinite proportion; that his genius was universal, and adapted to themes of unbounded variety; that his merit was not less in painting familiar manners with humour and propriety than in moving the passions, and in representing the beautiful or the grand objects of nature with grace and sublimity. In a word, that he appeared with all the lustre and dignity of a true poet, in an age which compelled him to struggle with a barbarous language, and a national want of taste; and when, to write verses at all, was considered as a singular qualification.

"If Chaucer had not existed, the compositions of John Gower, the next poet in succession, would alone have been sufficient to rescue the reigns of Edward the Third and Richard the Second, from the imputation of barbarism. His education was liberal and uncircumscribed; his course of reading extensive; and he tempered his severer studies with a knowledge of life. By a critical cultivation of his native language, he endeavoured to reform its irregularities, and to establish an English style."

As to music, independent of the minstrels, who continued to flourish during the fourteenth century, sacred music was cultivated with great ardour by the clergy. The church, indeed, by a gradual departure from the primitive simplicity of the Christian religion, and the consequent introduction of organs into places of worship, to the sound of which many of the offices were sung, had rendered the study of music essentially necessary to all who were to partake of the celebration. Music was accordingly taught and studied in all colleges, cathedrals, convents, and capital churches; and we are told by that laborious investigator, Sir John Hawkins, in his History of Music, "That the clergy were by much the most able proficients, as well in instrumental as vocal music."

(i) The subjects treated of in this chapter, having received all the attention which their nature required by Mr. Hume, we have thought fit to transcribe the principal of his arguments, and to elucidate them by observations drawn from other historians of high authority.

CHAP. XII.

DISSERTATION ON THE FEUDAL AND ANGLO-NORMAN GOVERNMENT AND MANNERS.

Origin of the Feudal law—Its Progress—Feudal Government of England—The Feudal Parliament—The Commons—Judicial Power—Revenue of the Crown—Commerce—The Church—Civil Laws—Manners.

THE Feudal Law is the chief foundation, both of the political government and of the jurisprudence established by the Normans in England (i). Our subject therefore requires that we should form a just idea of this law, in order to explain the state as well of that kingdom as of all other kingdoms of Europe, which during those ages were governed by similar institutions. And though I am sensible, says Mr. Hume, that I must here repeat many observations and reflections which have been communicated by others (k); yet, as every book, agreeably to the observation of a great historian (l), should be as complete as possible within itself, and should never refer for any thing material to other books, it will be necessary in this place to deliver a short plan of that prodigious fabric which for several centuries preserved such a mixture of liberty and oppression, order and anarchy, stability and revolution, as was never experienced in any other age, or any other part of the world.

After the northern nations had subdued the provinces of the Roman empire, they were obliged to establish a system of government which might secure their conquests, as well against the revolt of their numerous subjects who remained in the provinces, as from the inroads of other tribes, who might be tempted to ravish from them their new acquisitions. The great change of circumstances made them here depart from those institutions which prevailed among them while they remained in the forests of Germany; yet was it still natural for them to retain, in their present settlement, as much of their ancient customs as was compatible with their new situation.

The German governments, being more a confederacy of independent warriors than a civil subjection, derived their principal force from many inferior and voluntary associations, which individuals formed under a particular head or chieftain, and which it became the highest point of honour to maintain with inviolable fidelity. The glory of the chief consisted in the number, the bravery, and the zealous attachment of his retainers: the duty of the retainers required that they should accompany their chief in all wars and dangers, that they should fight and perish by his side, and that they should esteem his renown or his favour a sufficient recompence for all their services (m). The prince himself was nothing but a chieftain, who was chosen from among the rest, on account of his superior valour or nobility: and who derived his power from the voluntary association or attachment of the other chieftains.

When a tribe, governed by these ideas, and actuated by these principles, subdued a large territory, they found that though it was necessary to keep themselves in a military posture, they could neither remain united in a body, nor take up their quarters in several garrisons, and that their manners and institutions debarred them from using these expedients; the obvious ones, which in a like situation would have been employed by a more civilized nation. Their ignorance in the art of finances, and perhaps the devastations inseparable from such violent conquests, rendered it impracticable for them to levy taxes sufficient for the pay of numerous armies; and their repugnance to subordination, with their attachment to rural pleasures, made the life of the camp or garrison, if perpetuated during peaceful times, extremely odious and disgustful to them. They seized, therefore, such a portion of the conquered lands as appeared necessary; they assigned a share for supporting the dignity of their prince and government; they distributed other parts, under the title of fiefs, to the chiefs; these made a new partition among their retainers; the express condition of all these grants was, that they might be resumed at pleasure, and that the possessor, so long as he enjoyed them, should still remain in readiness to take the field for the defence of the nation. And though the conquerors immediately separated, in order to enjoy their new acquisitions, their martial disposition made them readily fulfil the terms of their engagement: they assembled on the first alarm; their habitual attachment to the chieftain made them willingly submit to his command; and thus a regular military force, though concealed, was always ready to defend, on any emergence, the interest and honour of the community.

We are not to imagine that all the conquered lands were seized by the northern conquerors; or that the whole of the land thus seized was subjected to those military services. This supposition is confuted by the history of all the nations on the continent. Even the idea given us of the German manners by the Roman historian, may convince us that that bold people would never have been content with so precarious a subsistence, or have fought to procure establishments which were only to continue during the good pleasure of their sovereign. Though the northern chieftains accepted of lands which, being considered as a kind of military pay, might be resumed at the will of the king or general; they also took possession of estates which, being hereditary and independent, enabled them to maintain their native liberty, and support, without court-favour, the honour of their rank and family.

But there is a great difference, in the consequences, between the distribution of a pecuniary subsistence, and the assignment of lands burthened with the condition of military service. The delivery of the former at the weekly, monthly, or annual terms of payment, still recalls the idea of a voluntary gratuity from the prince, and reminds the soldier of the precarious tenure by which he holds his commission. But the attachment, naturally formed with a fixed portion of land, gradually begets the idea of something like property, and makes the possessor forget his dependent situation, and the condition which was at first annexed to the grant. It seemed equitable, that one who had cultivated and sowed a field should reap the harvest: hence fiefs, which were at first entirely precarious, were soon made annual. A man who had employed his money in building, planting, or other improvements, expected to reap the fruits of his labour or expence: hence they were next granted during a term of years. It would be thought hard to expel a man from his possessions who had always done his duty, and performed the conditions on which he originally received them: hence the chieftains in a subsequent period, thought themselves entitled to demand the enjoyment of their feudal lands during life. It was found, that a man would more willingly expose himself in battle, if assured that his family should inherit his possessions, and should not be left by his death in want and poverty: hence fiefs were made hereditary in families, and descended, during one age, to the son, then to the grandson, next to the brothers, and afterwards to more distant relations (n). The idea of property stole in gradually upon that of military pay; and each century made some sensible addition to the stability of fiefs and tenures.

In all these successive acquisitions, the chief was supported by his vassals; who, having originally a strong connection with him, augmented by the constant intercourse of good offices, and by the friendship arising from vicinity and dependance, were inclined to follow their leader against all his enemies, and voluntarily, in his private quarrels, paid him the same obedience to which, by their tenure, they were bound in foreign wars. While he daily advanced new pretensions to secure the possession of his superior fief, they expected to find the same advantage, in acquiring stability to their subordinate ones; and they zealously opposed the intrusion of a new lord, who would be inclined, as he was fully intitled, to bestow the possession of their lands on his own favourites and retainers. Thus the authority of the sovereign gradually decayed; and each noble, fortified in his own territory by the attachment of his vassals, became too powerful to be expelled by an order from the throne; and he secured by law what he had at first acquired by usurpation.

During this precarious state of the supreme power, a difference would immediately be experienced between those portions of territory which were subjected to the feudal tenures, and those which were possessed by an allodial or free title. Though the latter possessions had at first been esteemed much preferable, they were soon found, by the progressive changes introduced into public and private law, to be of an inferior condition to the former. The possessors of a feudal territory, united by a regular subordination under one chief, and by the mutual attachments of the vassals, had the same advantages over the proprietors of the other, that a disciplined army enjoys over a dispersed multitude; and were enabled to commit with impunity all injuries on their defenceless neighbours. Every one, therefore, hastened to seek that protection which he found so necessary; and each allodial proprietor, resigning his possessions into the hands of the king, or of some nobleman respected for power or valour, received them back with the condition of feudal services (o), which, though a burden somewhat grievous, brought him ample compensation, by connecting him with the neighbouring proprietors, and placing him under the guardianship of a potent chieftain. The decay of the political government thus necessarily occasioned the extension of the feudal: the kingdoms of Europe were universally divided into baronies, and these into inferior fiefs: and the attachment of vassals to their chief, which was at first an essential part of the German manners, was still supported by the same causes from which it at first arose; the necessity of mutual protection, and the continued intercourse, between the head and the members, of benefits and services.

But there was another circumstance which corroborated these feudal dependencies, and tended to connect the vassals with their superior lord by an indissoluble bond of union. The northern conquerors, as well as the more early Greeks and Romans, embraced a policy, which is unavoidable to all nations that have made slender advances in refinement: they every where united the civil jurisdiction with the military power. Law, in its commencement, was not an intricate science, and was more governed by maxims of equity, which seem obvious to common sense, than by numerous and subtile principles, applied to a variety of cases by profound reasonings from analogy. An officer, though he had passed his life in the field, was able to determine all legal controversies which could occur within the district committed to his charge; and his decisions were the most likely to meet with a prompt and ready obedience, from men who respected his person, and were accustomed to act under his command. The profit arising from punishments, which were then chiefly pecuniary, was another reason for his desiring to retain the judicial power; and when his fief became hereditary, this authority, which was essential to it, was also transmitted to his posterity. The counts, and other magistrates, whose power was merely official, were tempted, in imitation of the feudal lords, whom they resembled in so many particulars, to render their dignity perpetual and hereditary; and in the decline of the regal power, they found no difficulty in making good their pretensions. After this manner the vast fabric of feudal subordination became quite solid and comprehensive; it formed every where an essential part of the political constitution; and the Normans and other barons, who followed the fortunes of William, were so accustomed to it, that they could scarcely form an idea of any other species of civil government (p).

The Saxons who conquered England, as they exterminated the ancient inhabitants, and thought themselves secured by the sea against new invaders, found it less requisite to maintain themselves in a military posture: the quantity of land which they annexed to offices seems to have been of small value; and for that reason continued the longer in its original situation, and was always possessed during pleasure by those who were intrusted with the command. These conditions were too precarious to satisfy the Norman barons, who enjoyed more independent possessions and jurisdictions in their own country; and William was obliged, in the new distribution of land, to copy the tenures, which were now become universal on the continent. England of a sudden became a feudal kingdom (q); and received all the advantages, and was exposed to all the inconveniencies, incident to that species of civil polity.

According to the principles of the feudal law, the king was the supreme lord of the landed property: all posses-

(p) The ideas of the feudal government were so rooted, that even lawyers, in those ages, could not form a notion of any other constitution. Regnum (says Bracton, lib. 2. cap. 34.) quod ex comitatibus & baronibus dicitur esse constitutum.

sors, who enjoyed the fruits or revenue of any part of it, held those privileges, either mediately or immediately, of him; and their property was conceived to be, in some degree, conditional (r). The land was still apprehended to be a species of benefice, which was the original conception of a feudal property; and the vassal owed, in return for it, stated services to his baron, as the baron himself did for his land to the crown. The vassal was obliged to defend his baron in war; and the baron, at the head of his vassals, was bound to fight in defence of the king and kingdom. But besides these military services, which were casual, there were others imposed of a civil nature, which were more constant and durable.

The northern nations had no idea, that any man, trained up to honour, and inured to arms, was ever to be governed, without his own consent, by the absolute will of another; or that the administration of justice was ever to be exercised by the private opinion of any one magistrate, without the concurrence of some other persons, whose interest might induce them to check his arbitrary and iniquitous decisions. The king, therefore, when he found it necessary to demand any service of his barons or chief tenants, beyond what was due by their tenures, was obliged to assemble them, in order to obtain their consent: and when it was necessary to determine any controversy which might arise among the barons themselves, the question must be discussed in their presence, and be decided according to their opinion or advice. In these two circumstances of consent and advice, consisted chiefly the civil services of the ancient barons; and these implied all the considerable incidents of government. In one view, the barons regarded this attendance as their principal privilege; in another, as a grievous burden. That no momentous affairs could be transacted without their consent and advice, was in general esteemed the great security of their possessions and dignities: but as they reaped no immediate profit from their attendance at court, and were exposed to great inconvenience and charge by an absence from their own estates, every one was glad to exempt himself from each particular exertion of this power; and was pleased both that the call for that duty should seldom return upon him, and that others should undergo the burden in his stead. The king, on the other hand, was usually anxious, for several reasons, that the assembly of the barons should be full at every stated or casual meeting: this attendance was the chief badge of their subordination to his crown, and drew them from that independence which they were apt to affect in their own castles and manors; and where the meeting was thin or ill attended, its determinations had less authority, and commanded not so ready an obedience from the whole community.

The case was the same with the barons in their courts, as with the king in the supreme council of the nation. It was requisite to assemble the vassals, in order to determine by their vote any question which regarded the barony; and they sat along with the chief in all trials, whether civil or criminal, which occurred within the limits of their jurisdiction. They were bound to pay suit and service at the court of their baron; and as their tenure was military, and consequently honourable, they were admitted into his society, and partook of his friendship. Thus, a kingdom was considered only as a great barony, and a barony as a small kingdom. The barons were peers to each other in the national council, and, in some degree, companions to the king: the vassals were peers to each other in the court of barony, and companions to their baron (s).

But though this resemblance so far took place, the vassals, by the natural course of things, universally, in the feudal constitutions, fell into a greater subordination under the baron, than the baron himself under his sovereign; and these governments had a necessary and infallible tendency to augment the power of the nobles. The great chief, residing in his country-seat, which he was commonly allowed to fortify, lost, in a great measure, his connection or acquaintance with the prince; and added every day new force to his authority over the vassals of the barony. They received from him education in all military exercises: his hospitality invited them to live and enjoy society in his hall: their leisure, which was great, made them perpetual retainers on his person, and partakers of his country sports and amusements: they had no means of gratifying their ambition but by making a figure in his train: his favour and countenance was their greatest honour: his displeasure exposed them to contempt and ignominy: and they felt every moment the necessity of his protection, both in the controversies which occurred with other vassals, and, what was more material, in the daily inroads and injuries which were committed by the neighbouring barons. During the time of general war, the sovereign, who marched at the head of his armies, and was the great protector of the state, always acquired some accession to his authority, which he lost during the intervals of peace and tranquillity: but the loose police, incident to the feudal constitutions, maintained a perpetual, though secret hostility, between the several members of the state; and the vassals found no means of securing themselves against the injuries to which they were continually exposed, but by closely adhering to their chief, and falling into submissive dependence upon him.

If the feudal government was so little favourable to the true liberty even of the military vassal, it was still more destructive of the independence and security of the other members of the state, or what, in a proper sense, we call the people. A great part of them were serfs, and lived in a state of absolute slavery or villainage: the other inhabitants of the country paid their rent in services, which were in a great measure arbitrary; and they could expect no redress of injuries, in a court of barony, from men who thought they had a right to oppress and tyrannise over them: the towns were situated either within the demesnes of the king or the lands of the great barons, and were almost entirely subjected to the absolute will of their master. The languishing state of commerce kept the inhabitants poor and contemptible; and the political institutions were calculated to render that poverty perpetual. The barons and gentry, living in rustic plenty and hospitality, gave no encouragement to the arts, and had no demand for any of the more elaborate manufactures: every profession was held in contempt but that of arms: and if any merchant or manufacturer rose by industry and frugality to a degree of opulence, he found himself but the more exposed to injuries, from the envy and avidity of the military nobles.

These concurring causes gave the feudal governments so strong a bias towards aristocracy, that the royal authority was extremely eclipsed in all the European states; and, instead of dreading the growth of monarchial power, we might rather expect that the community would every where crumble into so many independent baronies, and lose the political union by which they were cemented. In elective monarchies, the event was commonly answerable to this expectation; and the barons, gaining ground on every vacancy of the throne, raised themselves almost to a state of sovereignty, and sacrificed to their power both the rights of the crown and the liberties of the people. But hereditary monarchies had a principle of authority which was not so easily subverted; and there were several causes which still maintained a degree of influence in the hands of the sovereign.

The greatest baron could never lose view entirely of those principles of the feudal constitution which bound him, as a vassal, to submission and fealty towards his prince; because he was every moment obliged to have recourse to those principles, in exacting fealty and submission from his own vassals. The lesser barons, finding that the annihilation of royal authority left them exposed, without protection, to the insults and injuries of more potent neighbours, naturally adhered to the crown, and promoted the execution of general and equal laws. The people had still a stronger interest to desire the grandeur of the sovereign; and the king, being the legal magistrate, who suffered by every internal convulsion or oppression, and who regarded the great nobles as his immediate rivals, assumed the salutary office of general guardian or protector of the commons. Besides the prerogatives with which the law invested him, his large demesnes and numerous retainers rendered him, in one sense, the greatest baron in the kingdom; and where he was possessed of personal vigour and abilities (for his situation required these advantages,) he was commonly able to preserve his authority, and maintain his station at the head of the community, and the chief fountain of law and justice.

The first kings of the Norman race were favoured by another circumstance, which preserved them from the encroachments of their barons. They were generals of a conquering army, which was obliged to continue in a military posture, and to maintain great subordination under their leader, in order to secure themselves from the revolt of the numerous natives, whom they had bereaved of all all their proporties and privileges. But though this circumstance supported the authority of William and his immediate successors, and rendered them extremely absolute, it was lost as soon as the Norman barons began to incorporate with the nation, to acquire a security in their possessions, and to fix their influence over their vassals, tenants, and slaves. And the immense fortunes which the Conqueror had bestowed on his chief captains, served to support their independence, and make them formidable to the sovereign (t). Sir Henry Spelman computes, that, in the large county of Norfolk, there were not, in the Conqueror's time, above sixty-six proprietors of land. Men, possessed of such princely revenues and jurisdictions, could not long be retained in the rank of subjects. The great earl Warrenne, in a subsequent reign, when he was questioned concerning his right to the lands which he possessed, drew his sword, which he produced as his title; adding, that William the Bastard did not conquer the kingdom himself; but that the barons, and his ancestor among the rest, were joint-adventurers in the enterprize (u).

The supreme legislative power of England was lodged in the king and great council, or what was afterwards called the parliament. It is not doubted but the archbishops, bishops, and most considerable abbots, were constituent members of this council. They sat by a double title: by prescription, as having always possessed that privilege, through the whole Saxon period, from the first establishment of Christianity; and by their right of baronage, as holding of the king in capite by military service. These two titles of the prelates were never accurately distinguished. When the usurpations of the church had risen to such a height, as to make the bishops affect a separate dominion, and regard their seat in parliament as a degradation of their episcopal dignity; the king insisted that they were barons, and, on that account, obliged by the general principles of the feudal law, to attend him in his great councils (v). Yet there still remained some practices, which supposed their title to be derived merely from ancient possession: when a bishop was elected, he sat in parliament before the king had made him restitution of his temporalities; and during the vacancy of a see, the guardian of the spiritualities was summoned to attend along with the bishops.

The barons were another constituent part of the great council of the nation. These held immediately of the crown by a military tenure: they were the most honourable members of the state, and had a right to be consulted in all public deliberations: they were the immediate vassals of the crown, and owed as a service their attendance in the court of their supreme lord. A resolution taken without their consent was likely to be but ill executed: and no determination of any cause or controversy among them had any validity, where the vote and advice of the body did not concur. The dignity of earl or count was official and territorial, as well as hereditary; and as all the earls were also barons, they were considered as military vassals of the crown, were admitted in that capacity into the general council, and formed the most honourable and powerful branch of it.

But there was another class of the immediate military tenants of the crown, no less, or probably more, numerous than the barons, the tenants in capite by knights service; and these, however inferior in power or property, held by a tenure which was equally honourable with that of the others. A barony was commonly composed of several knights fees: and though the number seems not to have been exactly defined, seldom consisted of less than fifty hydes of land (w): but where a man held of the king only one or two knights fees, he was still an immediate vassal of the crown, and as such had a title to have a seat in the general councils. But as this attendance was usually esteemed a burthen, and one too great for a man of slender fortune to bear constantly; it is probable that, though he had a title, if he pleased, to be admitted, he was not obliged, by any penalty, like the barons, to pay a regular attendance. All the immediate military tenants of the crown amounted not fully to seven hundred, when Domesday Book was framed; and as the members were well pleased, on any pretext, to excuse themselves from attendance, the assembly was never likely to become too numerous for the dispatch of public business.

So far the nature of a general council, or ancient parliament, is determined without any doubt or controversy. The only question seems to be with regard to the commons, or the representatives of counties and boroughs; whether they were also, in more early times, constituent parts of parliament? this question was once disputed in England with great acrimony: but such is the force of time and evidence, that they can sometimes prevail even over faction; and the question seems, by general consent, and even by their own, to be at last determined against the ruling party. It is agreed that the commons were no part of the great council, till some ages after the conquest; and that the military tenants alone of the crown composed that supreme and legislative assembly.

The vassals of a baron were by their tenure immediately dependant on him, owed attendance at his court, and paid all their duty to the king, through that dependance which their lord was obliged by his tenure to acknowledge to to his sovereign and superior. Their land, comprehended in the barony, was represented in parliament by the baron himself, who was supposed, according to the fictions of the feudal law, to possess the direct property of it, and it would have been deemed incongruous to give it any other representation. They stood in the same capacity to him, that he and the other barons did to the king: the former were peers of the barony; the latter were peers of the realm: the vassals possessed a subordinate rank within their district; the baron enjoyed a superior dignity in the great assembly: they were in some degree his companions at home; he the king's companion at court: and nothing can be more evidently repugnant to all feudal ideas, and to that gradual subordination which was essential to those ancient institutions, than to imagine that the king would apply either for the advice or consent of men, who were of a rank so much inferior, and whose duty was immediately paid to the mesne lord that was interposed between them and the throne (x).

If it be unreasonable to think that the vassals of a barony, though their tenure was military and noble and honourable, were ever summoned to give their opinion in national councils, much less can it be supposed, that the tradesmen or inhabitants of boroughs, whose condition was so much inferior, would be admitted to that privilege. It appears from Domesday, that the greatest boroughs were, at the time of the conquest, scarcely more than country villages; and that the inhabitants lived in entire dependance on the king or great lords, and were of a station little better than servile (y). They were not then so much as incorporated; they formed no community; were not regarded as a body politic; and being really nothing but a number of low dependent tradesmen, living without any particular civil tie, in neighbourhood together, they were incapable of being represented in the states of the kingdom. Even in France, a country which made more early advances in arts and civility than in England, the first corporation is sixty years posterior to the conquest under the duke of Normandy; and the erecting of these communities was an invention of Louis le Gros, in order to free the people from slavery under the lords, and to give them protection, by means of certain privileges and a separate jurisdiction (z). An ancient French writer calls them a new and wicked device, to procure liberty to slaves, and encourage them in shaking off the dominion of their masters (a). The famous charter, as it is called, of the conqueror to the city of London, though granted at a time when he assumed the appearance of gentleness and lenity, is nothing but a letter of protection, and a declaration that the citizens should not be treated as slaves (b). By the English feudal law, the superior lord was prohibited from marrying his female ward to a burgess or a villan (c); so near were these two ranks esteemed to each other, and so much inferior to the nobility and gentry. possessing the advantages of birth, riches, civil powers and privileges, the nobles and gentlemen alone were armed, a circumstance which gave them a mighty superiority, in an age when nothing but the military profession was honourable, and when the loose execution of laws gave so much encouragement to open violence, and rendered it so decisive in all disputes and controversies (d).

The great similarity among the feudal governments of Europe is well known to every man that has any acquaintance with ancient history; and the antiquaries of all foreign countries, where the question was never embarrassed by party disputes, have allowed, that the commons came very late to be admitted to a share in the legislative power. In Normandy particularly, whose constitution was most likely to be William's model in raising his new fabric of English government, the states were entirely composed of the clergy and nobility; and the first incorporated boroughs or communities of that duchy were Roüen and Falaise, which enjoyed their privileges by a grant of Philip Augustus in the year 1207 (e). All the ancient English historians, when they mention the great council of the nation, call it an assembly of the baronage, nobility, or great men; and none of their expressions, though several hundred passages might be produced, can, without the utmost violence, be tortured to a meaning which will admit the commons to be constituent members of that body (f). If in the long period of two hundred years, which elapsed between the Conquest and the latter end of Henry III. and which abounded in factions, revolutions, and convulsions of all kinds, the house of commons never performed one single legislative act so considerable as to be once mentioned by any of the numerous historians of that age, they must have been totally insignificant: and in that case, what reason can be assigned for their ever being assembled? Can it be supposed, that men of so little weight or importance possessed a negative voice against the king and the barons? Every page of the subsequent histories discovers their existence; though these histories are not written with greater accuracy than the preceding ones, and indeed scarcely equal them in that particular. The Magna Charta of king John provides, that no scutage or aid should be imposed, either on the land or towns, but by consent of the great council; and for more security, it enumerates the persons entitled to a seat in that assembly, the prelates and immediate tenants of the crown, without any mention of the commons: an authority so full, certain, and explicit, that nothing but the zeal of party could ever have procured credit to any contrary hypothesis (g).

It was probably the example of the French barons which first emboldened the English to require greater independence from their sovereign: it is also probable, that the boroughs and corporations of England were established in imitation of those of France. It may, therefore, be proposed as no unlikely conjecture, that both the chief privileges of the peers in England, and the liberty of the commons were originally the growth of that foreign country.

In ancient times, men were little solicitous to obtain a place in the legislative assemblies; and rather regarded their attendance as a burden, which was not compensated by any return of profit or honour proportionate to the trouble and expence. The only reason for instituting those public councils was, on the part of the subject, that they

(f) Sometimes the historians mention the people, populus, as a part of the parliament; but they always mean the laity, in opposition to the clergy. Sometimes the word communitas is found; but it always means communitas baronagii. These points are clearly proved by Dr. Brady. There is also mention sometimes made of a crowd or multitude that thronged into the great council on particular interesting occasions; but as deputies from boroughs are never once spoke of, the proof, that they had not then any existence, becomes the more certain and undeniable. These never could make a crowd, as they must have had a regular place assigned them, if they had made a regular part of the legislative body. There were only one hundred and thirty boroughs who received writs of summons from Edward I. It is expressly said in Gesta Reg. Steph. p. 932. that it was usual for the populace, vulgus, to crowd into the great councils; where they were plainly mere spectators, and could only gratify their curiosity.

(g) Such are the arguments made use of by the celebrated Mr. Hume against the existence of the commons, which we have chosen to give in his own words, that the reader may be able to judge of the validity of those arguments, when contrasted with the following, in which we have taken a candid view of the subject:

Under the Anglo-Saxons, the great council, or wittena gemot, possessed, in conjunction with the king, the sovereignty of the state. In this assembly, laws were enacted for the whole community, taxes were imposed, and the most important points of polity were discussed and determined. With respect to the members who composed this council, such doubts have arisen among historians and antiquaries as perhaps can hardly be resolved at this distance of time. Many writers of reputation have confined to the nobility the right of attendance in the wittena gemot; and others, without a due examination of the subject, have supposed a doctrine maintained by celebrated names. But when we find that the principal advocates for the exclusion of the commons from the Anglo-Saxon legislature, are persons who, in other respects, have proved themselves unfriendly to the cause of liberty, and to the just claims of the people, we shall be the less inclined to pay an implicit deference to their opinions, or to receive with undiscerning acquiescence what may appear to be the dictates of party or the conclusions of prejudice.

It is acknowledged, by every writer of eminence, that the Saxons preserved, after their settlement in this island, the same customs and institutions which they had followed on the continent. We are informed by an historian of undoubted credit and ability, that, among the states of Germany, the freemen in general had the right of assembling in the national council, and of joining with the nobility in the discussion of matters of superior importance, while affairs of smaller moment were determined by the nobles alone. Tacitus, de Moribus Germanicus, cap. xi. says, "De minoribus rebus principes consultant, de majoribus omnes; ita tamen, ut ea quoque, quorum penes plebum arbitrium est, apud principes pertractentur." From this single authority, we are justified in inferring the presence of the commons, not only in the councils of the Heptarchy, but in those of the subsequent monarchy. Is it reasonable to suppose that a high spirited and victorious people would abandon, in the establishment of colonies in a conquered country, the grand rampart of general liberty, when no cause or pretence offered itself for such dereliction?

The expressions used by our earlier writers when they mention the public councils, are for the most part such as seem to favour the idea of excluding the commons; but the monks not being remarkably accurate in their modes of speech, may have included under one pompous appellation (as, principes, magnates, proceres, optimates, &c.) not only the nobles, who were more particularly entitled to such a style, but such of the gentry as had been deputed by the land-holders and freemen of the realm to represent them in the wittena gemot. The persons thus delegated acquired a temporary superiority over those members of the community who were not the objects of representative choice, and might, without much distortion of signification, be comprehended under the general denomination of the principal or the greatest men of the kingdom.

But, though there is reason to conclude, that individuals answering to our present gentry were admitted to a seat in the national assemblies, we are not inclined to carry this idea so far as to suppose, with some authors, that persons so inconsiderable as the heads of tithings sat as representatives of the ten families under their jurisdiction; a circumstance which would not only have rendered the councils too numerous, but would have been an unnecessary extension of the popular interference in the legislature. It is probable, however, that the hundredary, or magistrate of the hundred, was admitted to the privilege of representing that division of a county; and that the chief magistrate of a great town was honoured with a similar trust. We are expressly informed, that a ceorl who possessed five hides of land was regarded as a thane, and had a right to a seat in the wittena gemot. As it can hardly be contended that all who had acquired that property were nobles in the strict sense, for they ought rather to be classed among the gentry, we may consider them as corresponding in some measure with our present idea of the commons. And though the estate of qualification seems to have been considerably enlarged before the Conquest, it does not thence follow that the governing magistrates of towns and of hundreds, who, if they really sat in the wittena gemot, were admitted in consequence of their office, or were excluded.

The power of this assembly not only extended to the principal acts of government and legislation, but even to the deposition of such sovereigns as were guilty of flagrant violations of the rights of their subjects. We learn, that Sigebert, king of Wessex, was deposed, for his tyranny and barbarity, by the states of his realm. See the Saxon Chronicle for the year 755, and Henry of Huntingdon, book iv.

Although the greatest caution ought to be used in the exercise of this right of removing a tyrant from his throne, the act itself is justifiable on the principles of reason. Whatever may be advanced, in opposition to this doctrine, by the bigots of indefeasible right, and however strong may be their deprecation of the dangers that may arise from inculcating such an idea into the public mind, the right of deposition seems to exist in the collective body of every state, though it should only be enforced in cases of extreme necessity. Government was manifestly intended for the protection and benefit of the whole community, not for the gratification of the vanity, ambition, caprice, avarice, or despotism of the ruling individual. Without discussing the subject of an original contract between the governor and the governed, we may conclude, that a reciprocity was adopted in the original formation of monarchies or states; that the ties of submission and allegiance were supposed to be requited by the obligations of justice, moderation, and equity, on the part of the rulers; and that flagrant violations of these duties authorize a revocation of that power which was only a trust for the public weal, and which, when grossly abused, ought to be transferred to other hands. Mr. Burke, in his celebrated pamphlet on the French Revolution, remarks, that "the question of dethroning kings will always be, as it has always been, an extraordinary question of state, and wholly out of the law; a question (like all other questions of state) of dispositions, and of means, and of probable consequences, rather than of positive rights. As it was not made for common abuses, so it is not to be agitated by common minds. The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end, and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable." But the faintness of this metaphysical line is of little consequence. Gross and continued acts of tyranny and injustice will appear, even to ordinary minds, as the only grounds of resistance; and few civilized communities will even think of aiming at the removal of their sovereign without being justified by such a series of the most unequivocal acts of oppression and iniquity, as must supersede all doubts respecting the termination of the line of boundary.

desired some security from the attempts of arbitrary power; and on the part of the sovereign, that he despaired of governing men of such independent spirits without their own consent and concurrence. But the commons, or the inhabitants of boroughs, had not as yet reached such a degree of consideration as to desire security against their prince, or to imagine, that even if they were assembled in a representative body, they had power or rank sufficient to enforce it. The only protection which they aspired to, was against the immediate violence and injustice of their fellow-citizens; and this advantage each of them looked for from the courts of justice, or from the authority of some great lord, to whom by law or his own choice he was attached. On the other hand, the sovereign was sufficiently assured of obedience in the whole community, if he procured the concurrence of the nobles; nor had he reason to apprehend that any order of the state could resist his and their united authority. The military sub-vassals could entertain no idea of opposing both their prince and their superiors: the burgesses and tradesmen could much less aspire to such a thought: and thus, even if history were silent on the head, we have reason to conclude, from the known situation of society during those ages, that the commons were never admitted as members of the legislative body.

The executive power of the Anglo-Norman government was lodged in the king. Besides the stated meetings of the national council at the three great festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide (h), he was accustomed, on any sudden exigence, to summon them together. He could at his pleasure command the attendance of his barons and their vassals, in which consisted the military force of the kingdom; and could employ them, during forty days, either in resisting a foreign enemy, or reducing his rebellious subjects. And, what was of great importance, the whole judicial power was ultimately in his hands, and was exercised by officers and ministers of his appointment.

Notwithstanding the assertion of Mr. Hume to the contrary, as before mentioned, it was in the reign of Henry the Third, that the commons, beyond all doubt, were admitted to a seat in the national council; and there is even some reason to believe that they took part in the legislature even before that period. When Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, had rendered himself master of the government, he summoned to parliament, in addition to the nobility, two knights for each shire, and the same number of representatives from the principal cities and boroughs of the realm. This was done in January, 1265, the forty-ninth year of the reign of Henry III. It does not appear that the commons, on this occasion sat, in a different hall from the superior members of the legislative body; and indeed historians have not ascertained the precise time of their meeting in separate apartments, as distinct houses of parliament.

In this and the following reign, the forms of the parliamentary constitution underwent occasional fluctuations. Sometimes that assembly was composed only of noblemen and knights of shires; at other times citizens and burgesses were summoned. At one time, two knights were chosen for each county; at another period, three and even four. In one of the parliaments of Edward I. no clergymen were present; while, on a different occasion, not only the prelates and abbots, but archdeacons and representatives of the inferior clergy, were admitted (i).

The parliamentary sessions, at this period, were generally very short. The members in general were not strongly attached to the discussion of national business; and their impatience to return to their respective provinces induced them to leave many affairs unsettled, which were afterwards determined by the king and his privy council.

In the reigns of Edward II. and III. an irregularity continued to prevail in the meeting and constitution of parliament. When those princes wished only to consult the nobility, they issued no writs for the election of knights, citizens, or burgesses; but when they desired the general advice and contributions both of the lords and commons, they summoned a full parliament. From the turbulence of the age, we may suppose that those meetings were not attended with that order and decorum which are now observed in our parliamentary assemblies.

The great power and influence of the nobility kept the commons, even after their full establishment, in a state of humble inferiority; but being courted by successive kings, who wished to employ them as a check on the haughty barons, they gradually acquired that respectability and importance which they now enjoy, forming a very valuable branch of our system of government, and contributing to the perfection of that mixed constitution which has met with such general admiration, and which the philosophers of antiquity regarded as a desideratum in the politics of the world.

The general plan of the Anglo-Norman government was, that the court of barony was appointed to decide such controversies as arose between the several vassals or subjects of the same barony; the hundred-court and county-court, which were still continued as during the Saxon times (k), to judge between the subjects of different baronies (l); and the curia regis, or king's court, to give sentence among the barons themselves (m). But this plan, though simple, was attended with some circumstances which, being derived from a very extensive authority assumed by the Conqueror, contributed to increase the royal prerogative; and as long as the state was not disturbed by arms, reduced every order of the community to some degree of dependance and subordination.

The king himself often sat in his court, which always attended his person (n): he there heard causes and pronounced judgement (o); and though he was assisted by the advice of the other members, it is not to be imagined that a decision could easily be obtained contrary to his inclination or opinion. In his absence the chief justiciary presided, who was the first magistrate in the state, and a kind of viceroy, on whom depended all the civil affairs of the kingdom (p). The other chief officers of the crown, the constable, mareschal, seneschal, chamberlain, treasurer, and chancellor (q), were members, together with such feudal barons as thought proper to attend, and the barons of the Exchequer, who at first were also feudal barons appointed by the king (r). This court, which was sometimes called the king's court, sometimes the court of Exchequer, judged in all causes, civil and criminal, and comprehended the whole business which is now shared out among four courts, the Chancery, the King's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer (s).

Such an accumulation of powers was itself a great source of authority, and rendered the jurisdiction of the court formidable to all the subjects; but the turn which judicial trials took soon after the Conquest, served still more to increase its authority, and to augment the royal prerogatives. William, among the other violent changes which he attempted and effected, had introduced the Norman law into England (t), had ordered all the pleadings to be in that tongue, and had interwoven, with the English jurisprudence, all the maxims and principles which the Normans, more advanced in cultivation, and naturally litigious, were accustomed to observe in the distribution of justice. Law now became a science, which at first fell entirely into the hands of the Normans; and which, even after it was communicated to the English, required so much study and application, that the laity, in those ignorant ages, were incapable of attaining it, and it was a mystery almost solely confined to the clergy, and chiefly to the monks (u). The great officers of the crown, and the feudal barons, (l) None of the feudal governments in Europe had such institutions as the county courts, which the great authority of the Conqueror still retained from the Saxon customs. All the freeholders of the county, even the greatest barons, were obliged to attend the sheriffs in these courts, and to assist them in the administration of justice. By these means they received frequent and sensible admonitions of their dependence on the king or supreme magistrate: they formed a kind of community with their fellow barons and freeholders: they were often drawn from their individual and independent state, peculiar to the feudal system; and were made members of a political body: and, perhaps, this institution of county-courts in England has had greater effects on the government than has yet been distinctly pointed out by historians, or traced by antiquaries. The barons were never able to free themselves from this attendance on the sheriffs and itinerant justices till the reign of Henry III.

who were military men, found themselves unfit to penetrate into those obscurities; and though they were entitled to a seat in the supreme judicature, the business of the court was wholly managed by the chief justiciary and the law barons, who were men appointed by the king, and entirely at his disposal (v). This natural course of things was forwarded by the multiplicity of business which flowed into that court, and which daily augmented by the appeals from all the subordinate judicatures of the kingdom.

In the Saxon times, no appeal was received in the king's court, except upon the denial or delay of justice by the inferior courts; and the same practice was still observed in most of the feudal kingdoms of Europe. But the great power of the Conqueror established at first in England an authority which the monarchs in France were not able to attain till the reign of St. Louis, who lived nearly two centuries after: he empowered his court to receive appeals both from the courts of barony and the county-courts, and by that means brought the administration of justice ultimately into the hands of the sovereign (w). And lest the expence or trouble of a journey to court should discourage suitors, and make them acquiesce in the decision of the inferior judicatures, itinerant judges were afterwards established, who made their circuits throughout the kingdom, and tried all causes that were brought before them (x). By this expedient the courts of barony were kept in awe; and if they still preserved some influence, it was only from the apprehensions which the vassals might entertain of disobliging their superior, by appealing from his jurisdiction. But the county-courts were much discredited; and as the freeholders were found ignorant of the intricate principles and forms of the new law, the lawyers gradually brought all business before the king's judges, and abandoned the ancient simple and popular judicature. After this manner the formalities of justice, which, though they appear tedious and cumbersome, are found requisite to the support of liberty in all monarchical governments proved at first, by a combination of causes, very advantageous to royal authority in England.

We shall here lay before our readers the most authentic account of the revenue of the crown we are able to collect, from the time of the Normans.

The power of the Norman kings was supported by a great revenue; and that revenue was fixed, perpetual, and independent of the subject. The people, without betaking themselves to arms, had no check upon the king, and no regular security for the due administration of justice. In those days of violence, many instances of oppression passed unheeded; and soon after were openly pleaded as precedents, which it was unlawful to dispute or control. Princes and ministers were too ignorant to be themselves sensible of the advantages attending an equitable administration; and there was no established council or assembly which could protect the people, and, by withdrawing supplies, regularly and peaceably admonish the king of his duty, and ensure the execution of the laws.

The first branch of the king's stated revenue was the royal demesnes or crown lands, which were very extensive, and comprehended, beside a great number of manors, most of the chief cities of the kingdom. It was established by law that the king could alienate no part of his demesne, and that he himself or his successor could at any time resume such donations (y): but this law was never regularly observed; which happily rendered in time the crown somewhat more dependent. The rent of the crown-lands, considered merely as so much riches, was a source of power: the influence of the king over his tenants and the inhabitants of his towns, increased this power: but the other numerous branches of his revenue, besides supplying his treasury, gave, by their nature, an almost unbounded latitude to arbitrary authority, and were a support of the prerogative; as will appear from an enumeration of them.

The king was never content with the fixed rents, but levied heavy talliages at pleasure on the inhabitants both of town and country, who lived within his demesnes. All bargains of sale, in order to prevent theft, being prohibited, except in boroughs and public markets (z), he pretended to exact tolls on all goods which were there sold (a). He seized two hogsheads, one before and one behind the mast, from every vessel that imported wine. All goods paid to his customs a proportional part of their value (b): passage over bridges and on rivers was loaded with tolls at pleasure (c): and though the boroughs by degrees bought the liberty of farming these impositions, yet the revenue profited by these bargains; new sums were often exacted for the renewal and confirmation of their charters (d), and the people were by these means held in perpetual dependence. Such was the situation of the inhabitants within the royal demesnes. But the possessors of land, or the military tenants, though better protected both by law and by the privilege of carrying arms, were, from the nature of their tenures, much exposed to the inroads of power, and possessed not what we should esteem, in our age, a very durable security. The Conqueror ordained that the barons should be obliged to pay nothing beyond their stated services (e), except a reasonable aid to ransom his person if he were taken in war, to make his eldest son a knight, and to marry his eldest daughter. What should on these occasions be deemed a reasonable aid, was not determined; and the demands of the crown were so far discretionary.

The king could require in war the personal attendance of his vassals, that is, of almost all the landed proprietors; and if they declined the service, they were obliged to pay him a composition in money, which was called a scutage. The sum was, during some reigns, precarious and uncertain; it was sometimes levied without allowing the vassal the liberty of personal service (f); and it was a usual artifice of the king's to pretend an expedition, that he might be entitled to levy the scutage from his military tenants. Danegelt was another species of land-tax levied by the early Norman kings, arbitrarily, and contrary to the laws of the Conqueror (g). Moneyage was also a general land-tax of the same nature, levied by the two first Norman kings, and abolished by the charter of Henry I (h). It was a shilling paid every three years by each hearth, to induce the king not to use his prerogative in debasing the coin. Indeed it appears from that charter, that though the Conqueror had granted his military tenants an immunity from all taxes and talliages, he and his son William had never thought themselves bound to observe that rule, but had levied impositions at pleasure on all the landed estates of the kingdom. The utmost that Henry grants is, that the land cultivated by the military tenant himself shall not be so burdened; but he reserves the power of taxing the farmers: and as it is known that Henry's charter was never observed in any one article, we may be assured that this prince and his successors retracted even this small indulgence, and levied arbitrary impositions on the lands of their subjects. On account of the heaviness of these taxes, Malmesbury tells us, that the farmers, in the reign of William Rufus, abandoned tillage, and a famine ensued (i).

The escheats were a great branch both of power and of revenue, especially during the first reigns after the Conquest. In default of posterity from the first baron, his land reverted to the crown, and continually augmented the king's possessions. The prince had indeed by law a power of alienating these escheats; but by this means he had an opportunity of establishing the fortunes of his friends and servants, and thereby enlarging his authority. Sometimes he retained them in his own hands; and they were gradually confounded with the royal demesnes, and became difficult to be distinguished from them. This confusion is probably the reason why the king acquired the right of alienating his demesnes.

Besides escheats from default of heirs, those which ensued from crimes or breach of duty towards the superior lord, were frequent in ancient times. If the vassal, being thrice summoned to attend his superior's court, and do fealty, neglected or refused obedience, he forfeited all title to his land (k). If he denied his tenure, or refused his service, he was exposed to the same penalty (l). If he sold his estate without licence from his lord (m), or if he sold it upon any other tenure or title than that by which he himself held it (n), he lost all right to it. The adhering to his lord's enemies (o), deserting him in war (p), betraying his secrets (q), debauching his wife, or his near relations (r), or even using indecent freedoms with them (s), might be punished by forfeiture. The higher crimes, rapes, robbery, murder, arson, &c. were called felony; and being interpreted want of fidelity to his lord, made him lose his fief (t). Even where the felon was vassal to a baron, though his immediate lord enjoyed the forfeiture, the king might retain possession of his estate during a twelvemonth, and had the right of spoiling and destroying it, unless the baron paid him a reasonable composition (u). We have not here enumerated all the species of felonies, or of crimes by which forfeiture was incurred: we have said enough to prove, that the possession of feudal property was anciently somewhat precarious, and that the primary idea was never lost, of its being a kind of fee or benefice.

When a baron died, the king immediately took possession of the estate; and the heir, before he recovered his right, was obliged to make application to the crown, and desire that he might be admitted to do homage for his land, and pay a composition to the king. This composition was not at first fixed by law, at least by practice: the king was often exorbitant in his demands, and kept possession of the land till they were complied with.

If the heir were a minor, the king retained the whole profit of the estate till his majority; and might grant what sum he thought proper for the education and maintenance of the young baron. This practice was founded on the notion that a fief was a benefice, and that while the heir could not perform his military services, the revenue devolved to the superior, who employed another in his stead. It is obvious, that a great proportion of the landed property must, by means of this device, be continually in the hands of the prince, and that all the noble families were thereby held in perpetual dependance. When the king granted the wardship of a rich heir to any one, he had the opportunity of enriching a favourite or minister: if he sold it, he thereby levied a considerable sum of money. Simon de Montfort paid Henry III. ten thousand marks, an immense sum in those days, for the wardship of Gilbert de Umfreville (v). Geoffrey de Mandeville paid to the same prince the sum of twenty thousand marks, that he might marry Isabel countess of Gloucester, and possess all her lands and knights fees. This sum would be equivalent to three hundred thousand, perhaps four hundred thousand pounds in our time (w).

If the heir were a female, the king was entitled to offer her any husband of her rank he thought proper; and if she refused him, she forfeited her land. Even a male heir could not marry without the royal consent: and it was usual for men to pay large sums for the liberty of making their own choice in marriage (x). No man could dispose of his land, either by sale or will, without the consent of his superior. The possessor was never considered as full proprietor: he was still a kind of beneficiary; and could not oblige his superior to accept of any vassal that was not agreeable to him.

Fines, amerciaments, and oblatas, as they were called, were another considerable branch of the royal power and revenue. The ancient records of the Exchequer, which are still preserved, give surprising accounts of the numerous fines and amerciaments levied in those days (y), and of the strange inventions to exact money from the subject. It appears that the ancient kings of England put themselves entirely on the foot of the barbarous eastern princes, whom no man must approach without a present, who sell all their good offices, and who intrude themselves into every business that they may have a pretence for extorting money. Even justice was avowedly bought and sold; the king's court itself, though the supreme judicature of the kingdom, was open to none that brought not presents to the king; the bribes given for the expedition, delay (z), suspension, and, doubtless, for the perversion of justice, were entered in the public registers of the royal revenue, and remain as monuments of the perpetual iniquity and tyranny of the times. The barons of the Exchequer, for instance, the first nobility of the kingdom, were not ashamed to insert, as an article in their records, that the county of Norfolk paid a sum that they might be fairly dealt with (a); the borough of Yarmouth, that the king's charters, which they have for their liberties, might not be violated (b); Richard, son of Gilbert, for the king's helping him to recover his debt from the Jews (c); Serlo, son of Terlawaston, that he might be permitted to make his defence, in case he were accused of a certain homicide (d); Walter de Burton, for free law, if accused of wounding another (e); Robert de Essart, for having an inquest to find whether Roger the butcher, and Wace and Humphrey, accused him of robbery and theft out of envy and ill-will, or not (f); William Bathurst, for having an inquest to find whether he were accused of the death of one Godwin, out of ill-will, or for just cause (g). We have selected these few instances from a great number of a like kind, which Madox had selected from a still greater number, preserved in the ancient rolls of the exchequer (h).

Sometimes the party litigant offered the king a certain portion, a half, a third, a fourth, payable out of the debts which he, as the executor of justice, should assist him in recovering (i). Theophania de Westland agreed to pay the half of two hundred and twelve marks, that she might recover that sum against James de Eughleston (k); Solomon the Jew engaged to pay one mark out of every seven that he should recover against Hugh de la Hose (l); Nicholas Morrel promised to pay sixty pounds, that the earl of Flanders might be distrained to pay him three hundred and forty-three pounds, which the earl had taken from him; and these sixty pounds were to be paid out of the first money that Nicholas should recover from the earl (m).

As the king assumed the entire power over trade, he was to be paid for a permission to exercise commerce or industry of any kind (n). Hugh Oisel paid four hundred marks for liberty to trade in England (o): Nigel de Havene gave fifty marks for the partnership in merchandise which he had with Gervase de Hanton (p): the men of Worcester paid one hundred shillings, that they might have the liberty of selling and buying dyed cloth as formerly (q): several other towns paid for a like liberty (r). The commerce indeed of the kingdom was so much under the control of the king, that he erected gilds, corporations, and monopolies wherever he pleased; and levied sums for these exclusive privileges (s).

There were no profits so small as to be below the king's attention. Henry, son of Arthur, gave ten dogs to have a recognition against the countess of Copland for one knight's fee (t). Roger, son of Nicholas, gave twenty lampreys and twenty shads for an inquest, to find whether Gilbert, son of Alured, gave to Roger two hundred muttons to obtain his confirmation for certain lands, or whether Roger took them from him by violence (u): Geoffrey Fitz-Pierre, the chief justiciary, gave two good Norway hawks, that Walter le Madine might have leave to export a hundred weight of cheese out of the king's dominions (v).

It is really amusing to remark the strange business in which the king sometimes interfered, and never without a present: the wife of Hugh de Neville gave the king two hundred hens, that she might lie with her husband one night (w); and she brought with her two sureties, who answered each for a hundred hens. It is probable that her husband was a prisoner, which debarred her from having access to him. The abbot of Rucford paid ten marks for leave to erect houses and place men upon his land near Welhang, in order to secure his wood there from being stolen (x): Hugh archdeacon of Wells gave one tun of wine for leave to carry six hundred of corn whither he would (y): Peter de Peraris gave twenty marks for leave to salt fishes, as Peter Chevalier used to do (z).

It

It was usual also to pay high fines, in order to gain the king's good-will, or mitigate his anger. In the reign of Henry II. Gilbert, the son of Fergus, fines in nine hundred and nineteen pounds nine shillings to obtain that prince's favour; William de Chataignes a thousand marks, that he would remit his displeasure. In the reign of Henry III. the city of London fines in no less a sum than twenty thousand pounds on the same account (a). The king's protection and good offices of every kind were likewise bought and sold. Robert Grislet paid twenty marks of silver, that the king would help him against the earl of Mortaigne in a certain plea (b): Robert de Cundet gave thirty marks of silver that the king would bring him to an accord with the bishop of Lincoln (c): Ralph de Breckham gave a hawk, that the king would protect him (d); and this is a very frequent reason for payments: John, son of Ordgar, gave a Norway hawk to have the king's request to the king of Norway to let him have his brother Godard's chattels (e): Richard de Neville gave twenty palfreys to obtain the king's request to Isolda Bisset, that she should take him for a husband (f): Roger Fitz-Walter gave three good palfreys to have the king's letter to Roger Betram's mother, that she should marry him (g): Eling, the dean paid one hundred marks, that his whore and his children might be let out upon bail (h): the bishop of Winchester gave one tun of good wine for his not putting the king in mind to give a girdle to the countess of Albemarle (i): Robert de Veaux gave five of the best palfreys, that the king would hold his tongue about Henry Pinel's wife (k). There are, in the records of Exchequer, many other singular instances of a similar nature (l). It will however be just to remark, that the same ridiculous practices and dangerous abuses prevailed in Normandy, and probably in all the other states of Europe (m); so that we may conclude that England was not, in this respect, more barbarous than the neighbouring powers.

These iniquitous practices of the Norman kings were so well known, that on the death of Hugh Bigod, in the reign of Henry II. the best and most just of these princes, the eldest son and the widow of this nobleman came to court, and strove, by offering large presents to the king, each of them to acquire possession of that rich inheritance. The king was so equitable as to order the cause to be tried by the great council! but in the mean time he seized all the money and treasure of the deceased (n). Peter of Blois, a judicious and even an elegant writer for that age, gives a pathetic description of the venality of justice, and the oppressions of the poor under the reign of Henry: and he scruples not to complain to the king himself of these abuses (o). We may judge what the case would be under the government of worse princes. The articles of enquiry concerning the conduct of sheriffs, which Henry promulgated in 1170, shew the great power, as well as the licentiousness of these officers (p).

Amerciaments or fines for crimes and trespasses were another considerable branch of the royal revenue (q). Most crimes were atoned for by money; the fines imposed were not limited by any rule or statute; and frequently occasioned the total ruin of the person, even for the slightest trespasses. The forest laws, particularly, were a great source of oppression. The king possessed sixty-eight forests, thirteen chaces, and seven hundred and eighty-one parks, in different parts of England (r); and, considering the extreme passion of the English and Normans for hunting, these were so many snares laid for the people, by which they were allured into trespasses, and brought within the reach of arbitrary and rigorous law, which the king had thought proper to enact by his own authority.

But the most barefaced acts of tyranny and oppression were practised against the Jews, who were entirely out of the protection of law, were extremely odious from the bigotry of the people, and were abandoned to the immeasurable rapacity of the king and his ministers. Besides many other indignities to which they were continually exposed, it appears that they were once all thrown into prison, and the sum of sixty-six thousand marks exacted for their liberty (s): at another time, Isaac the Jew paid alone five thousand one hundred marks (t); Brun, three thousand marks (u); Jernet, two thousand, Bennet, five hundred: at another, Licorica, widow of David the Jew of Oxford, was required to pay six thousand marks; and she was delivered over to six of the richest and discreetest Jews in England, who were to answer for the sum (v). Henry III. borrowed five thousand marks from the earl of Cornwall; and for his repayment consigned over to him all the Jews in England (w). The revenue arising from exactions upon this nation was so considerable, that there was a particular court of Exchequer set apart for managing it (x).

We may judge concerning the low state of commerce among the English, when the Jews, notwithstanding these oppressions, could still find their account in trading among them, and lending them money. And as the improvements of agriculture were also much checked by the immense possessions of the nobility, by the disorders of the times, and by the precarious state of feudal property, it appears that industry of no kind could then have place in the kingdom (y).

It is asserted by Sir Harry Spelman (z), as an undoubted truth, that, during the reigns of the first Norman princes, every edict of the king, issued with the consent of his privy council, had the full force of law. But the barons, surely, were not so passive as to entrust a power, entirely arbitrary and despotic, into the hands of the sovereign. It only appears, that the constitution had not fixed any precise boundaries to the royal power; that the right of issuing proclamations on any emergence, and of exacting obedience to them, a right which was always supposed inherent in the crown, is very difficult to be distinguished from a legislative authority; that the extreme imperfection of the ancient laws, and the sudden exigencies which often occurred in such turbulent governments, obliged the prince to exert frequently the latent powers of his prerogative; that he naturally proceeded, from the acquiescence of the people, to assume, in many particulars of moment, an authority from which he had excluded himself by express statutes, charters, or concessions, and which was, in the main, repugnant to the general genius of the constitution; and that the lives, the personal liberty, and the properties of all his subjects, were less secured by law against the exertion of his arbitrary authority, than by the independent power and private connections of each individual. It appears from the Great Charter itself, that not only John, a tyrannical prince, and Richard, a violent one, but their father Henry, under whose reign the prevalence of gross abuses is the least to be suspected, were accustomed, from their sole authority, without process of law, to imprison, banish, and attaint the freemen of their kingdom.

The abbot of Hyde paid thirty marks, to have the king's letters of request to the archbishop of Canterbury, to remove certain monks that were against the abbot. valence

A great baron, in ancient times, considered himself as a kind of sovereign within his territory; and was attended by courtiers and dependants more zealously attached to him than the ministers of state and the great officers were commonly to their sovereign. He often maintained in his court the parade of royalty, by establishing a justiciary, constable, mareschal, chamberlain, seneschal, and chancellor, and assigning to each of these officers a separate province and command. He was usually very assiduous in exercising his jurisdiction; and took such delight in that image of sovereignty, that it was found necessary to restrain his activity, and prohibit him by law from holding courts too frequently (a). It is not to be doubted, but the example set him by the prince, of a mercenary and sordid extortion, would be faithfully copied; and that all his good and bad offices, his justice and injustice, were equally put to sale. He had the power, with the king's consent, to exact talliages even from the free citizens who lived within his barony; and as his necessities made him rapacious, his authority was usually found to be more oppressive and tyrannical than that of the sovereign (b). He was ever engaged in hereditary or personal animosities or confederacies with his neighbour, and often gave protection to all desperate adventurers and criminals who would be useful in serving his violent purposes. He was able alone, in times of tranquillity, to obstruct the execution of justice within his territories; and by combining with a few malcontent barons of high rank and power, he could throw the state into convulsions. And, on the whole, through the royal authority was confined within bounds, and often within very narrow ones, yet the check was irregular, and frequently the source of great disorders; nor was it derived from the liberty of the people, but from the military power of many petty tyrants, who were equally dangerous to the prince, and oppressive to the subject.

The power of the church was another rampart against royal authority; but this defence was also the cause of many mischiefs and inconveniences. The dignified clergy, perhaps, were not so prone to immediate violence as the barons; but as they pretended to a total independence on the state, and could always cover themselves with the appearances of religion, they proved, in one respect, an obstruction to the settlement of the kingdom, and to the regular execution of the laws. The policy of the Conqueror was in this particular liable to some exception. He augmented the superstitious veneration for Rome, to which that age was so much inclined; and he broke those bands of connection, which, in the Saxon times, had preserved an union between the lay and the clerical orders. He prohibited the bishops from sitting in the county courts; he allowed ecclesiastical causes to be tried in spiritual courts only (c); and he so much exalted the power of the clergy, that of sixty thousand two hundred and fifteen knights fees, into which he divided England, he placed no less than twenty-eight thousand and fifteen under the church (d).

The right of primogeniture was introduced with the feudal law: an institution which is hurtful, by producing and maintaining an unequal division of private property; but is advantageous in another respect, by accustoming the people to a preference in favour of the eldest son, and thereby preventing a partition or disputed succession in the monarchy. The Normans introduced the use of sirnames, which tend to preserve the knowledge of families and pedigrees. They abolished none of the old absurd methods of trial by the cross or ordeal; and they added a new absurdity, the trial by single combat (e), which became a regular part of jurisprudence, and was conducted with all the order, method, devotion, and solemnity imaginable (f). The ideas of chivalry also seem to have been imported by the Normans: no traces of those fantastic notions are to be found among the plain and rustic Saxons.

The feudal institutions, by raising the military tenants to a kind of sovereign dignity, by rendering personal strength and valour requisite, and by making every knight and baron his own protector and avenger, begat that martial pride and sense of honour, which, being cultivated and embellished by the poets and romance-writers of the age, ended in chivalry. The virtuous knight fought not only in his own quarrel, but in that of the innocent, of the helpless, and, above all, of the fair, whom he supposed to be for ever under the guardianship of his valiant arm. The uncourteous knight who, from his castle, exercised robbery on travellers, and committed violence on virgins, was the object of his perpetual indignation; and he put him to death, without scruple, or trial, or appeal, wherever he met with him. The great independence of men made personal honour and fidelity the chief tie among them; and rendered it the capital virtue of every true knight, or genuine professor of chivalry. The solemnities of single combat, as established by law, banished the notion of every thing unfair or unequal in rencounters; and maintained an appearance of courtesy between the combatants, till the moment of their engagement. The credulity of the age grafted on this stock the notion of giants, enchanters, dragons, spells (g), and a thousand wonders, which still multiplied during the times of the crusades; when men, returning from so great a distance, used the liberty of imposing every fiction on their believing audience. These ideas of chivalry infected the writings, conversation, and behaviour of men, during some ages; and even after they were, in a great measure, banished by the revival of learning, they left modern gallantry and the point of honour, which still maintain their influence, and are the genuine offspring of those ancient affectations.

The concession of the Great Charter, or rather its full establishment (for there was a considerable interval of time between the one and the other), gave rise, by degrees, to a new species of government, and introduced some order and justice into the administration. The ensuing scenes of our history are therefore somewhat different from the preceding. Yet the Great Charter contained no establishment of new courts, magistrates, or senates, nor abolition of the old. It introduced no new distribution of the powers of the commonwealth, and no innovation in the political or public law of the kingdom. It only guarded, and that merely by verbal clauses, against such tyrannical practices as are incompatible with civilized government, and, if they become very frequent, are incompatible with all government. The barbarous licence of the kings, and perhaps of the nobles, was thenceforth somewhat more restrained: men acquired some more security for their properties and their liberties: and government approached a little nearer to that end for which it was originally instituted, the distribution of justice, and the equal protection of the citizens. Acts of violence and iniquity in the crown, which before were only deemed injurious to individuals, and were hazardous chiefly in proportion to the number, power, and dignity of the persons affected by them, were now regarded, in some degree, as public injuries, and as infringements of a charter calculated for general security. And thus the establishment of the Great Charter, without seeming anywise to innovate in the distribution of political power, became a kind of epoch in the constitution.

THE LINE OF LANCASTER.

COMPRIZING THE

REIGNS OF HENRY IV. HENRY V. AND HENRY VI.

CHAPTER I.

HENRY IV.

THE usurpation of Henry of Bolingbroke was productive of a series of misfortunes to the English. Had Richard been suffered to reign, and to descend to the grave in peace, he would have been succeeded, in the event of his dying without offspring, by Edmund earl of Marche, son of that earl who had been recognised by parliament as presumptive heir of the crown; a circumstance that would have prevented those virulent and destructive hostilities between the houses of York and Lancaster, which originated in the ambition of Henry the Fourth.

When a subservient parliament had permitted Henry to assume the reins of government, he fixed a day for the next meeting, as well as for the solemnity of the coronation; which was accordingly performed at Westminster on the 13th of October; when archbishop Arundel officiated at the ceremony, and anointed the new king with an oil, which it was pretended had been brought from heaven by the Virgin Mary, who had presented it to St. Thomas a Becket, for the express purpose of anointing the English sovereigns. This invention was calculated to sanction the title and the person of Henry in the eyes of the populace, and to varnish his guilt with the idea of the divine approbation.

No sooner was the coronation of Henry performed than he issued a proclamation, signifying that his claim to the throne was founded on the right of conquest, the resignation of Richard in his favour, and of his being next male heir of the late king. Though not one of these claims could bear the smallest examination, he was probably induced to prefer them to the more plausive title acquired by the consent of the people, from an idea that the throne which is obtained by election might be vacated by the will of the electors, and must likewise be subject to such limitations as those electors should choose to impose. This declaration therefore, in which he arrogated to himself the united rights of blood and conquest, was calculated to reject every kind of restriction, and to lay the foundation of an arbitrary and despotic reign (h). On the same day that this proclamation was published, he created Henry, his eldest son, who was then in the thirteenth year of his age, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester; and on the subsequent day, the parliament proceeded to business. But though Henry had secured peaceable possession of the throne, his situation appeared extremely hazardous, and was productive of infinite perplexity. He was conscious of the absurdity of his claims: his resumption of that right of conquest, which he had before disavowed, was too dangerous to maintain; and his claim of hereditary right was so truly ridiculous, that not one of his subjects could possibly be duped by it. He had indeed a present advantage over his competitor Edmund, the young earl of Marche, and heir of the house of Mortimer, who had been declared, in parliament, heir to the crown, was a boy of seven years of age: his friends consulted his safety, by keeping silence with regard to his title: Henry detained him and his younger brother in custody at Windsor castle; but he had reason to dread, that, in proportion as that nobleman grew to man's estate, he would draw to him the attachment of the people, and make them reflect on the fraud, violence, and injustice, by which he had been excluded from the throne. Many favourable circumstances would occur in his behalf: he was a native of England; possessed an extensive interest from the greatness of his family, and their powerful alliances; however criminal the deposed monarch might be supposed to be, this youth was intirely innocent; he was of the same religion, and educated in the same manners with the people, and could not be governed by any separate interest: these views combined would all concur to favour his claim; and though the abilities of the present prince might ward off any dangerous revolution, it was justly to be apprehended, that his authority could with difficulty be brought to equal that of his predecessors, so as to secure stability to his government.

Independent of this ground of apprehension, the king had other subjects of uneasiness. Richard, earl of Cambridge, one of the sons of Edmund duke of York, who had married Anne, sister to Edmund earl of Marche, conceived himself to be injured by the usurpation of Henry. Charles the Sixth, king of France, was also extremely incensed against the usurper, for having effected the deposition of his son-in-law; and the Scots were only waiting for a favourable opportunity to profit by these commotions which they imagined must speedily take place in England. The obligations, moreover, which Henry had received from the potent earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, were of a nature most likely to produce discontent on the one side, and ingratitude on the other; so that he found it not less difficult to secure the adherence of his friends, by the gratification of their desires, than to guard against the designs of his enemies.

Henry, in the very first parliament he assembled, had reason to see the danger attending that station which he had assumed, and the obstacles he would meet with in governing an unruly aristocracy, always divided by faction, and at present inflamed with the resentments consequent on such recent convulsions. The peers, on their assembling, broke out into violent animosities against each other. The lord Fitz-Walter challenged Aumale as a traitor to his lawful sovereign; and lord Morley taxed the earl of Salisbury with treachery both to Richard and to Henry. The cause of these disputants being espoused by other noblemen, forty gauntlets were thrown on the floor as pledges of battle. Liar and traitor resounded from all quarters; and the house of peers resembled a lawless band of licentious ruffians more than a chosen assembly of British senators. The king had so much authority with these doughty champions, as to prevent the present effusion of blood; but he was not able to allay the dangerous heats of party, or to promote that cordial reconciliation between those revengeful nobles which was so essential to the tranquillity of his reign.

It was not long before these passions broke into action. The earls of Rutland, Kent, and Huntingdon, and lord Spencer, who were now degraded from the respective titles of Albemarle, Surrey, Exeter, and Gloucester, conferred on them by Richard, as a reward for their attachment and fidelity, entered into a conspiracy, together with the earl of Salisbury and lord Lumley, for raising an insurrection, and for seizing the king's person at Windsor; but the treachery of Rutland gave him warning of the danger. He suddenly withdrew to London; and the conspirators, who came to Windsor, on the 4th of January, 1400, with a body of five hundred horse, found that they had missed this blow, on which all the success of their enterprize depended. Henry appeared next day at Kingston upon Thames, at the head of twenty thousand men, mostly drawn from the city; and his enemies, unable to resist his power, dispersed themselves, with a view of raising their followers in the several counties which were the seat of their interest. But the adherents of the king were hot in the pursuit, and every where opposed themselves to their progress. The earls of Kent and Salisbury, directed their route to Cirencester; where they were seized by the citizens, and were next day beheaded without farther ceremony, according to the custom of the times (i). The citizens of Bristol treated Spencer and Lumley in the same manner. The earl of Huntingdon being apprehended in Essex, was sent to the Tower on the 10th of January; and, five days after, was beheaded without any previous trial, and with circumstances of peculiar cruelty. Sir Benedict Shelley, sir Bernard Brokes, sir Thomas Blount, and eight and twenty other knights and gentlemen, suffered death on the gibbet, by orders from Henry: and when the quarters of these unhappy victims were brought to London, no less than eighteen bishops and thirty-two mitred abbots joined the populace, and met them with the most indecent marks of joy and exultation.

(h) "The English, says Mr. Hume, had so long been familiarized to the hereditary succession of their monarchs, the instances of departure from it had always borne such strong symptoms of injustice and violence, and so little of a national choice or election, and the returns to the true line had ever been deemed such fortunate incidents in their history, that Henry was afraid lest, in resting his title on the consent of the people, he should build on a foundation to which the people themselves were not accustomed, and whose solidity they would with difficulty be brought to recognize. The idea too of choice seemed always to imply that of conditions, and a right of recalling the consent upon any supposed violation of them; an idea which was not naturally agreeable to a sovereign, and might, in England, be dangerous to the subjects, who, lying so much under the influence of turbulent nobles, had ever paid but an imperfect obedience even to their hereditary princes. For these reasons, Henry was determined never to have recourse to this claim; the only one on which his authority could consistently stand: he rather chose to patch up his title in the best manner he could from other pretensions; and in the end, he left himself, in the eyes of men of sense, no ground of right but his present possession; a very precarious foundation, which, by its very nature, was liable to be overthrown by every faction of the great, or prejudice of the people."

To close this scene of infamy and blood, an object appeared that must have roused the indignation of every mind, not wholly callous to the dictates of honour and the feelings of humanity. This was that arch-traitor Rutland, bearing on a pole the head of his brother-in-law, lord Spencer, which he presented in triumph to Henry, as a token of his loyalty. This abandoned wretch, who by the death of his father soon after attained the title of duke of York, and became the first prince of the blood, had been instrumental in the murder of his uncle, the duke of Gloucester: he had basely deserted Richard, whose confidence he had acquired; had formed a conspiracy against the life of Henry, to whom he had sworn allegiance; had betrayed his associates, whom he had seduced into this enterprize; and now dared openly to display, with marks of triumph and exultation the badges of his complicated villainy. These scenes of barbarous violence formed a worthy prelude to those cruel and sanguinary contests between the houses of York and Lancaster, which originated in the tyranny and injustice of Henry the Fourth.

Henry was sensible, that though the execution of these conspirators might seem to give security to his throne, the animosities, which remain after such bloody scenes, are always dangerous to royal authority; and he therefore determined not to increase, by any hazardous enterprize, those numerous enemies with whom he was every where environed. While a subject, he was believed to have strongly imbibed all the principles of his father, the duke of Lancaster, and to have adopted the prejudices which the Lollards inspired against the abuses of the established church: but, finding himself possessed of the throne by so precarious a title, he thought superstition a necessary implement of public authority; and he resolved, by every expedient, to pay court to the clergy. There were hitherto no penal laws enacted against heresy; an indulgence which had proceeded, not from a spirit of toleration to the Romish church, but from the ignorance and simplicity of the people, which had rendered them unfit either for starting or receiving any new or curious doctrines, and which needed not to be restrained by rigorous penalties. But when the learning and genius of Wickliffe had once broken, in some measure, the fetters of the prejudice, the ecclesiastics called aloud for the punishment of his disciples; and the king, who was very little scrupulous in his conduct, was easily induced to sacrifice his principles to his interest, and to acquire the favour of the church by that most effectual method, the gratifying their vengeance against opponents. He engaged the parliament to pass a law for that purpose: it enacted, that when any heretic, who relapsed, or refused to abjure his opinions, was delivered over to the secular arm by the bishop or his commissaries, he should be committed to the flames by the civil magistrate before the whole people (k). This weapon did not long remain unemployed in the hands of the clergy: William Sautré, rector of St. Osithes in London, had been condemned by the convocation of Canterbury; his sentence was ratified by the house of peers; the king issued his writ for the execution (l); and the unhappy man atoned for his erroneous opinions by the penalty of fire. Thus one horror more was added to those dismal scenes which at that time were already but too familiar to the people.

But the utmost precaution and prudence of Henry could not shield him from those numerous inquietudes which assailed him from every quarter. The connexions of Richard with the royal family of France made that court exert its activity to recover his authority, or revenge his death (m); but though the confusions in England tempted the French to engage in some enterprize by which they might distress their ancient enemy, the greater confusions which they experienced at home obliged them quickly to accommodate matters; and Charles, content with recovering his daughter from Henry's hands, laid aside his preparations, and renewed the truce between the kingdoms (n). The attack of Guienne was also an inviting attempt, which the present factions that prevailed among the French obliged them to neglect. The Gascons, affectionate to the memory of Richard, who was born among them, refused to swear allegiance to a prince that had dethroned and murdered him; and the appearance of a French army on their frontiers would probably have tempted them to change masters (o). The citizens of Bourdeaux, in particular, so highly resented the deposition of their lawful sovereign, that they positively declared they would rather submit to the king of France than obey the usurper of his throne. But Thomas Percy, earl of Worcester, arriving with some English troops, gave countenance to the partizans of Henry, and overawed their opponents. Religion too was here found a cement to their union with England. The Gascons had been engaged by Richard's authority, to acknowledge the pope of Rome; and they were sensible that, if they submitted to France, it would be necessary for them to pay obedience to the pope of Avignon, whom they had been taught to detest as a schismatic. Their principles on this head were too fast rooted to admit of any sudden or violent alteration (p).

Henry's next alarm proceeded from the Scots, who were tempted, by the apparent instability of his government, to make incursions into England. The king, desirous of exacting vengeance, and yet fearful of rendering his administration unpopular by a requisition of considerable supplies from his subjects, summoned a council of peers only, to meet at Westminster, and laid before them the state of his affairs. The military part of the feudal constitution was at this time considerably weakened, though its pernicious effects on the civil rights and properties of men still retained their primitive force. At this assembly no demand of personal attendance was made on the barons; but the king exposed to them his situation, and they voluntarily undertook to attend him in an expedition to Scotland, with a certain number of their retainers. Having conducted his army to Edinburgh, of which he easily made himself master, he there summoned Robert the Third to do homage for his crown: but finding that the Scottish prince would neither pay the required submission, nor afford him an opportunity of establishing his claim by force of arms, he returned in three weeks, without having effected any thing but the exposure of his own weakness.

The hasty retreat of Henry has been ascribed, with great plausibility, to the intelligence which he had received of an insurrection in Wales. This revolt was excited by the celebrated Owen ap Griffith Vaughan, lord Glendoudwy, commonly called Owen Glendowr, a gentleman of high spirit and intrepid courage, who was descended from Llewellyn ap Griffith, the last prince of Wales. Owen Glendowr had received his education, as a lawyer, in the inns of court, and afterwards served Richard the Second as one of his body esquires. On the usurpation of Henry, to whom he was become hateful for his attachment to Richard, he had retired to his paternal estate; and Reginald lord Gray of Ruthyn, who was intimately connected with the king, and who possessed a considerable property in the Marches of Wales, thought the opportunity favourable for oppressing his neighbour, and taking possession of his estate. Glendowr, provoked at the injustice of the attempt, and still more at the indignity offered to him, recovered possession by the sword; and Henry, having espoused the cause of Gray, issued a proclamation from Northampton, on the 19th of September, 1401, inviting all able-bodied men, in the counties of Warwick, Leicester, Nottingham, Derby, Worcester, Salop, Stafford, Gloucester, Hereford, and Northampton, to repair immediately to his standard, in order to march against Glendowr, whom he pronounced a rebel. Thus, by the unconstitutional and unjust interference of the king, was a private quarrel converted into a national war, which the valour and activity of Glendowr, aided by the natural strength of his country, sustained for several years. When Henry had collected his army, he marched into Wales; but, as Glendowr had taken refuge in the mountains, he was soon obliged to return.

The remainder of the year was spent in negociations with the court of France on the subject of a truce, which was eagerly wished for by Henry; who was also anxious to obtain Isabella, widow to Richard the Second, in marriage for his son. But Charles the Sixth insisting that the princess should be restored, together with her marriage portion, Henry was at length obliged to accede to that monarch's terms; in consequence of which a truce of thirty years was concluded between the two kings. Though Henry's attempt to form an advantageous alliance for his son had proved ineffectual, he had more success in a similar negociation for his daughter, the princess Blanche, whom he married in the spring of the following year, to Louis of Bavaria, eldest son of the emperor of Germany.

By this time Owen Glendowr had fully prevailed on his countrymen to espouse his cause; and not only to renounce their dependence on the crown of England, but to acknowledge him for their sovereign, as the legitimate descendant of their ancient princes. By these means he was enabled to collect a powerful army, with which he made incursions into England, laying waste the country, and plundering the inhabitants. Early in the spring of 1402, Owen Glendowr, having taken the field, was opposed by lord Gray, whom he defeated and took prisoner. The next enemy he had to encounter was sir Edmund Mortimer, uncle to the young earl of Marche; who, having collected all the friends and vassals of his family, advanced to meet Glendowr, at the head of twelve thousand men. An action accordingly took place on the 22nd of June, near Knighton, in Radnorshire, in which the Welshman again proved victorious, killing eleven hundred of his enemies, and taking their leader prisoner. Though Henry was highly pleased at the captivity of Mortimer, he was greatly alarmed at the progress of Glendowr; and therefore entered Wales, in the month of August, with a numerous army, which he divided into three bodies; one of which he reserved for himself, and the others he entrusted to the conduct of Henry, prince of Wales, and the earl of Anendale: but as the Welsh retired, as usual, to their mountains, and were studious to avoid an engagement, he was soon reduced to distress for want of provisions, and obliged to forego his enterprize.

During this time a report had been circulated throughout the kingdom with great industry, and chiefly by the monks of the order of St. Francis, purporting, that Richard the Second was still alive; and, having effected his escape into Scotland, was there raising an army, with which he would speedily march into England, to deprive the usurper of his throne. Henry appears to have been greatly alarmed at these rumours, from the repeated proclamations which he published, declaring them to be false, and threatening with immediate death all those who should dare to diffuse them: nor did he fail to put his threats in execution on several persons who disobeyed his commands; and particularly on sir Roger Clarendon, whom he caused to be hanged, together with his esquire and valet, and eleven priests and friers. The effect of these reports, however, soon appeared in an incursion of the Scots, who entered England in the month of July, 1402, under the command of sir Archibald Douglas. This army, which amounted to twelve thousand men, was attended by many of the principal nobility of Scotland, and committed devastations on the northern counties. On his return home, he was overtaken by the Perceys at Homeldon, on the borders of England, and a fierce battle ensued, where the Scots were totally routed. Douglas himself was taken prisoner; as was Mordac earl of Fife, son of the duke of Albany, and nephew of the Scottish king, with the earls of Angus, Murray, and Orkney, and many others of the gentry and nobility (q). When Henry received intelligence of this victory, he sent the earl of Northumberland orders not to ransom his prisoners, which that nobleman regarded as his right by the laws of war received in that age. The king intended to detain them, that he might be able, by their means, to make an advantageous peace with Scotland; but by this policy he gave a fresh disgust to the family of Percy.

The obligations which Henry had owed to Northumberland were of a kind the most likely to produce ingratitude on the one side, and discontent on the other. The sovereign naturally became jealous of that power which had advanced him to the throne; and the subject was not easily satisfied in the returns which he thought so great a favour had merited. Though Henry, on his accession, had bestowed the office of constable on Northumberland for life (r), and conferred other gifts on that family, these favours were regarded as their due; the refusal of any other request was deemed an injury. The impatient spirit of Henry Percy, (better known by the appellation of Hotspur,) and the factious disposition of the earl of Worcester, younger brother of Northumberland, inflamed the discontents of that nobleman; and the precarious title of Henry tempted him to seek revenge, by overturning that throne which he had at first established. He entered into a correspondence with Owen Glendowr: he gave liberty to the earl of Douglas, and made an alliance with that martial chief: he roused up all his partisans to arms; and such unlimited authority at that time belonged to the great families, that the same men, whom a few years before, he had conducted against Richard, now followed his standard in opposition to Henry. When war was ready to break out, Northumberland was seized with a sudden illness at Berwick; and young Percy, taking the command of the troops, marched towards Shrewsbury, in order to join his forces with those of Glendowr. The king had a small army on foot, with which he had intended to act against the Scots; and knowing the importance of celerity in all civil wars, he instantly hurried down, that he might give battle to the rebels. He approached Percy near Shrewsbury, before that nobleman was joined by Glendowr; and the policy of one leader, and the impatience of the other, made them hasten to a general engagement.

On the 20th of July, 1403, the evening before the battle, while the two armies lay in sight of each other, on the plains of Hartlefield near Shrewsbury, Percy sent a manifesto to Henry, in which he renounced his allegiance, set that prince at defiance, and, in the name of his father and uncle, as well as his own, enumerated all the grievances of which, he pretended, the nation had reason to complain. He upbraided him with the perjury of which he had been guilty, when on landing at Ravenspur, he had sworn upon the gospels, before the earl of Northumberland, that he had no other intention than to recover the duchy of Lancaster, and that he would ever remain a faithful subject to king Richard. He aggravated his guilt in first dethroning, then murdering that prince, and in usurping on the title of the house of Mortimer, to whom, both by lineal succession, and by declarations of parliament, the throne, when vacant by Richard's demise, did of right belong. He complained of his cruel policy in allowing the young earl of Marche, whom he ought to regard as his sovereign, to remain a captive in the hands of his enemies, and in even refusing to all his friends permission to treat of his ransom. He charged him again with perjury in loading the nation with heavy taxes, after having sworn that, without the utmost necessity, he would never levy any impositions upon them. And he reproached him with the arts employed in procuring favourable elections into parliament; arts which he himself had before imputed as a crime to Richard, and which he had made one chief reason of that prince's arraignment and deposition. This manifesto was well calculated to inflame the quarrel between the parties: the bravery of the two leaders promised an obstinate engagement; and the equality of the armies, being each about twelve thousand men, a number which was not unmanageable by the commanders, gave reason to expect a great effusion of blood on both sides, and a very doubtful issue to the combat.

We shall scarcely find any battle in those ages where the shock was more terrible and more constant. Henry exposed his person in the thickest of the fight; his gallant son, whose military atchievements were afterwards so renowned, and who here performed his noviciate in arms, signalized himself on his father's footsteps, and even a wound, wound, which he received in the face with an arrow, could not oblige him to quit the field. Percy supported that fame which he had acquired in many a bloody combat; and Douglas, his ancient enemy, and now his friend, still appeared his rival, amidst the horror and confusion of the day. This nobleman performed feats of valour which are almost incredible: he seemed determined that the king of England should that day fall by his arm: he sought him all over the field of battle; and as Henry, either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his person, or to encourage his own men by the belief of his presence every where, had accoutred several captains in the royal garb, the sword of Douglas rendered this honour fatal to many. But while the armies were contending in this furious manner, the death of Percy, by an unknown hand, decided the victory, and the royalists prevailed. There are said to have fallen that day, on both sides, near two thousand three hundred gentlemen; but the persons of greatest distinction were on the king's; the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Gansel, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Massey, Sir John Calverly. About six thousand private men perished, of whom two-thirds were of Percy's army. The earls of Worcester and Douglas were taken prisoners: the former was beheaded at Shrewsbury; the latter was treated with the courtesy due to his rank and merit.

The earl of Northumberland, having recovered from his sickness, had levied a fresh army, and was on his march to join his son; but being opposed by the earl of Westmoreland, and hearing of the defeat at Shrewsbury, he dismissed his forces, and came with a small retinue to the king at York. He pretended that his sole intention in arming was to mediate between the parties: Henry thought proper to accept of the apology, and even granted him a pardon for his offence: all the other rebels were treated with equal lenity; and, except the earl of Worcester and Sir Richard Vernon, who were regarded as the chief authors of the insurrection, no person engaged in this dangerous enterprize seems to have perished by the hands of the executioner.

Though Henry had been peculiarly fortunate in the speedy suppression of this dangerous rebellion, his situation was still perilous, and his enemies numerous. Two powerful armies were raising in France, from motives of hostility to his person and government: the first, under the command of the duke of Burgundy, was destined to besiege Calais; and the second, led by the duke of Orleans, was intended for the invasion of Guienne. A body of French troops, too, had actually made a descent on the Isle of Wight; and an army of Bretons had first pillaged Plymouth, and then reduced it to ashes. The Scots were watching for an opportunity to make an incursion on the northern counties; Owen Glendowr was at the head of a resolute army in Wales; the embers of discontent glowed in the bosoms of a large portion of the English; and the royal treasury was so much exhausted, that the king was obliged, even at this perilous conjuncture, to disband his army for want of money. But fortune, which had hitherto smiled on all the undertakings of Henry, still continued to be propitious: the discord and imprudence of his enemies dispelled the clouds that loured over his head, and threatened him with destruction. All the projects of France were marred by the violent animosity which subsisted between the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans; the efforts of Owen Glendowr were confined to the establishment of his authority in Wales, and to the formation of an alliance with France; the Scots suffered themselves to be amused with specious negociations; and the murmurs of the English terminated in the projection of plots ill-planned and worse executed: while Henry replenished his coffers by obtaining considerable supplies from two parliaments, which he summoned to assemble in 1404; the first at Westminster in the month of January; and the last at Coventry, in October.

But Northumberland, though he had been pardoned, knew that he never should be trusted, and that he was too powerful to be cordially forgiven by a prince whose situation gave him such reasonable grounds of jealousy. It was the effect either of Henry's vigilance or good fortune, or of the narrow genius of his enemies, that no proper concert was ever formed among them: they rose in rebellion one after another; and thereby afforded him an opportunity of suppressing singly those insurrections, which, had they been united, might have proved fatal to his authority. The earl of Nottingham, son of the duke of Norfolk, and the archbishop of York, brother to the earl of Wiltshire, whom Henry, then duke of Lancaster, had beheaded at Bristol, though they had remained quiet while Percy was in the field, still harboured in their breast a violent hatred against the enemy of their families; and they determined, in conjunction with the earl of Northumberland, to seek revenge against him. They betook themselves to arms before that powerful nobleman was prepared to join them; and publishing a manifesto, in which they reproached Henry with his usurpation of the crown, and the murder of the late king, they required that the right line should be restored, and all public grievances be redressed. The archbishop encamped on Shipton Moor, near York, with an army of fifteen thousand men, on the 9th of May, 1405. The earl of Westmoreland, whose power lay in the neighbourhood, approached them with an inferior force at Shipton, near York; and, being afraid to hazard an action, he attempted to subdue them by a stratagem, which nothing but the greatest folly and simplicity on their part could have rendered successful. He desired a conference with the archbishop and earl between the armies; he heard their grievances with great patience; he begged them to propose the remedies; he approved of every expedient which they suggested: he granted them all their demands: he also engaged that Henry should give them entire satisfaction; and when he saw them pleased with the facility of his concessions, he observed to them, that since amity was now, in effect, restored between them, it were better on both sides to dismiss their forces, which otherwise would prove an insupportable burden to the country. The archbishop and the earl of Nottingham immediately gave directions to that purpose: their troops disbanded upon the field: but Westmoreland, who had secretly issued contrary orders to his army, seized the two rebels without resistance, and carried them to the king, who was advancing with hasty marches to suppress the insurrection. The trial and punishment of an archbishop might have proved a troublesome and dangerous undertaking, had Henry proceeded regularly, and allowed time for an opposition to form itself against that unusual measure: the celerity of the execution alone could here render it safe and prudent. Finding that Sir William Gascoigne, the chief justice, made some scruple of acting on this occasion, he appointed Sir William Fulthorpe for judge; who, without any indictment, trial, or defence, pronounced sentence of death upon the prelate, on the 8th of June; and he was beheaded the same day, with many circumstances of unmanly insult and inhuman cruelty, which he bore with exemplary fortitude, patience, and resignation. This was the first instance in England of a capital punishment inflicted on a bishop; whence the clergy of that rank might learn that their crimes, more than those of laics, were not to pass with impunity. The earl of Nottingham was condemned and executed in the same summary manner: but though many other persons of condition, such as lord Falconberg, Sir Ralph Hastings, Sir John Colville, were engaged in this rebellion, no others seem to have fallen victims to Henry's severity.

The earl of Northumberland, on receiving this intelligence, fled into Scotland, together with lord Bardolf; and the king, without opposition, reduced all the castles and fortresses belonging to these noblemen. He thence turned his arms against Glendowr, over whom his son, the prince of Wales, had obtained some advantages: but that enemy, more troublesome than dangerous, still found means of defending himself in his fastnesses, and of eluding, though not resisting, all the force of England. In a subsequent season, the earl of Northumberland and lord Bardolf, impatient of their exile, entered the north, in hopes of raising the people to arms; but found the country in such a posture as rendered all their attempts unsuccessful. Sir Thomas Rokesby, sheriff of Yorkshire, levied some forces, attacked the invaders at Bramham Moor, near Haselwood, on the 19th of February, 1408, and gained a victory, in which both Northumberland and Bardolf were slain. This prosperous event, joined to the death of Glendowr, which happened soon after, freed Henry from all his domestic enemies; and this prince, who had mounted the throne by such unjustifiable means, and held it by such an exceptionable title, had yet, by his valour, prudence, and address, accustomed the people to the yoke, and had obtained a greater ascendant over his haughty barons than the law alone, not supported by these active qualities, was ever able to confer.

About the same time, fortune gave Henry an advantage over that neighbour who, by his situation, was most enabled abled to disturb his government. Robert III. king of Scots, was a prince, though of slender capacity, extremely innocent and inoffensive in his conduct: but Scotland, at that time, was still less fitted than England for cherishing, or even enduring, sovereigns of that character. The duke of Albany, Robert's brother, a prince of more abilities, at least of a more boisterous and violent disposition, had assumed the government of the state; and, not satisfied with present authority, he entertained the criminal purpose of extirpating his brother's children, and of acquiring the crown to his own family. He threw in prison David, his eldest nephew, who there perished by hunger: James alone, the younger brother of David, stood between that tyrant and the throne; and king Robert, sensible of his son's danger, embarked him on board a ship, with a view of sending him to France, and entrusting him to the protection of that friendly power. Unfortunately, the vessel was taken by the English; prince James, a boy about nine years of age, was carried to London; and though there subsisted at that time a truce between the kingdoms, Henry refused to restore the young prince to his liberty. Robert, worn out with cares and infirmities, was unable to bear the shock of this last misfortune; and he soon after died, leaving the government in the hands of the duke of Albany. Henry was now more sensible than ever of the importance of the acquisition which he had made: while he retained such a pledge, he was sure of keeping the duke of Albany in dependance; or, if offended, he could easily, by restoring the true heir, take ample revenge upon the usurper. But though the king, by detaining James in the English court, had shewn himself somewhat deficient in generosity, he made ample amends by giving that prince an excellent education, which afterwards qualified him, when he mounted the throne, to reform, in some measure, the rude and barbarous manners of his native country.

The hostile dispositions which of late had prevailed between France and England were restrained, during the greater part of this reign, from appearing in action. The jealousies and civil commotions with which both nations were disturbed kept each of them from taking advantage of the unhappy situation of its neighbour. But as the abilities and good fortune of Henry had sooner been able to compose the English factions, this prince began, in the latter part of his reign, to look abroad, and to foment the animosities between the families of Burgundy and Orleans, by which the government of France was, during that period, so much distracted. He knew that one great source of the national discontent against his predecessor was the inactivity of his reign; and he hoped, by giving a new direction to the restless and unquiet spirits of his people, to prevent their breaking out in domestic wars and disorders. That he might unite policy with force, he first entered into treaty with the duke of Burgundy, and sent that prince a small body of troops, in the year 1411, which supported him against his enemies. Soon after, he hearkened to more advantageous proposals made him by the duke of Orleans, concluded a treaty with him on the 18th of May, 1412, and dispatched a greater body to support that party. But the leaders of the opposite factions having made temporary accommodation, the interests of the English were sacrificed; and this effort of Henry proved, in the issue, entirely vain and fruitless. The declining state of his health, and the shortness of his reign, prevented him from renewing the attempt, which his more fortunate son carried to so great a length against the French monarchy.

Such were the military and foreign transactions of this reign: the civil and parliamentary are somewhat more memorable, and more worthy of our attention. During the two last reigns, the elections of the commons had appeared a circumstance of government not to be neglected; and Richard was even accused of using unwarrantable methods for procuring to his partizans a seat in that house. This practice formed one considerable article of charge against him in his deposition; yet Henry scrupled not to tread in his footsteps, and to encourage the same abuses in elections. Laws were enacted against such undue influence, and even a sheriff was punished for an iniquitous return which he had made (s): but laws were commonly, at that time, very ill executed; and the liberties of the people, such as they were, stood on a surer basis than on laws and parliamentary elections. Though the house of commons was little able to withstand the violent currents which perpetually ran between the monarchy and the aristocracy, and though that house might easily be brought, at a particular time, to make the most unwarrantable concessions to either; the general institutions of the state still remained invariable; the interests of the several members continued on the same footing; the sword was in the hands of the subject; and the government, though thrown into temporary disorder, soon settled itself on its ancient foundations.

During the greater part of this reign, the king was obliged to court popularity; and the house of commons, sensible of their own importance, began to assume powers, which had not usually been exercised by their predecessors. In the first year of Henry, they procured a law, that no judge, in concurring with any iniquitous measure, should be excused by pleading the orders of the king, or even the danger of his own life from the menaces of the sovereign (t). In the second year, they insisted on maintaining the practice of not granting any supply before they received an answer to their petitions; which was a tacit manner of bargaining with the prince (u). In the fifth year, they desired the king to remove from his household four persons who had displeased them, among whom was his own confessor; and Henry, though he told them that he knew of no offence which these men had committed, yet, in order to gratify them, complied with their request (v). In the sixth year, they voted the king supplies, but appointed treasurers of their own, to see the money disbursed for the purposes intended, and required them to deliver in their accounts to the house (w). In the eighth year, they proposed, for the regulation of the government and household, thirty important articles, which were all agreed to; and they even obliged all the members of council, all the judges, and all the officers of the household, to swear to the observance of them (x). The abridger of the records remarks the unusual liberties taken by the speaker and the house during this period (y). But the great authority of the commons was but a temporary advantage, arising from the present situation. In a subsequent parliament, when the speaker made his customary application to the throne for liberty of speech, the king, having now overcome all his domestic difficulties, plainly told him, that he would have no novelties introduced, and would enjoy his prerogatives. But on the whole, the limitations of the government seem to have been more sensibly felt, and more carefully maintained by Henry, than by any of his predecessors.

During this reign, when the house of commons were, at any time, brought to make unwary concessions to the crown, they also shewed their freedom by a speedy retraction of them. Henry, though he entertained a perpetual and well-grounded jealousy of the family of Mortimer, allowed not their name to be once mentioned in parliament; and as none of the rebels had ventured to declare the earl of Marche king, he never attempted to procure, what would not have been refused him, an express declaration against the claim of that nobleman; because he knew that such a declaration, in the present circumstances, would have no authority, and would only serve to revive the memory of Mortimer's title in the minds of the people. He proceeded in his purpose after a more artful and covert manner. He procured a settlement of the crown on himself and his heirs-male (z), thereby tacitly excluding the females, and transferring the Salic law into the English government. He thought, that though the house of Plantagenet had at first derived their title from a female, this was a remote event, unknown to the generality of the people; and if he could once accustom them to the practice of excluding women, the title of the earl of Marche would gradually be forgotten, and neglected by them. But he was very unfortunate in this attempt. During the long contests with France, the injustice of the Salic law had been so much exclaimed against by the nation, that a contrary principle had taken deep root in the minds of men; and it was now become impossible to eradicate it. The same house of commons, therefore, in a subsequent session, apprehensive that they had overturned the foundations of the English government, and that they had opened the door to more civil wars than might ensue even from the irregular elevation of the house of Lancaster, applied with such earnestness for a new settlement of the crown, that Henry yielded to their request, and agreed to the succession of the princesses of his family (a). A certain proof, that nobody was, in his heart, satisfied with the king's title to the crown, or knew on what principle to rest it.

But though the commons, during this reign, showed a laudable zeal for liberty in their transactions with the crown; their efforts against the church were still more extraordinary, and seemed to anticipate very much the spirit which became so general in a little more than a century afterwards. I know, says Mr. Hume, that the credit of these passages rests entirely on one ancient historian (b); but that historian was contemporary, was a clergyman, and it was contrary to the interests of his order to preserve the memory of such transactions, much more to forge precedents, which posterity might, some time, be tempted to imitate. This is a truth so evident, that the most likely way of accounting for the silence of the records on this head, is by supposing, that the authority of some churchmen was so great as to procure a razure, with regard to these circumstances, which the indiscretion of one of that order has happily preserved to us.

In the sixth of Henry, the commons, who had been required to grant supplies, proposed in plain terms to the king, that he should seize all the temporalities of the church, and employ them as a perpetual fund to serve the exigencies of the state. They insisted, that the clergy possessed a third of the lands of the kingdom; that they contributed nothing to the public burdens; and that their riches tended only to disqualify them from performing their ministerial functions with proper zeal and attention. When this address was presented, the archbishop of Canterbury, who then attended the king, objected that the clergy, though they went not in person to the wars, sent their vassals and tenants in all cases of necessity; while, at the same time, they themselves, who staid at home, were employed night and day in offering up their prayers for the happiness and prosperity of the state. The speaker smiled, and answered, without reserve, that he thought the prayers of the church but a very slender supply. The archbishop, however, prevailed in the dispute: the king discouraged the application of the commons; and the lords rejected the bill which the lower house had framed for stripping the church of her revenues (c).

The commons were not discouraged by this repulse: In the eleventh year of the king they returned to the charge with more zeal than before: they made a calculation of all the ecclesiastical revenues, which, by their account, amounted to four hundred and eighty-five thousand marks a-year, and contained eighteen thousand four hundred ploughs of land. They proposed to divide this property among fifteen new earls, fifteen hundred knights, six thousand esquires, and a hundred hospitals; besides twenty thousand pounds a-year, which the king might take for his own use: and they insisted, that the clerical functions would be better performed than at present, by fifteen thousand parish priests, paid at the rate of seven marks a-piece of yearly stipend (d). This application was accompanied with an address for mitigating the statutes enacted against the Lollards, which shows from what source the address came. The king gave the commons a severe reply; and farther to satisfy the church, and to prove that he was quite in earnest, he ordered a Lollard to be burned before the dissolution of the parliament (e).

We have now related almost all the memorable transactions of this reign, which was busy and active; but produced few events that deserve to be transmitted to posterity. The king was so much employed in defending his crown, which he had obtained by unwarrantable means, and possessed by a bad title, that he had little leisure to look abroad, or perform any action which might redound to the honour or advantage of the nation. His health declined some months before his death; he was subject to fits, which bereaved him, for the time, of his senses; and, though he was yet in the flower of his age, his end was visibly approaching. He was attacked by one of these fits while he was at prayers in St. Edward's Chapel at Westminster, and being carried into one of the abbot's apartments, he there expired, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign, on the 26th of March, 1413.

The great popularity which Henry enjoyed before he attained the crown, and which had so much aided him in the acquisition of it, was entirely lost many years before the end of his reign; and he governed his people more by terror than by affection, more by his own policy than by their sense of duty or allegiance. When men came to reflect, in cool blood, on the crimes which had led him to the throne; the rebellion against his prince; the deposition of a lawful king, guilty sometimes, perhaps, of oppression, but more frequently of indiscretion; the exclusion of the true heir; the murder of his sovereign and near relation; these were such enormities as drew on him the hatred of his subjects, sanctified all the rebellions against him, and made the executions which he found necessary for the maintenance of his authority, appear cruel as well as iniquitous to the people. Yet, without pretending to apologize for these crimes, which must ever be held in detestation, it may be remarked, that he was insensibly led into this blameable conduct by a train of incidents, which few men possess virtue enough to withstand. The injustice with which his predecessor had treated him, in first condemning him to banishment, then despoiling him of his patrimony, made him think of revenge, and of recovering his lost rights; the headlong zeal of the people hurried him into the throne; the care of his own security, as well as his ambition, made him an usurper; and the steps have always been so few between the prisons of princes and their graves, that we need not wonder that Richard's fate was no exception to the general rule. All these considerations make Henry's situation, if he retained any sense of virtue, much to be lamented; and the inquietude with which he possessed his envied greatness, and the remorses by which, it is said, he was continually haunted, render him an object of our pity, even when seated upon the throne. But it must be owned, that his prudence and vigilance and foresight, in maintaining his power, were admirable: his command of temper remarkable: his courage, both military and political, without blemish; and he possessed many qualities which fitted him for his high station, and which rendered his usurpation of it, though pernicious in after-times, rather salutary, during his own reign, to the English nation.

Henry was twice married: by his first wife, Mary de Bohun, daughter and co-heir of Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford, he had four sons, Henry, his successor in the throne, Thomas duke of Clarence, John duke of Bedford, and Humphrey duke of Gloucester; and two daughters, Blanche and Philippa, the former married to the duke of Bavaria, the latter to the king of Denmark. His second wife, Jane, whom he married after he was king, and who was daughter of the king of Navarre, and widow of the duke of Britanny, brought him no issue.

By an act of the fifth of this reign, it is made felony to cut out any person's tongue, or put out his eyes; crimes which, the act says, were very frequent. This savage spirit of revenge denotes a barbarous people; though, perhaps, it was increased by the prevailing factions and civil commotions.

Commerce was very little understood in this reign, as in all the preceding. In particular, a great jealousy prevailed against merchant strangers; and many restraints were, by law, imposed upon them; namely, that they should lay out in English manufactures or commodities all the money acquired by the sale of their goods; that they should not buy or sell with one another, and that all their goods should be disposed of three months after importation (f). This last clause was found so inconvenient, that it was soon after repealed by parliament.

It appears that the expence of this king's household amounted to the yearly sum of nineteen thousand five hundred pounds, money of that age (g).

Guicciardin tells us, that the Flemings, in this century, learned from Italy all the refinements in arts, which they taught the rest of Europe. The progress, however, of the arts was still very slow and backward in England.

CHAP. II.

HENRY V.

THE many jealousies to which Henry IV.'s situation naturally exposed him, had so infected his temper, that he had entertained unreasonable suspicions with regard to the fidelity of his eldest son; and, during the latter years of his life, he had excluded that prince from all share in public business, and was even displeased to see him at the head of armies, where his martial talents, though useful to the support of government, acquired him a renown, which, he thought, might prove dangerous to his own authority. The active spirit of young Henry, restrained from its proper exercise, broke out into extravagances of every kind; and the riot of pleasure, the frolic of debauchery, the outrage of wine, filled the vacancies of a mind, better adapted to the pursuits of ambition and the cares of government. This course of life threw him among companions, whose disorders, if accompanied with spirit and humour, he indulged and seconded; and he was detected in many sallies, which, to severer eyes, appeared totally unworthy of his rank and station. There even remains a tradition, that, when heated with liquor and jollity, he scrupled not to accompany his riotous associates in attacking the passengers on the streets and highways, and despoiling them of their goods; and he found an amusement in the incidents which the terror and regret of these defenceless people produced on such occasions. This extreme of dissoluteness proved equally disagreeable to his father, as that eager application to business which had at first given him occasion of jealousy; and he saw, in his son's behaviour, the same neglect of decency, the same attachment to low company, which had degraded the personal character of Richard, and which, more than all his errors in government, had tended to overturn his throne. But the nation, in general, considered the young prince with more indulgence; and observed so many gleams of generosity, spirit, and magnanimity, breaking continually through the cloud which a wild conduct threw over his character, that they never ceased hoping for his amendment; and they ascribed all the weeds, which shot up in that rich soil, to the want of proper culture and attention in the king and his ministers. There happened an incident which encouraged these agreeable views, and gave much occasion for favourable reflections to all men of sense and candour. A riotous companion of the prince's had been indicted before Sir William Gascoigne, the chief justice, for some disorders; and Henry was not ashamed to appear at the bar with the criminal, in order to give him countenance and protection. Finding that his presence had not overawed the chief justice, he proceeded to insult that magistrate on his tribunal; but Gascoigne, mindful of the character which he then bore, and the majesty of the sovereign and of the laws, which he sustained, ordered the prince to be carried to prison for his rude behaviour. The spectators were agreeably disappointed when they saw the heir of the crown submit peaceably to this sentence, make reparation for his error by acknowledging it, and check his impetuous nature in the midst of its extravagant career (h).

But vivacity of spirit, and brilliancy of genius, frequently led their youthful possessor into irregular courses, which the grave and the precise consider as disgraceful. But when these eccentricities of conduct are unaccompanied with deliberate depravity, they neither merit much severity of censure nor preclude the hopes of reformation. The memory of the incident just mentioned and of many others of a like nature, rendered the prospect of the future reign nowise disagreeable to the nation, and increased the joy which the death of so unpopular a prince as the late king naturally occasioned. The first steps taken by the young prince confirmed all those prepossessions entertained in his favour; for, immediately after his coronation, which was performed at Westminster, on the 9th of April, 1413, he called together his former companions, acquainted them with his fixed determination to reform, exhorted them to imitate his example, but strictly inhibited them, till they had given proofs of their sincerity in this particular, from appearing any more in his presence; and he thus dismissed them with liberal presents. The wise ministers of his father, who had checked his riots, found that they had unknowingly been paying the highest court to him; and were received with all the marks of favour and confidence. The chief justice himself, who trembled to approach the royal presence, met with praises instead of reproaches for his past conduct, and was exhorted to persevere in the same rigorous and impartial execution of the laws. The surprise of those who expected an opposite behaviour, augmented their satisfaction; and the character of the young king appeared brighter than if it had never been shaded by any errors.

But Henry was anxious not only to repair his own misconduct, but also to make amends for those iniquities into which policy or the necessity of affairs had betrayed his father. He expressed the deepest sorrow for the fate of the unhappy Richard, did justice to the memory of that unfortunate prince, even performed his funeral obsequies with pomp and solemnity (i), and cherished all those who had distinguished themselves by their loyalty and attachment towards him. Instead of continuing the restraints which the jealousy of his father had imposed on the earl of Marche, he received that young nobleman with singular courtesy and favour; and by this magnanimity, so gained on the gentle and unambitious nature of his competitor, that he remained ever after sincerely attached to him, and gave him no disturbance in his future government. The family of Percy was restored to its fortune and honour. The king seemed ambitious to bury all party-distinctions in oblivion: the instruments of the preceding reign, who had been advanced from their blind zeal for the Lancastrian interests, more than from their merits, gave place every where to men of more honourable characters; and he was himself so intent on the strict dispensation of justice, that he received the petitions of the lowest of his subjects, and suffered no grievances to escape redress: virtue indeed seemed now to have an open career, in which it might exert itself: the exhortations, as well as example, of the prince gave it encouragement: all men were unanimous in their attachment to Henry; and the defects of his title were forgotten amidst the personal regard which was universally paid to him.

There remained among the people only one party distinction, which was derived from religious differences, and which, as it is of a peculiar, and commonly a very obstinate nature, the popularity of Henry was not able to overcome. The Lollards were every day increasing in the kingdom, and were become a formed party, which appeared extremely dangerous to the church, and even formidable to the civil authority. The enthusiasm by which these sectaries were generally actuated, the great alterations which they pretended to introduce, the hatred which they expressed against the established hierarchy, gave an alarm to Henry; who, either from a sincere attachment to the ancient religion, or from a dread of unknown consequences which attend all important changes, was determined to execute the laws against such bold innovators. The head of this sect was sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, a nobleman who had distinguished himself by his valour and his military talents, and had, on many occasions, acquired the esteem both of the late and of the present king. His high character and his zeal for the new sect pointed him out to Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, as the proper victim of ecclesiastical severity; whose punishment would strike a terror into the whole party, and teach them that they must expect no mercy under the present administration. He applied to Henry for a permission to indict lord Cobham; but the generous nature of the prince was averse to such sanguinary methods of conversion. He represented to the primate, that reason and conviction were the best expedients for supporting truth; that all gentle means ought first to be tried in order to reclaim men from error; and that he himself would endeavour, by a conversation with Cobham, to reconcile him to the catholic faith. But he found that nobleman obstinate in his opinions, and determined not to sacrifice truths of such infinite moment to his complaisance for sovereigns. Henry's principles of toleration, or rather his love of the practice, could carry him no farther; and he then gave full reins to ecclesiastical severity against the inflexible heresiarch. The primate indicted Cobham; and, with the assistance of his three suffragans, the bishops of London, Winchester, and St. David's, condemned him to the flames for an incorrigible heretic. Cobham, who was confined in the Tower, made his escape before the day appointed for his execution. The bold spirit of the man, provoked by persecution and stimulated by zeal, was urged to attempt the most criminal enterprizes; and his unlimited authority over the new sect proved that he well merited the attention of the civil magistrate. He formed in his retreat very violent designs against his enemies; and dispatching his emissaries to all quarters, appointed a general rendezvous

(h) It is reported, that when the king heard of the behaviour of the prince and the chief justice, he exclaimed, "Happy is the sovereign who has a magistrate endued with such firmness of character as to venture on the punishment of an offender of princely rank, and still more happy in having a son who will quietly submit to the enforcement of the laws on his own person!"

of the party, in order to seize the person of the king at Eltham, and put their persecutors to the sword (k). Henry, who is said to have been apprized of their intention, removed to Westminster on the 6th of January, 1414: Cobham was not discouraged by this disappointment, but changed the place of rendezvous to the field near St. Giles's: the king, having shut the gates of the city, to prevent any reinforcement to the Lollards from that quarter, came into the field in the night-time, seized such of the conspirators as appeared, and laid hold of the several parties who were hastening to the place appointed. It appeared that a few only were in the secret of the conspiracy: the rest implicitly followed their leaders: but upon the trial of the prisoners, says Hume, the treasonable designs of the sect were rendered certain, both from evidence, and from the confession of the criminals themselves (l). Some were executed; the greater number pardoned. Cobham himself, who made his escape by flight, was not brought to justice till four years after, when he was hanged as a traitor; and his body was burnt on the gibbet, in execution of the sentence pronounced against him as a heretic. This criminal design, which was perhaps somewhat aggravated by the clergy, brought discredit upon the party, and checked the progress of that sect, which had embraced the speculative doctrines of Wickliffe, and at the same time aspired to a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses.

These two points were the great objects of the Lollards; but the bulk of the nation was not affected in the same degree by both of them. Common sense and obvious reflection had discovered to the people the advantages of a reformation in discipline; but the age was not yet so far advanced as to be seized with the spirit of controversy, or to enter into those doctrines which the Lollards endeavoured to propagate throughout the kingdom. The very notion of heresy alarmed the generality of the people: innovation in fundamental principles was suspicious: curiosity was not, as yet, a sufficient counterpoize to authority; and even many, who were the greatest friends to the reformation of abuses, were anxious to express their detestation of the speculative tenets of the Wickliffites, which, they feared, threw disgrace on so good a cause. This turn of thought appears evidently in the proceedings of the parliament which was summoned immediately after the detection of Cobham's conspiracy. That assembly on the 30th of April, 1414, passed severe laws against the new heretics: they enacted, that whoever was convicted of Lollardy, before the ordinary, besides suffering capital punishment according to the laws formerly established, should also forfeit his lands and goods to the king; and that the chancellor, treasurer, justices of the two benches, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all the chief magistrates, in every city and borough, should take an oath to use their utmost endeavours for the extirpation of heresy (m). Yet this very parliament, when the king demanded supply, renewed the offer formerly pressed upon his father, and entreated him to seize all the ecclesiastical revenues, and to convert them to the use of the crown (n). The clergy were alarmed: they could offer the king no bribe which was equivalent: they only agreed to confer on him all the priories alien, which depended on capital abbies in Normandy, and had been bequeathed to these abbies, when that province remained united to England; and Chicheley, now archbishop of Canterbury, endeavoured to divert the blow, by giving occupation to the king, and by persuading him to undertake a war against France, in order to recover his lost rights to that kingdom.

It was the dying injunction of the late king to his son, not to allow the English to remain long in peace, which was apt to breed intestine commotions; but to employ them in foreign expeditions, by which the prince might acquire honour; the nobility, in sharing his dangers, might attach themselves to his person; and all the restless spirits find occupation for their inquietude. The natural disposition of Henry sufficiently inclined him to follow this advice, and the civil disorders of France, which had been prolonged beyond those of England, opened a full career to his ambition.

The death of Charles V. which followed soon after that of Edward III. and the youth of his son, Charles VI. put the two kingdoms for some time in a similar situation; and it was not to be apprehended, that either of them, during a minority, would be able to make much advantage of the weakness of the other. The jealousies also between Charles's three uncles, the dukes of Anjou, Berri, and Burgundy, had distracted the affairs of France rather more than those between the dukes of Lancaster, York, and Gloucester, Richard's three uncles, disordered those of England; and had carried off the attention of the French nation from any vigorous enterprize against foreign states. But in proportion as Charles advanced in years, the factions were composed; his two uncles, the dukes of Anjou and Burgundy, died; and the king himself, assuming the reins of government, discovered symptoms of genius and spirit, which revived the drooping hopes of his country. This promising state of affairs was not of long duration: the unhappy prince fell suddenly into a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exercising his authority; and though he recovered from this disorder, he was so subject to relapses, that his judgement was gradually but sensibly impaired, and no steady plan of government could be pursued by him. The administration of affairs was disputed between his brother, Louis duke of Orleans, and his cousin-german, John duke of Burgundy: the propinquity to the crown pleaded in favour of the former: the latter, who, in right of his mother, had inherited the county of Flanders, which he annexed to his father's extensive dominions, derived a lustre from his superior power: the people were divided between these contending princes: and the king, now resuming, now dropping his authority, kept the victory undecided, and prevented any regular settlement of the state by the final prevalence of either party.

At length, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, seeming to be moved by the cries of the nation and by the interposition of common friends, agreed to bury all past quarrels in oblivion, and to enter into strict amity: they swore before the altar the sincerity of their friendship; the priest administered the sacrament to both of them; they gave to each other every pledge which could be deemed sacred among men: but all this solemn preparation was only a cover for the basest treachery, which was deliberately premeditated by the duke of Burgundy. He procured his rival to be assassinated in the streets of Paris: he endeavoured for some time to conceal the part which he took in the crime: but being detected, he embraced a resolution still more criminal and more dangerous to society, by openly avowing and justifying it (o). The parliament itself of Paris, the tribunal of justice, heard the harangues of the duke's advocate in defence of assassination, which he termed tyrannicide; and that assembly, partly influenced by faction, partly overawed by power, pronounced no sentence of condemnation against this detestable doctrine (p). The same question was afterwards agitated before the council of Constance; and it was with difficulty that a feeble decision, in favour of the contrary opinion, was procured from these fathers of the church, the ministers of peace and of religion. But the mischievous effects of that tenet, had they been before anywise doubtful, appeared sufficiently from the present incidents. The commission of this crime, which destroyed all trust and security, rendered the war implacable between the French parties, and cut off every means of peace and accommodation. The princes of the blood, combining with the young duke of Orleans and his brothers, made violent war on the duke of Burgundy; and the unhappy king, seized sometimes by one party, sometimes by the other, transferred alternately to each of them the appearance of legal authority. The provinces were laid waste by mutual depredations: assassinations were every where committed from the animosity of the several leaders; or, what was equally terrible, executions were ordered, without any legal or free trial, by pretended courts of judicature. The whole kingdom was distinguished into two parties, the Burgundians and the Armagnacs; so the adherents of the young duke of Orleans were called, from the count of Armagnac, father in law to that prince. The city of Paris, distracted between them, but inclining more to the Burgundians, was a perpetual scene of blood and violence; the king and royal family were often detained captives in the hands of the populace; their faithful ministers were butchered or imprisoned before their face; and it was dangerous for any man, amidst these enraged factions, to be distinguished by a strict adherence to the principles of probity and honour.

During this scene of general violence, there rose into some consideration a body of men, which usually makes no figure in public transactions even during the most peaceful times; and that was the university of Paris, whose opinion was sometimes demanded, and more frequently offered, in the multiplied disputes between the parties. The schism, by which the church was at that time divided, and which occasioned frequent controversies in the university, had raised the professors to an unusual degree of importance; and this connection between literature and superstition had bestowed on the former a weight, to which reason and knowledge are not, of themselves, anywise entitled among men. But there was another society whose sentiments were much more decisive at Paris, the fraternity of butchers, who, under the direction of their ringleaders, had declared for the duke of Burgundy, and committed the most violent outrages against the opposite party. To counterbalance their power, the Armagnacs made interest with the fraternity of carpenters; the populace ranged themselves on one side or the other; and the fate of the capital depended on the prevalence of either party.

The advantage which might be made of these confusions, was easily perceived in England; and according to the maxims which usually prevail among nations, it was determined to lay hold of the favourable opportunity. The late king, who was courted by both the French parties, fomented the quarrel, by alternately sending assistance to each; but the present sovereign, impelled by the vigour of youth and the ardour of ambition, determined to push his advantages to a greater length, and to carry violent war into that distracted kingdom. While he was making preparations, however, for this end, he tried to effect his purpose by negociation; and he sent over ambassadors to Paris, in 1415, offering to improve the truce which subsisted between the two nations, into a perpetual peace and alliance; but demanding Catharine, the French king's daughter in marriage, two millions of crowns as her portion, one million six hundred thousand as the arrears of king John's ransom, and the immediate possession and full sovereignty of Normandy, and of all the other provinces which had been ravished from England by the arms of Philip Augustus; together with the superiority of Britanny and Flanders (q). Such exorbitant demands show that he was sensible of the present miserable condition of France; and the terms offered by the French court, though much inferior, discover their consciousness of the same melancholy truth. They were willing to give him the princess in marriage, to pay him eight hundred thousand crowns, to resign the entire sovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province the country of Perigord, Rovergue, Xaintonge, the Angoumois, and other territories (r). As Henry rejected these conditions, and scarcely hoped that his own demands would be complied with, he never intermitted a moment his preparations for war; and having assembled a great fleet and army at Southampton, having invited all the nobility and military men of the kingdom to attend him by the hopes of glory and of conquest, he came to the sea-side, with a purpose of embarking on his expedition.

But while Henry was meditating conquests upon his neighbours, he unexpectedly found himself in danger from a conspiracy at home, which was happily detected in its infancy. The earl of Cambridge, second son of the late duke of York, having espoused the sister of the earl of Marche, had zealously embraced the interests of that family; and had held some conferences with Henry lord Scrope of Masham, treasurer to the king; and sir Thomas Grey of Heton, in Northumberland; about the means of recovering to that nobleman his right to the crown of England. Their design, as confessed by the earl of Cambridge, was to convey the earl of Marche into Wales, and there proclaim him king, in the hope that the Welsh would flock to his standard and support his cause. The conspirators having acknowledged their guilt to the king (s), Henry proceeded without delay to their trial and condemnation. The utmost that could be expected of the best king in those ages, was, that he would so far observe the essentials of justice, as not to make an innocent person a victim to his severity: but as to the formalities of law, which are often as material as the essentials themselves, they were sacrificed without scruple to the least interest or convenience. A jury of commoners was summoned: the three conspirators were indicted before them: the constable of Southampton castle swore that they had separately confessed their guilt to him: without other evidence, sir Thomas Grey was condemned and executed: but as the earl of Cambridge and lord Scrope pleaded the privilege of their peerage, Henry thought proper to summon a court of eighteen barons, in which the duke of Clarence presided: the evidence given before the jury was read to them: the prisoners, though one of them was a prince of the blood, were not examined, nor produced in court, nor heard in their own defence; but received sentence of death upon this proof, which was every way irregular and unsatisfactory; and the sentence was soon after executed. The earl of Marche was accused of having given his approbation to the conspiracy, and received a general pardon from the king (t). He was probably either innocent of the crime imputed to him, or had made reparation by his early repentance and discovery (u).

The successes which the arms of England have, in different ages, obtained over those of France, have been much owing to the favourable situation of the former kingdom. The English, happily seated in an island, could make advantage of every misfortune which attended their neighbours, and were little exposed to the danger of reprisals. They never left their own country but when they were conducted by a king of extraordinary genius, or found their enemy divided by intestine factions, or were supported by a powerful alliance on the continent; and as all these circumstances concurred at present to favour their enterprize, they had reason to expect from it proportionable success. The duke of Burgundy, expelled France by a combination of the princes, had been secretly soliciting the alliance of England (v); and Henry knew that this prince, though he scrupled at first to join the inveterate enemy of his country, would willingly, if he saw any probability of success, both assist him with his Flemish subjects, and draw over to the same side all his numerous partizans in France (w). Trusting therefore to this circumstance, but without establishing any concert with the duke, (after having appointed his brother, John duke of Bedford, regent of the kingdom,) he put to sea on the 13th of August, and landed near Harfleur, at the head of an army of six thousand men at arms, and twenty-four thousand foot, mostly archers. He immediately began the siege of that place, which was valiantly defended by d'Estouteville, and under him by de Guitri, de Gaucourt, and others of the French nobility: but as the garrison was weak, and the fortifications in bad repair, the governor was at last obliged to capitulate; and he promised to surrender the place if he received no succour before the 18th of September. The day came, and there was no appearance of a French army to relieve him. Henry, taking possession of the town, placed a garrison in it, and expelled all the French inhabitants, with an intention of peopling it anew with English. The French inhabitants were not allowed to carry their property with them; and (r) Ibid. p. 211. It is reported by some historians (see Hist. Croyl. Cont. p. 500.) that the Dauphin, in derision of Henry's claims and dissolute character, sent him a box of tennis balls, intimating that these implements of play were better adapted to him than the instruments of war. Henry returned for answer, that he would play such balls against the Parisian battlements, as would spread terror and destruction among the dauphin's countrymen. "This story," says Mr. Hume, "is by no means credible; the great offers made by the court of France show that they had already entertained a just idea of Henry's character, as well as of their own situation." Notwithstanding that gentleman's opinion, we observe that it is communicated by a contemporary writer, and that it is corroborated by a ballad of that age, descriptive of Henry's first campaign against the French, it may perhaps be founded in truth.

(w) With respect, however, to the claim which Henry resolved to advance to the French crown, it was palpably ill-founded; for, even on the supposition that the pretensions of Edward III. were just, that prince's right had not descended to Henry, but resided at present in Edmund earl of Marche, the legitimate heir of Edward; and the other alternative, grounded on the invalidity of Edward's title, was more completely destructive of Henry's allegations of right. But the latter affected to consider the claims of the earl of Marche as superseded by that parliamentary vote which had placed the late king on the throne of England; and regarding himself as the heir of his great grandfather Edward, determined on the revival of that monarch's claim.

as their wealth had been acquired principally by piracy, the spoil made some compensation to the English for the fatigues of the siege, which, together with the unusual heat of the season, which brought on a dysentery, had so wasted the English army, that Henry could enter on no farther enterprize; indeed it proved fatal to about two thousand persons, and rendered a much greater number incapable of service; so that he was obliged to think of returning to England. He had dismissed his transports, which could not anchor in an open road upon the enemy's coasts: and he lay under the necessity of marching by land to Calais, before he could reach a place of safety. A numerous French army of fourteen thousand men at arms, and forty thousand foot, was by this time assembled in Normandy under the constable d'Albret; a force which, if prudently conducted, was sufficient either to trample down the English in the open field, or to harrass and reduce to nothing their small army, before they could finish so long and difficult a march. Henry, therefore, cautiously offered to sacrifice his conquest of Harfleur for a safe passage to Calais; but his proposal being rejected, he determined to make his way by valour and conduct through all the opposition of the enemy (x). That he might not discourage his army by the appearance of flight, or expose them to those hazards which naturally attend precipitate marches, he made slow and deliberate journies (y), till he reached the Somme, which he purposed to pass at the ford of Blanchetague, the same place where Edward III. in a like situation, had before escaped from Philip de Valois. But he found the ford rendered impassable by the precaution of the French general, and guarded by a strong body on the opposite bank (z); and he was obliged to march higher up the river, in order to seek for a safe passage. He was continually harassed on his march by flying parties of the enemy; saw bodies of troops on the other side ready to oppose every attempt; his provisions were cut off; his soldiers languished with sickness and fatigue; and his affairs seemed to be reduced to a desperate situation: when he was so dexterous or so fortunate as to arrive at a spot between Corbie and Peronne, on the Somme, where, unmolested by the French, his whole army passed over that river (a) on the 19th of October.

Henry then bent his march northwards to Calais; but was still exposed to great and imminent danger from the enemy, who had also passed the Somme, and threw themselves in his way, with a purpose of intercepting his retreat. After he had passed the small river of Ternois at Blangi, he was surprized to observe from the heights the whole French army drawn up in the plains of Azincour, and so posted, that it was impossible for him to proceed on his march without coming to an engagement. This was on the 25th of October. Nothing in appearance could be more unequal than the battle, upon which his safety and all his fortunes now depended. The English army was little more than half the number which had disembarked at Harfleur; and they laboured under every discouragement and necessity. The enemy was four times more numerous; was headed by the dauphin and all the princes of the blood; and was plentifully supplied with provisions of every kind. Henry's situation was exactly similar to that of Edward at Cressy, and that of the Black Prince at Poictiers; and the memory of these great events, inspiring the English with courage, made them hope for a like deliverance from their present difficulties. The king likewise observed the same prudent conduct which had been followed by these great commanders: he drew up his army on a narrow ground between two woods, which guarded each flank; and patiently expected in that posture the attack of the enemy (b).

Had the French constable been able, either to reason justly upon the present circumstances of the two armies, or to profit by past experience, he had declined a combat, and had waited till necessity, obliging the English to advance, had made them relinquish the advantages of their situation. But the impetuous valour of the nobility, and a vain confidence in superior numbers, brought on this fatal action, which proved the source of infinite calamities to their country. The French archers on horseback, and their men at arms, crowded in their ranks, advanced upon the English archers, who had fixed pallisadoes in their front to break the impression of the enemy, and who safely plyed them, from behind that defence, with a shower of arrows, which nothing could resist (c). The clay soil, moistened by some rain which had lately fallen, proved another obstacle to the force of the French cavalry: the wounded men and horses discomposed their ranks: the narrow compass in which they were pent, hindered them from recovering any order: the whole army was a scene of confusion, terror, and dismay: and Henry, perceiving his advantage, ordered the English archers, who were light and unincumbered, to advance upon the enemy, and seize the moment of victory. They fell with their battle-axes upon the French, who, in their present posture, were incapable of flying or of making defence: they hewed them in pieces without resistance (d); and being seconded by the men at arms, who also pushed on against the enemy, they covered the field with the killed, wounded, dismounted, and overthrown. After all appearance of opposition was over, the English had leisure to make prisoners, and having advanced with uninterrupted success to the open plain, they there saw the remains of the French rear guard, which still maintained the appearance of a line of battle. At the same time, they heard an alarm from behind: some gentlemen of Picardy, having collected about six hundred peasants, had fallen upon the English baggage, and were doing execution on the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, seeing the enemy on all sides of him, began to entertain apprehensions from his prisoners: and he thought it necessary to issue general orders for putting them to death: but on discovering the truth, he stopped the slaughter, and was still able to save a great number.

No battle was ever more fatal to France, by the number of princes and nobility slain or taken prisoners. Among the former were the constable himself, the count of Nevers and the duke of Brabant, brothers to the duke of Burgundy, the count of Vaudemont, brother to the duke of Lorraine, the duke of Alençon, the duke of Barre, the count of Marle. The most eminent prisoners were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts d'Eu, Vendôme, and Richemont, and the mareschal of Boucicaut. An archbishop of Sens also was slain in this battle. The killed are computed on the whole to have amounted to ten thousand men; and as the slaughter fell chiefly upon the cavalry, it is pretended, that of these eight thousand were gentlemen. Henry was master of fourteen thousand prisoners. The person of chief note, who fell among the English, was the duke of York, who perished fighting by the king's side, and had an end more honourable than his

(a) Although the acquisition of Harfleur was an object of importance to Henry, yet the great loss he sustained before the place rendered it a dear bought conquest. This loss proceeded not so much from the fatigues of the siege, as from the epidemic disorder which prevailed among his army, as abovementioned, and which reduced it to about fifteen thousand men. In this dilemma he was obliged to think of returning to England; but the mode of accomplishing this, in a manner that could satisfy his own feelings, appearing a matter of difficulty, he summoned a council to deliberate on the subject. The duke of Clarence, Henry's eldest brother, gave his opinion in favour of an immediate embarkation at Harfleur; but Henry rashly refused to adopt it, though it seemed to be the only measure which prudence could justify in his present situation, notwithstanding it might wear the appearance of an ignominious flight; and he declared, that he would rather make his way by land to Calais. The latter mode was accordingly adopted, and every thing prepared for this impolitic and dangerous expedition. In order to rescue Henry from the charge of imprudence in this particular, Mr. Hume has inconsiderately asserted, that, having dismissed his transports, he lay under a necessity of marching to Calais, before he could reach a place of safety. This assertion, however, carries a palpable absurdity on the face of it; for, admitting that the transports had actually departed, it certainly would have been more adviseable, in point of expedition, to send over to England for transports, the distance by sea not exceeding thirty leagues, and wait their arrival, than to have attempted a passage through a tract of country nearly two hundred miles in extent, unprovided with guides, unsupplied with provisions, and pursued and harassed by an army which most historians make amount to nearly ten times the number of his own, (but even that statement appears to have been exaggerated.) No one will surely contend, that there was not a vessel in the port to send over to England; because, subsequent to the adoption of Henry's proposal, the duke of Clarence, with the earl of Marche, and many other noblemen, who had suffered from the disorder which had proved so fatal to the English troops, embarked at Harfleur for England, whither they went for the recovery of their health. Nor will it scarcely be asserted, that Harfleur could be deemed a place of safety, since, with an inferior army, it had sustained a long and vigorous siege; and, after its capture, Henry had been careful to repair all the damages which the fortifications had sustained by the different attacks. This perilous enterprize, therefore, was not the result of necessity, but the consequence of enthusiastic ambition and obstinate temerity.

life. He was succeeded in his honours and fortune by his nephew, son of the earl of Cambridge, executed in the beginning of the year. All the English who were slain exceeded not forty; though some writers, with greater probability, make the number more considerable.

The three great battles of Cressy, Poictiers, and Azincour, bear a singular resemblance to each other in their most considerable circumstances. In all of them, there appears the same temerity in the English princes, who without any object of moment, merely for the sake of plunder, had ventured so far into the enemies' country as to leave themselves no retreat; and unless saved by the utmost imprudence in the French commanders, were, from their very situation, exposed to inevitable destruction. But allowance being made for this temerity, which, according to the irregular plans of war followed in those ages, seems to have been, in some measure, unavoidable; there appears, in the day of action, the same presence of mind, dexterity, courage, firmness, and precaution, on the part of the English: the same precipitation, confusion, and vain confidence, on the part of the French; and the events were such as might have been expected from such opposite conduct. The immediate consequences too of these three great victories were similar: instead of pushing the French with vigour, and taking advantage of their consternation, the English princes, after their victory, seem rather to have relaxed their efforts, and to have allowed the enemy leisure to recover from his losses. Henry interrupted not his march a moment after the battle of Azincour; he carried his prisoners to Calais, thence to England; he even concluded a truce with the enemy; and it was not till after an interval of two years that any body of English troops appeared in France.

The poverty of all the European princes, and the small resources of their kingdoms, were the cause of these continual interruptions in their hostilities; and though the maxims of war were in general destructive, their military operations were mere incursions, which, without any settled plan, they carried on against each other. The lustre, however, attending the victory of Azincour, procured some supplies from the English parliament, though still unequal to the expences of a campaign. They granted Henry an entire fifteenth of moveables; and they conferred on him, for life, the duties of tonnage and poundage, and the subsidies on the exportation of wool and leather. This concession is more considerable than that which had been granted to Richard II. by his last parliament, and which was afterwards, on his deposition, made so great an article of charge against him.

But during this interruption of hostilities from England, France was exposed to all the furies of civil war; and the several parties became every day more enraged against each other. The duke of Burgundy, confident that the French ministers and generals were entirely discredited by the misfortune at Azincour, advanced with a great army to Paris, and attempted to re-instate himself in possession of the government, as well as of the person of the king. But his partizans in that city were overawed by the court, and kept in subjection: the duke despaired of success; and he retired with his forces, which he immediately disbanded in the Low-Countries (e). He was soon after invited to make a new attempt, by some violent quarrels which broke out in the royal family. The queen Isabella, daughter of the duke of Bavaria, who had been hitherto an inveterate enemy to the Burgundian faction, had received a great injury from the other party, which the implacable spirit of that princess was never able to forgive. The public necessities obliged the count of Armagnac, created constable of France in the place of d'Albret, to seize the great treasures which Isabella had amassed: and when she expressed her displeasure at this injury, he inspired into the weak mind of the king some jealousies concerning her conduct, and pushed him to seize and put to the torture, and afterwards throw into the Seine, Boisbourdon, her favourite, whom he accused of a commerce of gallantry with that princess. The queen herself was sent to Tours, and confined under a guard (f); and, after suffering these multiplied insults, she no longer scrupled to enter into a correspondence with the duke of Burgundy. As her son, the dauphin Charles, a youth of sixteen, was entirely governed by the faction of Armagnac, she extended her animosity to him, and sought his destruction with the most unrelenting hatred. She had soon an opportunity of rendering her unnatural purpose effectual. The duke of Burgundy, in concert with her, entered France at the head of a great army: he made himself master of Amiens, Abbeville, Dourlens, Montreüil, and other towns in Picardy; Senlis, Rheims, Chalons, Troye, and Auxerre, declared themselves of his party (g). He got possession of Beaumont, Pontoise, Vernon, Meulant, Montlheri, towns in the neighbourhood of Paris; and carrying farther his progress towards the west, he seized Etampes, Chartres, and other fortresses; and was at last able to deliver the queen, who fled to Troye, and openly declared against those ministers who, she said, detained her husband in captivity (h).

Meanwhile the partizans of Burgundy raised a commotion in Paris, which always inclined to that faction. Lile-Adam one of the duke's captains, was received into the city in the night-time, and headed the insurrection of the people, which in a moment became so impetuous that nothing could oppose it. The person of the king was seized: the dauphin made his escape with difficulty: great numbers of the faction of Armagnac were immediately butchered: the count himself, and many persons of note, were thrown into prison: murders were daily committed from private animosity, under pretence of faction: and the populace, not satiated with their fury, and deeming the course of public justice too dilatory, broke into the prisons, and put to death the count of Armagnac, and all the other nobility who were there confined (i). In the first three days, besides the count D'Armagnac himself, the chancellor of the kingdom, and six prelates, three thousand five hundred persons were inhumanly murdered. Amidst this scene of desolation, the queen and duke made a triumphal entry into the metropolis; and, not yet satiated with the torrents of blood they had caused to flow, ordered a renewal of the massacre, when about fourteen thousand persons, of which five thousand were women, were sacrificed to their infernal rage.

While France was in such a melancholy state, and so ill prepared to resist a foreign enemy, Henry the Fifth having collected some treasure, and levied an army, landed in Normandy at the head of twenty-five thousand men on the 1st of August, 1717; and met with no considerable opposition from any quarter. He made himself master of Falaise; Evreux and Caen submitted to him; Pont de l'Arche opened its gates; and Henry, having subdued all the lower Normandy, and having received a reinforcement of fifteen thousand men from England (k), formed the siege of Roüen, which was defended by a garrison of four thousand men, seconded by the inhabitants, to the number of fifteen thousand (l). The cardinal des Ursins here attempted to incline him towards peace, and to moderate his pretensions; but the king replied to him in such terms, as shewed he was fully sensible of all his present advantages: "Do you not see," said he, "that God has led me hither as by the hand? France has no sovereign: I have just pretensions to that kingdom: every thing is here in the utmost confusion: no one thinks of resisting me. Can I have a more sensible proof, that the Being who disposes of empires, has determined to put the crown of France upon my head? (m)"

But though Henry had opened his mind to this scheme of ambition, he still continued to negociate with his enemies, and endeavoured to obtain more secure, though less considerable advantages. He made, at the same time, offers of peace to both parties; to the queen and duke of Burgundy on the one hand, who, having possession of the king's person, carried the appearance of legal authority; and to the dauphin on the other, who, being the undoubted heir of the monarchy, was adhered to by every one that payed any regard to the true interests of their country. These two parties also carried on a continual negociation with each other. The terms proposed on all sides were perpetually varying: the events of the war, and the intrigues of the cabinet, intermingled with each other; and the fate of France remained long in this state of uncertainty. After many negociations, Henry offered the queen and the duke of Burgundy to make peace with them, to espouse the princess Catharine, and to accept of all the provinces ceded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretigni, with the addition of Normandy, which he was to receive in full and entire sovereignty. These terms were submitted to in the beginning of 1419. There remained only some circumstances to adjust, in order to the entire completion of the treaty; but in this interval the duke of Burgundy secretly finished his treaty with the dauphin; and these two princes agreed to share the royal authority during king Charles's life-time, and to unite their arms in order to expel the foreign enemies.

This alliance, which seemed to cut off from Henry all hopes of farther success, proved, in the issue, the most favourable event that could have happened for his pretensions. Whether the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy were ever sincere in their mutual engagements, is uncertain; but very fatal effects resulted from their momentary and seeming union. The two princes agreed to an interview, in order to concert the means of rendering effectual their common attack on the English; but how both or either of them could with safety venture upon this conference, it seemed somewhat difficult to contrive. The assassination perpetrated by the duke of Burgundy, and still more, his open avowal of the deed, and defence of the doctrine, tended to dissolve all the bands of civil society; and even men of honour, who detested the example, might deem it just, on a favourable opportunity, to retaliate upon the author. The duke, therefore, who neither dared to give, nor could pretend to expect, any trust, agreed to all the contrivances for mutual security which were proposed by the ministers of the dauphin. The two princes came to Montereau: the duke lodged in the castle: the dauphin in the town, which was divided from the castle by the river Yonne: the bridge between them was chosen for the place of interview: two high rails were drawn across the bridge: the gates on each side were guarded, one by the officers of the dauphin, the other by those of the duke: the princes were to enter into the intermediate space by the opposite gates, accompanied each by ten persons; and, with all these marks of diffidence, to conciliate their mutual friendship. But it appeared that no precautions are sufficient where laws have no place, and where all principles of honour are utterly abandoned. Tannegui de Chatel, and others of the dauphin's retainers, had been zealous partizans of the late duke of Orleans; and they determined to seize the opportunity of revenging on the assassin the murder of that prince: they no sooner entered the rails, than they drew their swords and attacked the duke of Burgundy: his friends were astonished, and thought not of making any defence; and all of them either shared his fate, or were taken prisoners by the retinue of the dauphin (n).

The extreme youth of this prince made it doubtful whether he had been admitted into the secret of the conspiracy; but as the deed was committed under his eye, by his most intimate friends, who still retained their connections with him, the blame of the action, which was certainly imprudent, fell entirely upon him. The whole state of affairs was every where changed by this unexpected incident. The city of Paris, passionately devoted to the family of Burgundy, broke out into the highest fury against the dauphin. The court of king Charles entered from interest into the same views; and as all the ministers of that monarch had owed their preferment to the late duke, and foresaw their downfall if the dauphin should recover possession of his father's person, they were concerned to prevent, by any means, the success of his enterprize. The queen, persevering in her unnatural animosity against her son, encreased the general flame, and inspired into the king, as far as he was susceptible of any sentiment, the same prejudices by which she herself had long been actuated. But above all, Philip count of Charolois, now duke of Burgundy, thought himself bound, by every tie of honour and of duty, to revenge the murder of his father, and to prosecute the assassin to the utmost extremity. And in this general transport of rage, every consideration of national and family interest was buried in oblivion by all parties: the subjection to a foreign enemy, the expulsion of the lawful heir, the slavery of the kingdom, appeared but small evils if they led to the gratification of the present passion.

The king of England had, before the death of the duke of Burgundy, profited extremely by the distractions of France, and was daily making a considerable progress in Normandy. He had taken Roüen after an obstinate siege (o): he had made himself master of Pontoise and Gisors: he even threatened Paris, and by the terror of his arms had obliged the court to remove to Troye; and in the midst of his successes, he was agreeably surprised to find his enemies, instead of combining against him for their mutual defence, disposed to rush into his arms, and to make him the instrument of their vengeance upon each other. A league was immediately concluded at Arras between him and the duke of Burgundy. This prince, without stipulating any thing for himself, except the prosecution of his father's murder, and the marriage of the duke of Bedford with his sister, was willing to sacrifice the kingdom to Henry's ambition; and he agreed to every demand made by that monarch. In order to finish this astonishing treaty, which was to transfer the crown of France to a stranger, Henry went to Troye, in 1420, accompanied by his brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester; and was there met by the duke of Burgundy. The imbecility into which Charles had fallen, made him incapable of seeing any thing but through the eyes of those who attended him; as they, on their part, saw every thing through the medium of their passions. The treaty, being already concerted among the parties, was immediately drawn, and signed, and ratified: Henry's will seemed to be a law throughout the whole negociation: nothing was attended to but his advantages.

The principal articles of the treaty were, that Henry should espouse the princess Catharine: that king Charles, during his lifetime, should enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: that Henry should be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be entrusted with the present administration of the government: that that kingdom should pass to his heirs general: that France and England should for ever be united under one king; but should still retain their several usages, customs, and privileges: that all the princes, peers, vassals, and communities of France should swear, that they would both adhere to the future succession of Henry, and pay him present obedience as regent: that this prince should unite his arms to those of king Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to subdue the adherents of Charles, the pretended dauphin: and that these three princes should make no peace or truce with him but by common consent and agreement (p).

Such was the tenour of this celebrated treaty; a treaty which, as nothing but the most violent animosity could dictate it, so nothing but the power of the sword could carry into execution. It is hard to say whether its consequences, had it taken effect, would have proved more pernicious to England or to France. It must have reduced the former kingdom to the rank of a province: it would have entirely disjointed the succession of the latter, and have brought on the destruction of every descendant of the royal family; as the houses of Orleans, Anjou, Alençon, Britanny, Bourbon, and of Burgundy itself, whose titles were preferable to that of the English princes, would, on that account, have been exposed to perpetual jealousy and persecution from the sovereign. There was even a palpable deficiency in Henry's claim, which no art could palliate. For, besides the insuperable objections to which Edward IIId's pretensions were exposed, he was not heir to that monarch (q).

Though all the considerations relative to Henry's title were overlooked, amidst the hurry of passion by which the courts of France and Burgundy were actuated, they would necessarily revive during times of more tranquillity; and it behoved Henry to push his present advantages, and allow men no leisure for reason or reflection. In a few days after, May 30, 1420, he espoused the princess Catharine: and being willing to subdue the Armagnacs while they were odious to the people, on the third day after his marriage he marched to Sens, which in a few days opened its gates. With the same facility he made himself master of Montereau. The defence of Melun was more obstinate: Barbasan, the governor, held out for the space of four months against the besiegers; and it was famine alone which obliged him to capitulate, on the 18th of November. Henry stipulated to spare the lives of all the garrison, except such as were accomplices in the murder of the duke of Burgundy; and as Barbasan himself was suspected to be of the number, his punishment was demanded by Philip: but the king had the generosity to intercede for him, and to prevent his execution (r).

When Henry had obtained possession of Melun, he directed his march to Paris; where his authority, as regent and heir to the throne, had been chearfully acknowledged. He was accompanied by the king and queen of France, the duke of Burgundy, and many persons of the first rank. The two monarchs, made their public entry into the metropolis on the first Sunday in Advent, and the two queens on the following day; when they were received by the citizens with every possible demonstration of joy. On the tenth of December, an assembly of the three estates of the kingdom was held, with great solemnity, in the grand hall of the palace of St. Paul; in which the treaty of Troyes, vainly denominated "The final and perpetual Peace," was publicly ratified, and declared to be a standing and irrevocable law of the realm; and an act was passed, requiring all the subjects, of the kingdom to take the oaths stipulated by that treaty.

The necessity of providing supplies, both of men and money, obliged Henry to go over to England; and he left the duke of Exeter, his uncle, governor of Paris during his absence. The authority which naturally attends success, procured from the English parliament a subsidy of a fifteenth; but, if we may judge by the scantiness of the supply, the nation was nowise sanguine on their king's victories; and in proportion as the prospect of their union with France became nearer, they began to open their eyes, and to see the dangerous consequences with which that event must necessarily be attended. It was fortunate for Henry, that he had other resources besides pecuniary supplies from his native subjects. The provinces which he had already conquered maintained his troops; and the hopes of farther advantages allured to his standard all men of ambitious spirits in England, who desired to signalize themselves by arms. He levied a new army of twenty-four thousand archers and four thousand horsemen, and marched them to Dover, the place of rendezvous. Every thing had remained in tranquillity at Paris under the duke of Exeter; but there had happened, in another quarter of the kingdom, a misfortune which hastened the king's embarkation.

The detention of the young king of Scots in England had hitherto proved advantageous to Henry; and, by keeping the regent in awe, had preserved, during the whole course of the French war, the northern frontier in tranquillity. But when intelligence arrived in Scotland of the progress made by Henry, and the near prospect of his succession to the crown of France, the nation was alarmed, and foresaw their own inevitable ruin, if the subjection of their ally left them to combat alone a victorious enemy, who was already so much superior in power and riches. The regent entered into the same views; and though he declined an open rupture with England, he permitted a body of seven thousand Scots, under the command of the earl of Buchan, his second son, to be transported into France for the service of the dauphin. To render this aid ineffectual, Henry had, in his former expedition, carried over the king of Scots, whom he obliged to send orders to his countrymen to leave the French service; but the Scottish general replied, that he would obey no commands which came from a king in captivity, and that a prince, while in the hands of his enemy, was not entitled to authority. These troops, therefore, continued still to act under the earl of Buchan; and were employed by the dauphin to oppose the progress of the duke of Clarence in Anjou. The two armies encountered at Baugé: the English were defeated: the duke himself was slain by Sir Allan Swinton, a Scotch knight, who commanded a company of men at arms; and the earls of Somerset, Dorset, and Huntingdon, were taken prisoners. This was the first action that turned the tide of success against the English; and the dauphin, that he might both attach the Scotch to his service, and reward the valour and conduct of the earl of Buchan, honoured that nobleman with the office of constable.

But the arrival of the king of England with so considerable an army, was more than sufficient to repair this loss. Henry was received at Paris with great expressions of joy; so obstinate were the prejudices of the people; and he immediately conducted his army to Chartres, which had long been besieged by the dauphin. That prince raised the siege on the approach of the English; and being resolved to decline a battle, he retired with his army. Henry made himself master of Dreux without a blow, on the 20th of August: he laid siege to Meaux at the solicitation of the Parisians, who were greatly incommoded by the garrison of that place. The siege was commenced on the 6th of October, and employed the English arms during the space of eight months: the bastard of Vaurus, governor of Meaux, distinguished himself by an obstinate defence; but was at last obliged to surrender at discretion. The cruelty of this officer was equal to his bravery: he was accustomed to hang, without distinction, all the English and Burgundians who fell into his hands, on a particular tree, called the oak of Vaurus; and Henry, in revenge of his barbarity, ordered him immediately to be hanged on the same tree which he had made the instrument of his inhuman executions (s).

This success was followed by the surrender of many other places in the neighbourhood of Paris, which held out for the dauphin: that prince was chased beyond the Loire, and he almost totally abandoned all the northern provinces: he was even pursued into the south by the united arms of the English and Burgundians, and threatened with total destruction. Notwithstanding the bravery and fidelity of his captains, he saw himself unequal to his enemies in the field; and found it necessary to temporize, and to avoid all hazardous actions with a rival, who had gained so much the ascendant over him.

While the king was engaged in these enterprizes he received the pleasing intelligence that his queen was delivered of a son at Windsor, on the 6th of December, 1421. The young prince, who was baptized soon after his birth by the name of Henry, appears to have been universally regarded by the English and French as heir to both monarchies. The queen on her recovery, returned to France, and joined the king in his camp before Meaux; and after the reduction of that place they both repaired to Paris, where they celebrated the festival of Whitsuntide, at the palace of the Louvre, with great magnificence.

The dauphin with the auxiliaries he had received from Scotland and Castile, had by this time collected an army of twenty thousand men, the chief command of which was given to the earl of Buchan, as constable of France. With these troops he obtained possession of La Charité; opened the passage of the Loire; and then formed the siege of Cosne, a town on that river, the garrison of which agreed to surrender, if not relieved by the duke of Burgundy before the 18th of August. The duke apprized of their situation, determined to march to their relief; and sent a message to the king to request a reinforcement. Henry replied, that he would attend him in person, that he might share in the glory of terminating the war by one decisive engagement. With this view he left Paris; but, on his arrival at Senlis, he was seized with a fistula, a malady which the surgeons of that age had not skill enough to cure. He was then put in a litter, and conveyed from Senlis; but the pain increasing, and most dangerous symptoms appearing, he found himself unable to proceed, and therefore resigned the command of his army to his brother, the duke of Bedford, (who had accompanied the queen to France,) and returned by water to Bois de Vincennes.

When the English and Burgundians approached the army of the dauphin, that prince immediately raised the siege of Cosne, not daring to risk a battle, the loss of which must have proved fatal to his interest. The duke of Bedford therefore hastened back to the king, whom he found at the last extremity. He now sent for the earl of Warwick, and some other noblemen, whom he had honoured with his friendship; and he delivered to them, in great tranquillity, his last will with regard to the government of his kingdom and family. He earnestly entreated them to continue, towards his infant son, the same fidelity and attachment which they had always professed to himself during his life-time, and which had been cemented by so many mutual good offices. He expressed his indifference on the approach of death; and though he regretted that he must leave unfinished a work so happily begun, he declared himself confident, that the final acquisition of France would be the effect of their prudence and valour. He left the regency of that kingdom to his elder brother the duke of Bedford; that of England to his younger, the duke of Gloucester; and the care of his son's person to the earl of Warwick. He recommended to all of them a great attention to maintain the friendship of the duke of Burgundy; and advised them never to give liberty to the duke of Orleans and the other French princes taken at Azincour, till his son were of age, and could himself hold the reins of government. He recommended his queen to their care and protection; and conjured them, if the success of their arms should not enable them to place young Henry on the throne of France, never, at least, to make peace with that kingdom, unless the enemy, by the cession of Normandy, and its annexation to the crown of England, land, made compensation for all the hazard and expence of his enterprize (t).

He next applied himself to his devotions, and ordered his chaplain to recite the seven penitential psalms. When that passage of the fifty-first psalm was read, "Build thou the walls of Jerusalem;" he interrupted the chaplain, and declared his serious intention, after he should have fully subdued France, to conduct a crusade against the infidels, and recover possession of the Holy Land (u). So ingenious are men in deceiving themselves, that Henry forgot, in those moments, all the blood spilt by his ambition; and received comfort from this late and feeble resolve, which, as the mode of these enterprizes was now past, he certainly would never have carried into execution. He expired on the 31st of August, 1422, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign (v).

This prince possessed many eminent virtues; and if we give indulgence to ambition in a monarch, or rank it, as the vulgar are inclined to do, among his virtues, they were unstained by any considerable blemish. His abilities appeared equally in the cabinet and in the field: the boldness of his enterprizes was no less remarkable than his personal valour in conducting them. He had the talent of attaching his friends by affability, and of gaining his enemies by address and clemency. The English, dazzled by the lustre of his character, still more than by that of his victories, were reconciled to the defects in his title: the French almost forgot that he was an enemy; and his care in maintaining justice in his civil administration, and preserving discipline in his armies, made some amends to both nations for the calamities inseparable from those wars in which his short reign was almost entirely occupied. That he could forgive the earl of Marche, who had a better title to the crown than himself, is a sure indication of his magnanimity; and that the earl relied so entirely on his friendship, is no less a proof of his established character for candour and sincerity. There remain in history few instances of such mutual trust; and still fewer where neither party found reason to repent it.

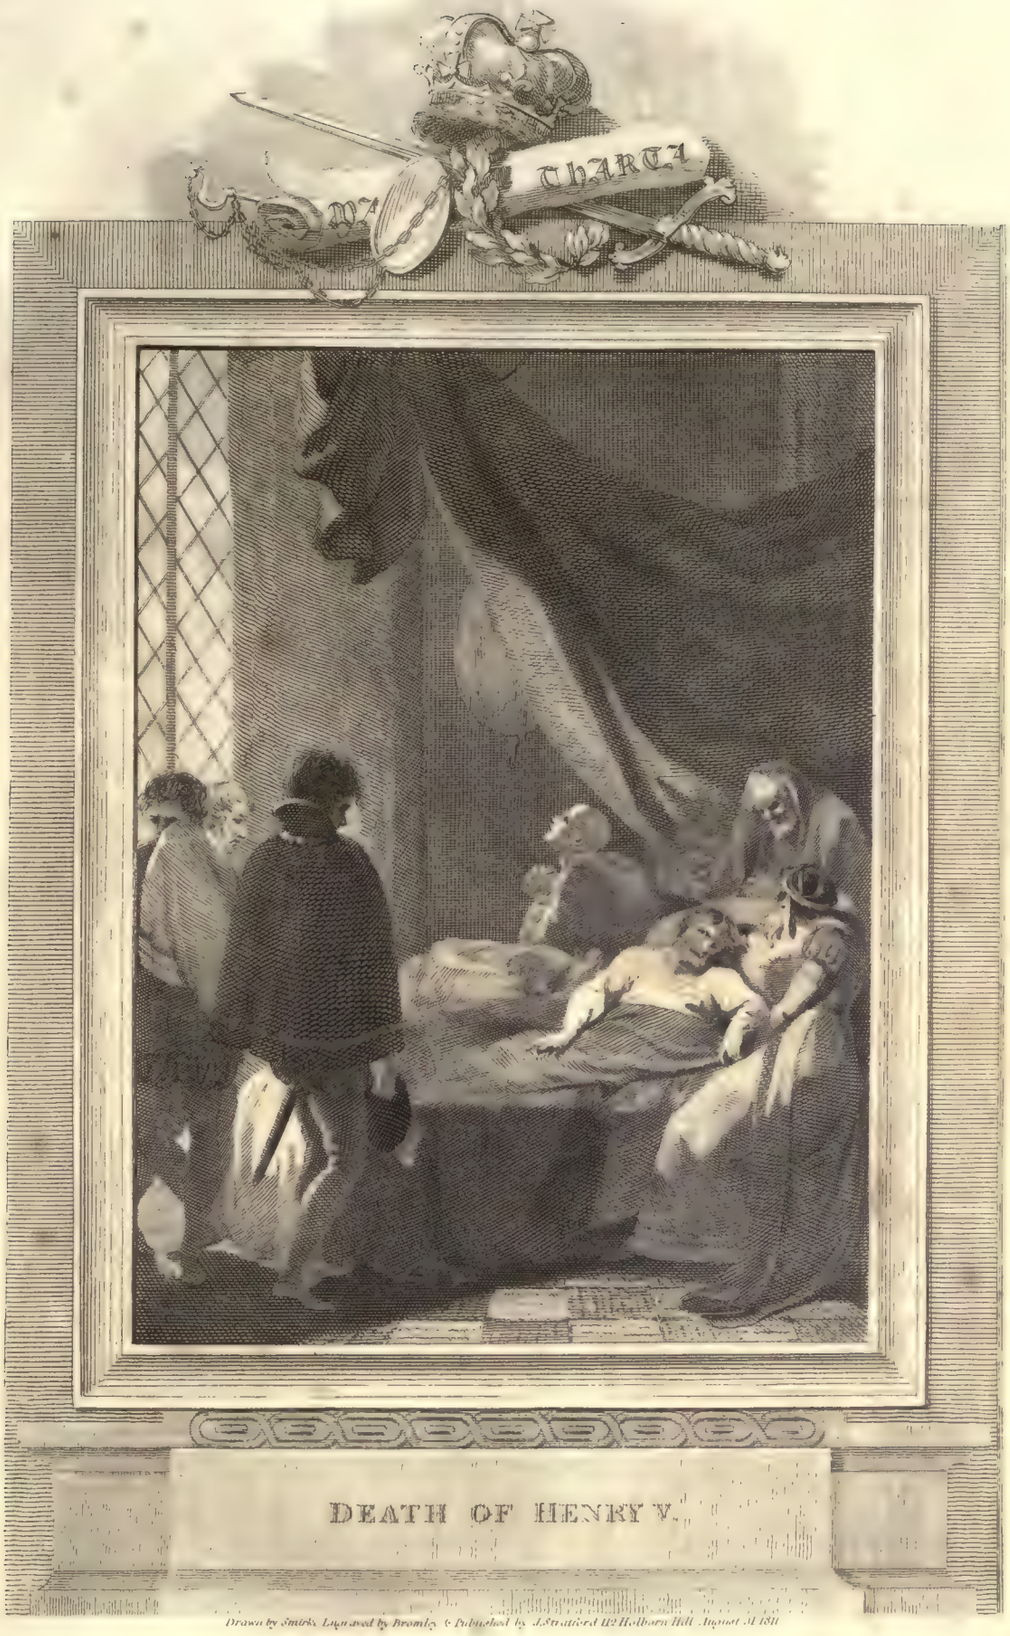
The exterior figure of this great prince, as well as his deportment, was engaging. His stature was somewhat above the middle size; his countenance beautiful; his limbs genteel and slender, but full of vigour; and he excelled in all warlike and manly exercises (w). He left, by his queen, Catherine of France, only one son, not full nine months old; whose misfortunes, in the course of his life, surpassed all the glories and successes of his father.

In less than two months after Henry's death, Charles VI. of France, his father-in-law, terminated his unhappy life. He had, for several years, possessed only the appearance of royal authority: yet was this mere appearance of considerable advantage to the English; and divided the duty and affections of the French between them and the dauphin. This prince was proclaimed and crowned king of France at Poictiers, by the name of Charles VII. Rheims, the place where this ceremony is usually performed, was at that time in the hands of his enemies.

Catherine of France, Henry's widow, married, soon after his death, a Welsh gentleman, Sir Owen Tudor, said to be descended from the ancient princes of that country: she bore him two sons, Edmund and Jasper, of whom the eldest was created earl of Richmond; the second earl of Pembroke. The family of Tudor, first raised to distinction by this alliance, mounted afterwards the throne of England.

The first commission of array which we meet with, was issued in this reign (x). The military part of the feudal system, which was the most essential circumstance of it, was entirely dissolved; and could no longer serve for the defence of the kingdom. Henry, therefore, when he went to France in 1415, impowered certain commissioners to take, in each county, a review of all the freemen able to bear arms, to divide them into companies, and to keep them in readiness for resisting an enemy. This was the æra when the feudal militia in England gave place to one which was perhaps still less orderly and regular.

We have an authentic and exact account of the ordinary revenue of the crown during this reign; and it amounts only to fifty-five thousand seven hundred and fourteen pounds ten shillings and ten pence a year (y). This is nearly the same with the revenue of Henry III. and the kings of England had neither become much richer nor poorer in the course of so many years. The ordinary expence of the government amounted to forty-two thousand five hundred and seven pounds sixteen shillings and ten pence: so that the king had a surplus only of thirteen thousand two hundred and six pounds fourteen shillings for the support of his household; for his wardrobe; for the expence of embassies, and other articles. This sum was nowise sufficient: he was therefore obliged to have frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies, and was thus, even in time of peace, not altogether independent of his people. But wars were attended with a great expence, which neither the prince's ordinary revenue, nor the extraordinary supplies, were able to bear; and the sovereign was always reduced to many miserable shifts, in order to make any tolerable figure in them. He commonly borrowed money from all quarters; he pawned his jewels, and sometimes the crown itself (z); he ran in arrears to his army; and he was often obliged, notwithstanding all these expedients, to stop in the midst of his career of victory, and to grant truces to the enemy. Nor will this be wondered at, when the high pay which was given to soldiers, which agreed very ill with this low income, is taken into consideration. All the extraordinary supplies granted by parliament to Henry during the course of his reign were only seven tenths and fifteenths, about two hundred and three thousand pounds (a). It is easy to compute how soon this money must be exhausted by armies of twenty-four thousand archers, and six thousand horse; when each archer had six-pence a day (b), and each horseman two shillings. The most splendid successes proved commonly fruitless, when supported by so poor a revenue; and the debts and difficulties which the king thereby incurred made him pay dear for his victories. The civil administration likewise, even in time of peace, could never be very regular, where the government was so ill enabled to support itself. Henry, till within a year of his death, owed debts which he had contracted when prince of Wales (c). It was in vain that the parliament pretended to restrain him from arbitrary exertions of his prerogative, when he was reduced to such necessities. Though the right of levying purveyance, for instance, had been expressly guarded against by the Great Charter itself, and was frequently complained of by the commons, it was found absolutely impracticable to abolish it; and the parliament at length, submitting to it as a legal prerogative, contented themselves with enacting laws to limit and confine it. The duke of Gloucester, in the reign of Richard II. possessed a revenue of sixty thousand crowns, (about thirty thousand pounds a year of our present money,) as we learn from Froissard (d), and was, consequently, richer than the king himself, if all circumstances be duly considered.



It is remarkable, that the city of Calais alone was an annual expence to the crown of nineteen thousand one hundred and nineteen pounds (e); that is, above a third of the common charge of the government in time of peace. This fortress was of no use to the defence of England, and only gave that kingdom an inlet to annoy France. Ireland cost two thousand pounds a year, over and above its own revenue; which was certainly very low. Every thing conspires to give us a very mean idea of the state of Europe in those ages.

From the most early times, till the reign of Edward III. the denomination of money had never been altered: a pound sterling was still a pound troy; that is, about three pounds of our present money. That conqueror was the first that innovated in this important article. In the twentieth of his reign he coined twenty-two shillings from a pound troy; in his twenty-seventh year he coined twenty-five shillings. But Henry V. who was also a conqueror, raised still farther the denomination, and coined thirty shillings from a pound troy (f): his revenue, therefore, must have been about one hundred and ten thousand pounds of our present money; and, by the cheapness of

None of the princes of the house of Lancaster ventured to impose taxes without consent of parliament: their doubtful or bad title became so far of advantage to the constitution. The rule was then fixed, and could not safely be broken afterwards, even by more absolute princes.

CHAP. III.

HENRY VI.

IT was during the reigns of the Lancastrian princes, that the authority of parliament seems to have been more confirmed, and the privileges of the people more regarded, than during any former period; and the two preceding kings, though men of great spirit and abilities, abstained from such exertions of prerogative, as even weak princes, whose title was undisputed, were tempted to think they might venture upon with impunity.

On the death of Henry the Fifth, his son Henry, who succeeded him in the throne, was but nine months old. This infant prince was proclaimed king on the first of October, 1422; and a parliament was summoned by the duke of Gloucester, who represented the person of his nephew, to assemble at Westminster in the ensuing month. But the respect which the people bore to the memory of their deceased sovereign, did not prevent them from exerting those rights which were vested in them by the laws of civil society. The prospect of a long minority encouraged still farther the lords and commons to extend their influence; and without paying much regard to the verbal destination of Henry V. they assumed the power of giving a new arrangement to the whole administration. They declined altogether the name of Regent with regard to England: they appointed the duke of Bedford protector or guardian of that kingdom, a title which they supposed to imply less authority: they invested the duke of Gloucester with the same dignity during the absence of his elder brother (g); and, in order to limit the power of both these princes, they appointed a council without whose advice and approbation no measure of importance could be determined (h). The person and education of the infant prince was committed to Henry Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, his great uncle, and the legitimated son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; a prelate, who, as his family could never have any pretensions to the crown, might safely, they thought, be intrusted with that important charge (i). The two princes, the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, who seemed injured by this plan of government, yet, being persons of great integrity and honour, acquiesced in any appointment which tended to give security to the public; and as the wars in France appeared to be the object of greatest moment, they avoided every dispute which might throw an obstacle in the way of foreign conquests.

Charles the Sixth, king of France, survived his son-in-law, the king of England, but fifty days; and his death gave rise to a revolution in France which was neither foreseen nor expected. Great numbers of the French, who had from a principle of duty acquiesced in the measures of their sovereign, though greatly displeased at his connection with the English, now deemed themselves released from those ties which had bound them to an obedience repugnant to their sentiments, and transferred their allegiance to the dauphin, whom they justly regarded as their lawful sovereign. The duke of Bedford, aware of this circumstance, adopted every measure which the deepest political knowledge could suggest, in order to avert, if possible, the evil consequences which might arise from it. With this view, soon after the death of Henry, he caused his infant son to be proclaimed king of France, and took upon himself the office of regent. He then convened an assembly at Paris, consisting of the chief nobles of his party, the parliament, the members of the university, the clergy, the magistrates, and principal burgesses, of the city, who all took the oaths of allegiance and fealty to young Henry as king of France; which were likewise exacted from the inhabitants of the different towns which adhered to the English interest.

While the duke of Bedford was taking these necessary precautions in behalf of his nephew, the dauphin, who then resided at the castle of Espailly, near Puy, in Auvergne, caused his friends to proclaim him king; and the ceremony of his coronation was accordingly performed, a few days after, at Poictiers, with all the solemnity which his situation and circumstances would admit of. Thus France had two monarchs at the same time, whose respective claims were insisted on with equal obstinacy, and which now remained to be decided by the sword, the only effectual argument in princely disputes. The situation, however, of the two princes was extremely different; and their strength and power appeared so very unequal, that there was but little reason to expect the contest between them would be of long duration. So that when the state of affairs between the English and French kings was considered with a superficial eye, every advantage seemed to be on the side of the former; and the total expulsion of Charles appeared to be an event which might naturally be expected from the superior power of his competitor. Though Henry was yet in his infacy, the administration was devolved on the duke of Bedford, the most accomplished prince of his age; whose experience, prudence, valour, and generosity, qualified him for high office, and enabled him both to maintain union among his friends, and to gain the confidence of his enemies. The whole power of England was at his command: he was at the head of armies enured to victory: he was seconded by the most renowned generals of the age, the earls of Somerset, Warwick, Salisbury, Suffolk, and Arundel, sir John Talbot, and sir John Fastolfe: and besides Guienne, the ancient inheritance of England, he was master of the capital, and of almost all the northern provinces, which were well enabled to furnish him with supplies both of men and money, and to assist and support his English forces.

But Charles, notwithstanding the present inferiority of his power, possessed some advantages, derived partly from his situation, partly from his personal character, which promised him success, and served, first to control, then to overbalance the superior force and opulence of his enemies. He was the true and undoubted heir of the monarchy: all Frenchmen, who knew the interests, or desired the independence of their country, turned their eyes towards him as its sole resource: the exclusion given him by the imbecility of his father, and the forced or precipitate consent of the states, had plainly no validity: that spirit of faction, which had blinded the people, could not long hold them in so gross a delusion: their national and inveterate hatred against the English, the authors of all their calamities, must soon revive, and inspire them with indignation, at bending their necks under the yoke of that hostile people: great nobles and princes, accustomed to maintain an independence against their native sovereigns, would never endure a subjection to strangers; and though most of the princes of the blood were, since the fatal battle of Azincour, detained prisoners in England, the inhabitants of their demesnes, their friends, their vassals, all declared a zealous attachment to the king, and exerted themselves in resisting the violence of foreign invaders.

Charles himself, though only in his twentieth year, was of a character well calculated to become the object of these benevolent sentiments; and, perhaps, from the favour which naturally attends youth, was the more likely, on account of his tender age, to acquire the good-will of his native subjects. He was a prince of the most friendly and benign disposition, of easy and familiar manners, and of a just and sound, though not a very vigorous understanding. Sincere, generous, affable, he engaged, from affection, the services of his followers, even while his low fortunes might make it their interest to desert him; and the lenity of his temper could pardon in them those sallies of discontent to which princes in his situation are so frequently exposed. The love of pleasure often seduced him into indolence; but, amidst all his irregularities, the goodness of his heart still shone forth; and, by exerting at intervals his courage and activity, he proved, that his general remissness proceeded not from the want either of a just spirit of ambition, or of personal valour.

Though the virtues of this amiable prince lay for some time in obscurity, the duke of Bedford knew that his title alone made him formidable, and that every foreign assistance would be requisite, ere an English regent could hope to complete the conquest of France; an enterprize which, however it might seem to be much advanced, was still exposed to many and great difficulties. The chief circumstance which had procured to the English all their present advantages was, the resentment of the duke of Burgundy against Charles; and as that prince seemed intent tent rather on gratifying his passion than consulting his interests, it was the more easy for the regent, by demonstrations of respect and confidence, to retain him in the alliance of England. He bent therefore all his endeavours to that purpose: he gave the duke every proof of friendship and regard: he even offered him the regency of France, which Philip declined; and that he might corroborate national connexions by private ties, he concluded his own marriage with the princess of Burgundy, which had been stipulated by the treaty of Arras.

Being sensible, that next to the alliance of Burgundy, the friendship of the duke of Britanny was of the greatest importance towards forwarding the English conquests; and that, as the provinces of France, already subdued, lay between the dominions of these two princes, he could never hope for any security without preserving his connexions with them; he was very intent on strengthening himself also from that quarter. The duke of Britanny, having received many just reasons of displeasure from the ministers of Charles, had already acceded to the treaty of Troye, and had, with other vassals of the crown, done homage to Henry V. in quality of heir to the kingdom: but as the regent knew, that the duke was much governed by his brother, the count of Richemont, he endeavoured to fix his friendship, by paying court and doing services to this haughty and ambitious prince.

Arthur, count of Richemont, had been taken prisoner at the battle of Azincour, had been treated with great indulgence by the late king, and had even been permitted on his parole to take a journey into Britanny, where the state of affairs required his presence. The death of that victorious monarch happened before Richemont's return; and this prince pretended, that as his word was given personally to Henry V. he was not bound to fulfil it towards his son and successor: a chicane which the regent, as he could not force him to compliance, deemed it prudent to overlook. An interview was settled at Amiens between the dukes of Bedford, Burgundy, and Britanny, at which the count of Richemont was also present (k): the alliance was renewed between these princes: and the regent persuaded Philip to give in marriage to Richemont his eldest sister, widow of the deceased dauphin, Louis, the elder brother of Charles. Thus Arthur was connected both with the regent and the duke of Burgundy, and seemed engaged by interest to prosecute the same object, in forwarding the success of the English arms.

While the vigilance of the duke of Bedford was employed in gaining or confirming these allies, whose vicinity rendered them so important, he did not overlook the state of more remote countries. The duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, had died; and his power had devolved on Murdac, his son, a prince of a weak understanding and indolent disposition; who, far from possessing the talents requisite for the government of that fierce people, was not even able to maintain authority in his own family, or restrain the petulance and insolence of his sons. The ardour of the Scots to serve in France, where Charles treated them with great honour and distinction, and where the regent's brother enjoyed the dignity of constable, broke out afresh under this feeble administration: new succours daily came over, and filled the armies of the French king: the earl of Douglas conducted a reinforcement of five thousand men to his assistance: and it was justly to be dreaded that the Scots, by commencing open hostilities in the north, would occasion a diversion still more considerable of the English power, and would ease Charles, in part, of that load by which he was at present so grievously oppressed. The duke of Bedford, therefore, persuaded the English council to form an alliance with James their prisoner; to free that prince from his long captivity; and to connect him with England, by marrying him to a daughter of the earl of Somerset and cousin of the young king (l). As the Scottish regent, tired of his present dignity, which he was unable to support, was now become entirely sincere in his applications for James's liberty; the treaty was soon concluded; a ransom of forty thousand pounds was stipulated (m); and the king of Scots was restored to the throne of his ancestors, and proved, in his short reign, one of the most illustrious princes that had ever swayed the sceptre of that kingdom. He was murdered in 1437, by his traiterous kinsman the earl of Athole.

His affections inclined to the side of France; but the English had never reason, during his life-time, to complain of any breach of the neutrality by Scotland.

But the regent was not so much employed in these political negociations as to neglect the operations of war, from which alone he could hope to succeed in expelling the French monarch. Though the chief seat of Charles's power lay in the southern provinces beyond the Loire; his partizans were possessed of some fortresses in the northern, and even in the neighbourhood of Paris; and it behoved the duke of Bedford first to clear these countries from the enemy, before he could think of attempting more distant conquests. The castle of Dorfoy was taken after a siege of six weeks: that of Noyelle and the town of Rüe in Picardy underwent the same fate: Pont sur Seine, Vertus, and Montaign, were subjected by the English arms: and a more considerable advantage was soon after gained by the united forces of England and Burgundy. James Stuart, constable of Scotland, at the head of the Scotch auxiliaries, and the mareschal Severac, with a body of French troops, had, in the month of July, 1423, formed the siege of Crevant in Burgundy: the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, with the count of Toulongeon, were sent to its relief: a fierce and well-disputed action ensued: the Scots and French were defeated: the constable of Scotland, and the count of Ventadour, were taken prisoners: and above a thousand men, among whom was sir William Hamilton, were left on the field of battle (n). The taking of Gaillon upon the Seine, and of la Charité upon the Loire, was the fruit of this victory: and as this latter place opened an entrance into the southern provinces, the acquisition of it appeared on that account of the greater importance to the duke of Bedford, and seemed to promise a successful termination to the war.

To enable Charles to retrieve these losses, which had given the most gloomy aspect to his affairs, the duke of Milan sent him a fresh body of troops; with which, and the remains of his own army, he surprized the Burgundian general Toulongeon, whom he took prisoner, with six hundred of his men. Before the conclusion of the campaign, a strong party of his adherents attacked a body of the English, commanded by sir John de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, at Granville, in Le Maine; and, after a most obstinate contest, entirely defeated them, having killed fourteen hundred, and taken their general prisoner. This victory revived the drooping hopes of Charles; and the arrival of five thousand men, whom the earl of Buchan at this period brought from Scotland, under the command of Archibald earl of Douglas, one of the most renowned warriors of the age, inspired him with additional confidence. To evince his gratitude for so seasonable an assistance, Charles granted the dukedom of Touraine to Douglas, and conferred the lordship of Aubiney on Darnley.

The more Charles was threatened with an invasion in those provinces which adhered to him, the more necessary it became that he should retain possession of every fortress which he still held within the quarters of the enemy. The duke of Bedford had besieged in person, during the space of three months, in 1424, the town of Yvri in Normandy; and the brave governor, unable to make any longer defence, was obliged to capitulate; and he agreed to surrender the town, if, before the 15th of August, no relief arrived. Charles, informed of these conditions, determined to make an attempt for saving the place. He collected, with some difficulty, an army of fourteen thousand men, of whom one half were Scots; and he sent them thither under the command of the earl of Buchan, constable of France; who was attended by the earl of Douglas, his countryman, the duke de Alençon, the mareschal de la Fayette, the count of Aumale, and the viscount of Narbonne. When the constable arrived within a few leagues of Yvri, he found that he was come too late, and that the place was already surrendered. He immediately turned to the left, and sat down before Verneüil, which the inhabitants, in spite of the garrison, delivered up to him (o). Buchan might now have returned in safety, and with the glory of making an acquisition no less important than the place which he was sent to relieve: but hearing of Bedford's approach, he called a council of war, in order to deliberate concerning the conduct which he should hold in this emergency. The wiser part of the council declared for a retreat; and represented, that all the past misfortunes of the French had proceeded from their rashness in giving battle when no necessity obliged them; that this army was the last resource of the king, and the only defence of the few provinces which remained to him; and that every reason invited him to embrace cautious measures, which might leave time for his subjects to return to a sense of their duty, and give leisure for discord to arise among his enemies, who, being united by no common band of interest or motive of alliance, could not long persevere in their animosity against him. All these prudential considerations were overborne by a vain point of honour, not to turn their backs to the enemy; and they resolved to await the arrival of the duke of Bedford.

The numbers were nearly equal in this action; and as the long continuance of war had introduced discipline, which, however, imperfect, sufficed to maintain some appearance of order in such small armies, the battle was fierce, and well disputed, and attended with bloodshed on both sides. The earl of Buchan drew up his forces under the walls of Verneüil, on the 17th of August, and resolved to abide the attack of the enemy: but the impatience of the viscount of Narbonne, who advanced precipitately, and obliged the whole line to follow him in some hurry and confusion, was the cause of the misfortune which ensued. The English archers, fixing their palisadoes before them, according to their usual custom, sent a volley of arrows amidst the thickest of the French army; and though beaten from their ground, and obliged to take shelter among the baggage, they soon rallied, and continued to do great execution upon the enemy. The duke of Bedford, meanwhile, at the head of the men at arms, made impression on the French, broke their ranks, chased them off the field, and rendered the victory entirely complete and decisive (p). The earl of Buchan himself perished in the battle, as well as the earl of Douglas and his son, the counts of Aumale, Tonnerre, and Ventadour, with many other considerable nobility. The duke of Alençon, the mareschal de la Fayette, the lords of Gaucour and Mortemar, were taken prisoners. There fell about four thousand of the French, and sixteen hundred of the English; a loss esteemed at that time so unusual on the side of the victors, that the duke of Bedford forbad all rejoicings for his success. Verneüil was surrendered next day, August 28, by capitulation (q).

The condition of the king of France now appeared very terrible, and almost desperate. He had lost the flower of his army and the bravest of his nobles in this fatal action: he had no resource either for recruiting or subsisting his troops: he wanted money even for his personal subsistence; and though all parade of a court was banished, it was with difficulty he could keep a table, supplied with the plainest necessaries, for himself and his few followers: every day brought him intelligence of some loss or misfortune: towns which were bravely defended were obliged at last to surrender for want of relief or supply: he saw his partizans entirely chased from all the provinces which lay north of the Loire: and he expected soon to lose, by the united efforts of his enemies, all the territories of which he had hitherto continued master; when an incident happened which saved him on the brink of ruin, and lost the English such an opportunity for completing their conquests as they never afterwards were able to recal.

Jaqueline, countess of Hainault and Holland, and heir of these provinces, had espoused John duke of Brabant, cousin-german to the duke of Burgundy; but, having made this choice from the usual motives of princes, she soon found reason to repent of the unequal alliance. She was a princess of a masculine spirit and uncommon understanding; the duke of Brabant was of a sickly complexion and weak mind: she was in the vigour of her age; he had only reached his fifteenth year: these causes had inspired her with such contempt for her husband, which soon proceeded to antipathy, that she determined to dissolve a marriage, where, it is probable, nothing but the ceremony had as yet intervened. The court of Rome was commonly very open to applications of this nature, when seconded by power and money; but, as the princess foresaw great opposition from her husband's relations, and was impatient to effect her purpose, she made her escapé into England, where she experienced a most hospitable reception. During her residence at the English court, she placed herself under the protection of the duke of Gloucester. That prince, with many noble qualities, had the defect of being governed by an impetuous temper and vehement passions; and he was rashly induced, as well by the charms of the countess herself, as by the prospect of possessing her rich inheritance, to offer himself to her as a husband. Without waiting for a papal dispensation; without endeavouring to reconcile the duke of Burgundy to the measure, he entered into a contract of marriage with Jaqueline, and immediately attempted to put himself in possession of her dominions. Philip was disgusted with so precipitate a conduct: he resented the injury done to the duke of Brabant, his near relation: he dreaded to have the English established on all sides of him: and he foresaw the consequences which must attend the extensive and uncontrolled dominion of that nation, if before the full settlement of their power, they insulted and injured an ally, to whom they had already been so much indebted, and who was still so necessary for supporting them in their farther progress. He encouraged, therefore, the duke of Brabant to make resistance: he engaged many of Jaqueline's subjects to adhere to that prince: he himself marched troops to his support: and as the duke of Gloucester still persevered in his purpose, a sharp war was suddenly kindled in the Low Countries. The quarrel soon became personal as well as political. The English prince wrote to the duke of Burgundy, complaining of the opposition made to his pretensions; and though in the main he employed amicable terms in his letter, he took notice of some falsehoods into which, he said, Philip had been betrayed during the course of these transactions. This unguarded expression was highly resented: the duke of Burgundy insisted that he should retract it; and mutual challenges and defiances passed between them on this occasion (r).

The duke of Bedford could easily foresee the bad effects of so ill-timed and imprudent a quarrel. All the succours which he expected from England, and which were so necessary in this critical emergency, were intercepted by his brother, and employed in Holland and Hainault: the forces of the duke of Burgundy, which he also depended on, were diverted by the same wars: and, besides this double loss, he was in imminent danger of alienating, for ever, that confederate, whose friendship was of the utmost importance, and whom the late king had enjoined him, with his dying breath, to gratify by every mark of regard and attachment. He represented all these topics to the duke of Gloucester: he endeavoured to mitigate the resentment of the duke of Burgundy: he interposed with his good offices between these princes: but was not successful in any of his endeavours; and he found that the impetuosity of his brother's temper was still the chief obstacle to all accommodation (s). For this reason, instead of pushing the victory gained at Verneüil, he found himself obliged to take a journey into England, and to try, by his counsels and authority, to moderate the measures of the duke of Gloucester.

There had likewise broken out some differences among the English ministry, which had proceeded to great extremities, and which required the regent's presence to compose them (t). The bishop of Winchester, to whom the care of the king's person and education had been entrusted, was a prelate of great capacity and experience, but of an intriguing and dangerous character; and, as he aspired to the government of affairs, he had continual disputes with his nephew, the protector; and he gained frequent advantages over the vehement and impolitic temper of that prince. The duke of Bedford employed the authority of parliament, in 1425, to reconcile them; and these rivals were obliged to promise before that assembly, that they would bury all quarrels in oblivion (u). Time also seemed to open expedients for composing the difference with the duke of Burgundy. The credit of that prince had procured a bull from the pope; by which not only Jaqueline's contract with the duke of Gloucester was annulled; but it was also declared, that even in case of the duke of Brabant's death, it should never be lawful for her to espouse the English prince. Humphrey despairing of success, married another lady of inferior rank, who had lived some time with him as his mistress (v). The duke of Brabant died; and his widow, before she could recover possession of her dominions, was obliged to declare the duke of Burgundy her heir, in case she should die without issue, and to promise never to marry without his consent. But though the affair was thus terminated to the satisfaction of Philip, it left a disagreeable impression on his mind: it excited an extreme jealousy of the English, and opened his eyes to his true interests: and as nothing but his animosity against Charles had engaged him in alliance with them, it counterbalanced that passion by another of the same kind, which in the end became prevalent, and brought him back, by degrees, to his natural connexions with his family and his native country.

About the same time Charles had made an endeavour to detach the dukes of Britanny and Burgundy from the interest of the English; and the duke of Britanny began to withdraw himself from the English alliance. His brother, the count of Richemont, though connected by marriage with the dukes of Burgundy and Bedford, was extremely attached by inclination to the French interest; and he willingly hearkened to all the advances which Charles made him for obtaining his friendship. The staff of constable, vacant by the earl of Buchan's death, was offered him; and, as his martial and ambitious temper aspired to the command of armies, which he had in vain attempted to obtain from the duke of Bedford, he not only accepted that office, but brought over his brother to an alliance with the French monarch. The new constable, having made this one change in his measures, firmly adhered, ever after, to his engagements with France. Though his pride and violence, which would admit of no rival in his master's confidence, and even prompted him to assassinate the other favourites, had so much disgusted Charles, that he once banished him the court, and refused to admit him to his presence, he still acted with vigour for the service of that monarch, and obtained, at last, by his perseverance, the pardon of all past offences.

In this situation the duke of Bedford, on his return, in 1426, found the affairs of France, after passing eight months in England. The duke of Burgundy was much disgusted. The duke of Britanny had entered into engagements with Charles, and had done homage to that prince for his duchy. The French had been allowed to recover from the astonishment into which their frequent disasters had thrown them. An incident likewise had happened, which served extremely to raise their courage. The earl of Warwick had besieged Montargis with a small army of three thousand men, and the place was reduced to extremity, when the bastard of Orleans undertook to throw relief into it. This general, who was natural son to the prince assassinated by the duke of Burgundy, and who was afterwards created count of Dunois, conducted a body of sixteen hundred men to Montargis; and made an attack on the enemy's trenches with so much valour, prudence, and good fortune, that he not only penetrated into the place, but gave a severe blow to the English, and obliged Warwick to raise the siege (w). This was the first signal action that raised the fame of Dunois, and opened him the road to those great honours which he afterwards attained.

But the regent, soon after his arrival, revived the reputation of the English arms, by an important enterprize which he atchieved. He secretly brought together, in separate detachments, a considerable army to the frontiers of Britanny; and fell so unexpectedly upon that province, that the duke, unable to make resistance, yielded to all the terms required of him: he renounced the French alliance; he engaged to maintain the treaty of Troye; he acknowledged the duke of Bedford for regent of France; and promised to do homage for his duchy to king Henry (x). And the English prince, having thus freed himself from a dangerous enemy who lay behind him, resolved on an undertaking which, if successful, would, he hoped, cast the balance between the two nations, and prepare the way for the final conquest of France.

The city of Orleans was so situated between the provinces which acknowledged the authority of Henry, and those possessed by Charles, that it opened an easy entrance to either; and as the duke of Bedford intended to make a great effort for penetrating into the south of France; it behoved him to begin with this place, which, in the present circumstances, was become the most important in the kingdom. He committed the conduct of the enterprize to the earl of Salisbury, who had newly brought him a reinforcement of six thousand men from England, and who had much distinguished himself, by his abilities, during the course of the present war. Salisbury accordingly passed the Loire; and, after employing the months of August and September, in 1428, in the reduction of Mehun, Jenville, Beaugency, and several other small places which surrounded Orleans on that side, he sat down before that city on the 12th of October (y); and as his intentions were thereby known, the French king used every expedient to supply the city with a garrison and provisions, and enable it to maintain a long and obstinate siege. The lord of Gaucour, a brave and experienced captain, was appointed governor: many officers of distinction threw themselves into the place: the troops which they conducted were enured to war, and were determined to make the most obstinate resistance: and even the inhabitants, disciplined by the long continuance of hostilities, were well qualified, in their own defence, to second the efforts of the most veteran forces. The eyes of all Europe were turned towards this scene; where, it was reasonably supposed, the French were to make their last stand for maintaining the independence of their monarchy, and the rights of their sovereign.

The earl of Salisbury at last approached the place with an army, which consisted only of ten thousand men; and not being able, with so small a force, to invest so great a city, that commanded a bridge over the Loire, he stationed himself on the southern side towards Sologne, leaving the other, towards the Beausse, still open to the enemy. He there attacked the castle of Tourelles, which guarded the entrance to the bridge; and, after an obstinate resistance, he carried it; but was himself killed by a cannon ball as he was taking a view of the enemy (z), on the 24th of October. The earl of Suffolk succeeded to the command; and being reinforced with great numbers of English and Burgundians, he passed the river with the main body of his army, and invested Orleans on the other side. As it was now the depth of winter, Suffolk, who found it very difficult in that season to throw up intrenchments all around, contented himself, for the present, with erecting redoubts, at different distances, where his men were lodged in safety, and were ready to intercept the supplies which the enemy might throw into the place. Though he had several pieces of artillery in his camp (and this is among the first sieges in Europe where cannon were found to be of importance,) the art of engineering was hitherto so imperfect, that Suffolk trusted more to famine than to force for subduing the city; and he purposed in the spring to render the circumvallation more complete, by drawing intrenchments from one redoubt to another. Numberless feats of valour were performed both by the besiegers and the besieged during the winter: bold sallies were made, and repulsed with equal boldness: convoys were sometimes introduced and often intercepted: the supplies were still unequal to the consumption of the place: and the English seemed daily, though slowly, advancing towards the completion of their enterprize.

But while Suffolk lay in this situation, the French parties ravaged all the country around; and the besiegers, who were obliged to draw their provisions from a distance, were themselves exposed to the dangers of want and famine. Sir John Fastolffe was bringing up a large convoy of every kind of stores, which he escorted with a detachment of two thousand five hundred men; when he was attacked by a body of four thousand French, under the command of the counts of Clermont and Dunois. Fastolffe drew up his troops behind the waggons; but the French generals, afraid of attacking him in that posture, planted a battery of cannon against him, which threw every thing into confusion, and would have insured them the victory, had not the impatience of some Scottish troops, who broke the line of battle, brought on an engagement, in which Fastolffe was victorious. The count of Dunois was wounded; and about five hundred French were left on the field of battle. This action, which was fought on the 12th of February, 1429, was of great importance in the present conjuncture; it was commonly called the battle of Herrings; because the convoy brought a great quantity of that kind of provisions, for the use of the English army during the Lent season (a).

Charles seemed now to have but one expedient for saving this city, which had been so long invested. The duke of Orleans, who was still prisonef in England, prevailed on the protector and the council to consent that all his demesnes should be allowed to preserve a neutrality during the war, and should be sequestered, for greater security, into the hands of the duke of Burgundy. This prince, who was much less cordial in the English interests than formerly, went to Paris, and made the proposal to the duke of Bedford; but the regent coldly replied, That he was not of a humour to beat the bushes, while others ran away with the game: an answer which so disgusted the duke that he recalled all the troops of Burgundy that acted in the siege (b). The place however was every day more and more closely invested by the English: great scarcity began already to be felt by the garrison and inhabitants: Charles, in despair of collecting an army which should dare to approach the enemy's entrenchments, not only gave the city for lost, but began to entertain a very dismal prospect with regard to the general state of his affairs. He saw that the country, in which he had hitherto, with great difficulty, subsisted, would be laid entirely open to the invasion of a powerful and victorious enemy; and he already entertained thoughts of retiring with the remains of his forces into Languedoc and Dauphiny, and defending himself as long as possible in those remote provinces. But it was fortunate for this good prince, that, as he lay under the dominion of the fair, the women, whom he consulted, had the spirit to support his sinking resolution in this desperate extremity. Mary of Anjou, his queen, a princess of great merit and prudence, vehemently opposed this measure, which, she foresaw, would discourage all his partizans, and serve as a general signal for deserting a prince who seemed himself to despair of success. His mistress too, the fair Agnes Sorel, who lived in entire amity with the queen, seconded all her remonstrances, and threatened that, if he thus pusillanimously threw away the sceptre of France, she would seek in the court of England a fortune more correspondent to her wishes. Love was able to rouse in the breast of Charles that courage which ambition had failed to excite: he resolved to dispute every inch of ground with an imperious enemy; and rather to perish with honour in the midst of his friends, than yield ingloriously to his bad fortune: when relief was unexpectedly brought him by another female of a very different character, who gave rise to one of the most singular revolutions that is to be met with in history.

In the village of Domremi near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine, there lived a country girl of twenty-seven years of age, called Joan d'Arc (c), who was servant in a small inn, and who in that station had been accustomed to tend the horses of the guests, to ride them without a saddle to the watering place, and to perform other offices, which, in well-frequented inns, commonly fall to the share of the men-servants (d). This girl was of an irreproachable life, and had not hitherto been remarked for any singularity; whether that she had met with no occasion to excite her genius, or that the unskilful eyes of those who conversed with her, had not been able to discern her uncommon merit. It is easy to imagine, that the present situation of France was an interesting object even to persons of the lowest rank, and would become the frequent subject of conversation: a young prince expelled his throne by the sedition of native subjects, and by the arms of strangers, could not fail to move the compassion of all his people whose hearts were uncorrupted by faction; and the peculiar character of Charles, so strongly inclined to friendship and the tender passions, naturally rendered him the hero of that sex whose generous minds know no bounds in their affections. The siege of Orleans, the progress of the English before that place, the great distress of the garrison and inhabitants, the importance of saving this city and its brave defenders, had turned thither the public eye; and Joan, inflamed by the general sentiment, was seized with a wild desire of bringing relief to her sovereign in his present distresses. Her unexperienced mind, working day and night on this favourite object, mistook the impulses of passion for heavenly inspirations; and she fancied that she saw visions, and heard voices, exhorting her to re-establish the throne of France, and to expel the foreign invaders. An uncommon intrepidity of temper made her overlook all the dangers which might attend her in such a path; and thinking herself destined by Heaven to this office, she threw aside all that bashfulness and timidity so natural to her sex, her years, and her low station. She went to Vaucouleurs; procured admission to Baudricourt the governor; informed him of her inspirations and intentions; and conjured him not to neglect the voice of God, who spoke through her, but to second those heavenly revelations which impelled her to this glorious enterprize. Baudricourt treated her at first with some neglect; but on her frequent returns to him, and importunate solicitations, he began to remark something extraordinary in the maid, and was inclined, at all hazards, to make so easy an experiment. It is uncertain whether this gentleman had discernment enough to perceive that great use might be made with the vulgar, of so uncommon an engine; or, what is more likely, in that credulous age, was himself a convert to this visionary: but he adopted at last the schemes of Joan; and he gave her some attendants, who conducted her to the French court, which at that time resided at Chinon.

It is the business of history to distinguish between the miraculous and the marvellous; to reject the first in all narrations merely profane and human; to doubt the second; and when obliged by unquestionable testimony, as in the present case, to admit of something extraordinary, to receive as little of it as is consistent with the known facts and circumstances. It is pretended, that Joan, immediately on her admission, knew the king, though she had never seen his face before, and though he purposely kept himself in the crowd of courtiers, and had laid aside every thing in his dress and apparel which might distinguish him: that she offered him, in the name of the supreme Creator, to raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct him to Rheims to be there crowned and anointed (e); and on his expressing doubts of her mission, revealed to him, before some sworn confidants, a secret, which was unknown to all the world beside himself, and which nothing but a heavenly inspiration could have discovered to her: and that she demanded, as the instrument of her future victories, a particular sword, which was kept in the church of St. Catharine of Fierbois, and which, though she had never seen it, she described by all its marks, and by the place in which it had long lain neglected (f). This is certain, that all these miraculous stories were spread abroad, in order to captivate the vulgar. The more the king and his ministers were determined to give into the illusion, the more scruples they pretended. An assembly of grave doctors and theologians cautiously examined Joan's mission, and pronounced it undoubted and supernatural. She was sent to the parliament, then residing at Poictiers; and was interrogated before that assembly: the presidents, the counsellors, who came persuaded of her imposture, went away convinced of her inspiration. A ray of hope began to break through that despair in which the minds of all men were before enveloped. Heaven had now declared itself in favour of France, and had laid bare its outstretched arm to take vengeance on her invaders. Few could distinguish between the impulse of inclination and the force of conviction; and none would submit to the trouble of so disagreeable a scrutiny.

After these artificial precautions and preparations had been for some time employed, Joan's requests were at last complied with: she was armed cap-a-pee, mounted on horseback, and shown in that martial habiliment before the whole people. Her dexterity in managing her steed, though acquired in her former occupation, was regarded as a fresh proof of her mission; and she was received with the loudest acclamations by the spectators. Her former occupation was even denied: she was no longer the servant of an inn: she was converted into a shepherdess, an (e) It is said, that the reception she met with at Chinon was similar to that which she had at first experienced from the governor of Vaucouleurs: it was even debated for some time whether she should be admitted to the presence of Charles. Curiosity, however, prevailed; she procured admission; and thus addressed the king, with an air of confidence which, though it was the natural result of those ideas that were so strongly impressed on her mind, was then regarded as a certain proof that she was inspired from above. "Gentle Dauphin, (said she,) I am called Joan the Maid: the King of heaven hath sent me to your assistance. If you please to grant me troops, by the grace of God, and the force of arms, I will raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct you to be crowned at Rheims, in spite of your numerous foes. This is what the King of heaven hath commanded me to tell you."

employment much more agreeable to the imagination. To render her still more interesting, near ten years were subtracted from her age; and all the sentiments of love and of chivalry were thus united to those of enthusiasm, in order to inflame the fond fancy of the people with prepossessions in her favour.

When the engine was thus dressed up in full splendour, it was determined to essay its force against the enemy. Joan was sent to Blois, where a large convoy was prepared for the supply of Orleans, and an army of ten thousand men, under the command of St. Severe, assembled to escort it. She ordered all the soldiers to confess themselves before they set out on the enterprize: she banished from the camp all women of bad fame: she displayed in her hands a consecrated banner; where the Supreme Being was represented grasping the globe of earth, and surrounded with flower de luces; and she insisted, in right of her prophetic mission, that the convoy should enter Orleans by the direct road from the side of Beausse: but the count of Dunois, unwilling to submit the rules of the military art to her inspirations, ordered it to approach by the other side of the river, where, he knew, the weakest part of the English army was stationed.

Previous to this attempt, the maid had written to the regent, and to the English generals before Orleans, commanding them, in the name of the omnipotent Creator, by whom she was commissioned, immediately to raise the siege, and to evacuate France; and menacing them with divine vengeance in case of their disobedience. All the English affected to speak with derision of the maid, and of her heavenly commission; and said, that the French king was now indeed reduced to a sorry pass when he had recourse to such ridiculous expedients: but they felt their imagination secretly struck with the vehement persuasion which prevailed in all around them; and they waited with an anxious expectation, not unmixed with horror, for the issue of these extraordinary preparations.

As the convoy approached the river, a sally was made by the garrison, on the 29th of April, on the side of Beausse, to prevent the English general from sending any detachment to the other side: the provisions were peaceably embarked in boats, which the inhabitants of Orleans had sent to receive them; the maid covered with her troops the embarkation: Suffolk did not venture to attack her: and the French general carried back the army in safety to Blois; an alteration of affairs which was already visible to all the world, and which had a proportional effect on the minds of both parties.

The maid entered the city of Orleans arrayed in her military garb, and displaying her consecrated standard; and was received as a celestial deliverer by all the inhabitants. They now believed themselves invincible under her influence; and Dunois himself, perceiving such a mighty alteration both in friends and foes, consented that the next convoy, which was expected in a few days, should enter by the side of Beausse. The convoy approached on the 4th of May; no sign of resistance appeared in the besiegers: the waggons and troops passed without interruption between the redoubts of the English: a dead silence and astonishment reigned among those troops, formerly so elated with victory, and so fierce for the combat.

The earl of Suffolk was in a situation very unusual and extraordinary, and which might well confound a man of the greatest capacity and firmest temper. He saw his troops overawed, and strongly impressed with the idea of a divine influence accompanying the maid. Instead of banishing these vain terrors by hurry, and action, and war, he waited till the soldiers should recover from the panic; and he thereby gave leisure for those prepossessions to sink still deeper into their minds. The military maxims, which are prudent in common cases, deceived him in these unaccountable events. The English felt their courage daunted and overwhelmed; and thence inferred a divine vengeance hanging over them. The French drew the same inference from an inactivity so new and unexpected. Every circumstance was now reversed in the opinions of men, on which all depends: the spirit resulting from a long course of uninterrupted success was on a sudden transferred from the victors to the vanquished.

The maid called aloud, that the garrison should remain no longer on the defensive; and she promised her followers the assistance of Heaven in attacking those redoubts of the enemy which had so long kept them in awe, and which they had never hitherto dared to insult. The generals seconded her ardour: an attack was made on one redoubt, and it proved successful (g): all the English who defended the entrenchments were put to the sword, or taken prisoners: and Sir John Talbot himself, who had drawn together, from the other redoubts, some troops to bring them relief, durst not appear in the open field against so formidable an enemy.

Nothing, after this success, seemed impossible to the maid and her enthusiastic votaries. She urged the generals to attack the main body of the English in their entrenchments: but Dunois, still unwilling to hazard the fate of France by too great temerity, and sensible that the least reverse of fortune would make all the present visions evaporate, and restore every thing to its former condition, checked her vehemence, and proposed to her first to expel the enemy from their forts on the other side of the river, and thus lay the communication with the country entirely open, before she attempted any more hazardous enterprize. Joan was persuaded, and these forts were vigorously assailed. In one attack the French were repulsed; the maid was left almost alone; she was obliged to retreat, and join the runaways; but displaying her sacred standard, and animating them with her countenance, her gestures, her exhortations, she led them back to the charge, and overpowered the English in their entrenchments. In the attack of another fort, she was wounded in the neck with an arrow; she retreated a moment behind the assailants; she pulled out the arrow with her own hands; she had the wound quickly dressed; and she hastened back to head the troops, and to plant her victorious banner on the ramparts of the enemy.

By all these successes, the English were entirely chased from their fortifications on that side. They had lost above six thousand men in these different actions; and what was still more important, their wonted courage and confidence was wholly gone, and had given place to amazement and despair. The maid returned triumphant over the bridge, and was again received as the guardian angel of the city. After performing such miracles, she convinced the most obdurate incredulity of her divine mission: men felt themselves animated as by a superior energy, and thought nothing impossible to that divine hand which so visibly conducted them. It was in vain even for the English generals to oppose with their soldiers the prevailing opinion of supernatural influence: they themselves were probably moved by the same belief: the utmost they dared to advance was, that Joan was not an instrument of God; she was only the implement of the Devil: but as the English had felt, to their sad experience, that the Devil might be allowed sometimes to prevail, they derived not much consolation from the enforcing of this opinion.

It might prove extremely dangerous for Suffolk, with such intimidated troops, to remain any longer in the presence of so courageous and victorious an enemy; he therefore raised the siege, on the 8th of May, and retreated with all the precaution imaginable. The French resolved to push their conquests, and to allow the English no leisure to recover from their consternation. Charles formed a body of six thousand men, and sent them to attack Jergeau, whither Suffolk had retired with a detachment of his army. The siege lasted ten days; and the place was obstinately defended. Joan displayed her wonted intrepidity on the occasion. She descended into the fossee in leading the attack; and she there received a blow on the head with a stone, by which she was confounded and beaten to the ground: but she soon recovered herself; and in the end rendered the assault successful: Suffolk was obliged to yield himself prisoner to a Frenchman called Renaud; but, before he submitted, he asked his adversary, whether he were a gentleman? On receiving a satisfactory answer, he demanded whether he were a knight? Renaud replied, that he had not yet attained that honour. "Then I make you one," replied Suffolk: upon which he gave him the blow with his sword, which dubbed him into that fraternity; and he immediately surrendered himself his prisoner (h).

The

(h) Thus was the first object of Joan's extraordinary mission accomplished—a mission, the divinity of which not the most incredulous of the French could now dare to dispute, and on which the English themselves were divided in opinion: some coincided with the ideas of the French; while others, equally credulous, and more absurd, gravely ascribed it to a compact with the devil. A French writer, of great wisdom, in speaking of this singular occurrence, intimates that Charles by no

The remainder of the English army was commanded by Fastolffe, Scales, and Talbot, who thought of nothing but of making their retreat, as soon as possible, into a place of safety; while the French esteemed the overtaking them equivalent to a victory. So much had the events which passed before Orleans altered every thing between the two nations! The vanguard of the French, under Richemont and Xaintrailles, attacked the rear of the enemy at the village of Patay, on the 18th of June. The battle lasted not a moment: the English were discomfited, and fled: the brave Fastolffe himself shewed the example of flight to his troops; and the order of the garter was taken from him, as a punishment for this instance of cowardice (i). Two thousand men were killed in this action, and both Talbot and Scales were taken prisoners.

In the account of all these successes, the French writers, to magnify the wonder, represent the maid (who was now known by the appellation of the Maid of Orleans) as not only active in combat, but as performing the office of general; directing the troops, conducting the military operations, and swaying the deliberations in all councils of war. It is certain, that the policy of the French court endeavoured to maintain this appearance with the public: but it is much more probable, that Dunois and the wiser commanders prompted her in all her measures, than that a country girl, without experience or education, could, on a sudden, become expert in a profession which requires more genius and capacity than any other active scene of life. It is sufficient praise that she could distinguish the persons on whose judgement she might rely; that she could seize their hints and suggestions, and, on a sudden, deliver their opinions as her own; and that she could curb, on occasion, that visionary and enthusiastic spirit with which she was actuated, and could temper it with prudence and discretion.

The raising of the siege of Orleans was one part of the maid's promise to Charles: the crowning of him at Rheims was the other: and she now vehemently insisted that he should forthwith set out on that enterprize. A few weeks before, such a proposal would have appeared the most extravagant in the world. Rheims lay in a distant quarter of the kingdom; was then in the hands of a victorious enemy; the whole road which led to it was occupied by their garrisons; and no man could be so sanguine as to imagine that such an attempt could so soon come within the bounds of possibility. But as it was extremely the interest of Charles to maintain the belief of something extraordinary and divine in these events, and to avail himself of the present consternation of the English, he resolved to follow the exhortations of his warlike prophetess, and to lead his army upon this promising adventure. Hitherto he had kept remote from the scene of war: as the safety of the state depended upon his person, he had been persuaded to restrain his military ardour; but observing this prosperous turn of affairs, he now determined to appear at the head of his armies, and to set the example of valour to all his soldiers. And the French nobility saw at once their young sovereign assuming a new and more brilliant character, seconded by fortune and conducted by the hand of Heaven; and they caught fresh zeal to exert themselves in replacing him on the throne of his ancestors.

Charles set out for Rheims at the head of twelve thousand men: he passed by Troye, which opened its gates to him: Chalons imitated the example: Rheims sent him a deputation with its keys, before his approach to it: and he scarcely perceived, as he passed along, that he was marching through an enemy's country. The ceremony of his coronation was here performed (k), on the 18th of July, 1429, with the holy oil, which a pigeon had brought to king Clovis from Heaven on the first establishment of the French monarchy: the maid of Orleans stood by his side in complete armour, and displayed her sacred banner, which had so often dissipated and confounded his fiercest enemies; and the people shouted with the most unfeigned joy on viewing such a complication of wonders. After the completion of the ceremony, the maid threw herself at the king's feet, embraced his knees, and with a flood of tears, which pleasure and tenderness extorted from her, she congratulated him on this singular and marvellous event.

Charles, thus crowned and anointed, became more respectable in the eyes of all his subjects, and seemed, in a manner, to receive anew, from a heavenly commission, his title to their allegiance. The inclinations of men swaying their belief, no one doubted of the inspirations and prophetic spirit of the maid: so many incidents, which passed all human comprehension, left little room to question a superior influence; and the real and undoubted facts brought credit to every exaggeration, which could scarcely be rendered more wonderful. Laon, Soissons, Cressy, La Ferté-Milan, Creil, Coulommiers, Chateau-Thierri, Provins, and many other towns and fortresses in that neighbourhood, immediately after Charles's coronation submitted to him on the first summons; and the whole nation was disposed to give him the most zealous testimonies of their duty and attachment.

Nothing can impress us with a higher idea of the wisdom, address, and resolution of the duke of Bedford, than his being able to maintain himself in so perilous a situation, and to preserve some footing in France, after the defection of so many places, and amidst the universal inclination of the rest to imitate that example. This prince seemed present every where by his vigilance and foresight: he employed every resource which fortune had yet left him: he put all the English garrisons in a posture of defence: he kept a watchful eye over every attempt among the French towards an insurrection: he retained the Parisians in obedience, by alternately employing caresses and severity: and knowing that the duke of Burgundy was already wavering in his fidelity, he acted with so much skill and prudence, as to renew, in this dangerous crisis, his alliance with that prince; an alliance of the utmost importance to the credit and support of the English government.

The small supplies which he received from England set the talents of this great man in a still stronger light. The ardour of the English for foreign conquests was now extremely abated by time and reflection: the parliament seems even to have become sensible of the danger which might attend their farther progress: no supply of money could be obtained by the regent during his greatest distresses: and men enlisted slowly under his standard, or soon deserted, by reason of the wonderful accounts which had reached England, of the magic, and sorcery, and diabolical power of the maid of Orleans (l). Having completed his treaty with the duke of Burgundy, he left Paris about the middle of July, and repaired to Normandy, in order to raise fresh troops. It happened fortunately, in this emergency, that the bishop of Winchester, now created a cardinal, landed at Calais with a body of five thousand men, which he was conducting into Bohemia, on a crusade against the Hussites. He was persuaded to lend these troops to his nephew during the present difficulties (m); and the regent was thereby enabled to take the field, and to oppose the French king, who was advancing with his army to the gates of Paris.

The extraordinary capacity of the duke of Bedford appeared no means believed in the inspiration of Joan; but merely sought, from political motives, to inculcate the belief of it in the minds of his people and soldiers. "A young maiden," says the author we allude to, "from a conviction that she is inspired, presents herself to her sovereign; who, aware of the impression which her enthusiasm may make on the minds of his troops, resolves to favour the delusion: without trusting any thing to chance, the generals who command appear to obey her; and though not the most trivial expedition be committed to her care, she seems to fix the arrangements of every plan. Her courage, which every art is exerted to maintain, becomes diffused over the whole army; and, by a very natural consequence, entirely changes the face of affairs." This is certainly a just representation of the matter, as far as it relates to the efforts resulting from the employment of Joan; but we cannot subscribe to the opinion that the wisdom of Charles was sufficiently strong to exempt him from the general infection. We are the more inclined to believe that the French monarch was, equally with his friends and enemies, impressed with the conviction that the Maid of Orleans derived her courage and prowess from some supernatural inspiration, as the duke of Bedford (supposed to be one of the most sensible men of the age) entertained the same superstitious idea; though he was more willing to believe that they originated in hell than in heaven. The opinion of that nobleman on the subject may be collected from the following extract of a letter, written by him to the king and council of England, which may be seen in Rymer's Fœdera: "Alle things there prospered for you, til the tyme of the siege of Orleans, taken in hand, God knoweth by what advis. At the whiche tyme, after the adventure fallen to the person of my cousin of Salisbury, whom God assoille, there felle, by the hand of God, as it seemeth, a greate strook upon your peuple that was assembled there in grete nombre, caused in grete parties, as y trowe, of lakke of sadde believe, and of unleveful doubte that they hadde of a disciple and lyme of the fiende, called the Pucelle, (Maid,) that used fals enchauntments and sorcerie. The whiche strooke and discomfiture nought oonly lessed in grete partie the nombre of your peuple there, but as well withdrowe the courage of the remenant in marveilous wyse, and couraiged youre adverse partie and enemys."

peared also in his military operations. He attempted to restore the courage of his troops by boldly advancing to the face of the enemy; but he chose his posts with so much caution, as always to decline a combat, and to render it impossible for Charles to attack him. He still attended that prince in all his movements; covered his own towns and garrisons; and kept himself in a posture to reap advantage from every imprudence or false step of the enemy. The French army, which consisted mostly of volunteers, who served at their own expence, soon after retired, and was disbanded: Charles went to Bourges, the ordinary place of his residence; but not till he made himself master of Compiegne, Beauvais, Senlis, Sens, Laval, Lagni, St. Denis, and of many places in the neighbourhood of Paris, which the affections of the people had put into his hands.

Charles likewise advanced to Paris, and attempted to take that city by assault; but the Maid of Orleans being dangerously wounded in the attack, his troops were repulsed, and he was obliged to retire into the southern provinces. About this period Charles expressed his gratitude to Joan, by granting a patent of nobility to herself, her father, and her three brothers, and to all their descendants, both male and female; he also changed the name of their family from d'Arc to Du Lys.

The duke of Bedford, having gone to Normandy with a view to recruit his forces, and having expelled the count of Richemont from that province, returned to Paris; and from the great effects produced by the coronation of Charles, was induced to believe that, if young Henry were to undergo the same ceremony, it might be attended with similar advantages. He therefore solicited the protector and council of England to send him over without delay; but the nation was so much exhausted by the war, that six months elapsed before sufficient money could be procured to defray the expences of his journey; and even then the protector was obliged to raise it by pawning the jewels of the crown, and by extorting numerous loans, some of which were so trifling as not to exceed five marks. When every thing was ready, the young king, who, on the 6th of November preceding, had been crowned at Westminster, set out for the continent, and landed at Calais on the 27th of April, 1430, attended by the chief nobility of England. From thence he repaired to Rouen, where he must have resided about nineteen months, as it appears, from the register of the parliament of Paris, that the ceremony of his coronation did not take place till the 17th of December (n).

Young Henry had not been long at Rouen, before an incident occured which revived the drooping spirits of the English, and dissolved that charm which of late had detained them in a state of inactivity. The Maid of Orleans, after the coronation of Charles, declared to the count of Dunois, that her wishes were now fully gratified, and that she had no farther desire than to return to her former condition, and to the occupation and course of life which became her sex: but that nobleman, sensible of the great advantages which might still be reaped from her presence in the army, exhorted her to persevere, till, by the final expulsion of the English, she had brought all her prophecies to their full completion. In pursuance of this advice, she threw herself into the town of Compiegne, which was at that time besieged by the duke of Burgundy, assisted by the earls of Arundel and Suffolk; and the garrison, on her appearance, believed themselves thenceforth invincible. But their joy was not of long duration; for the maid, on the 24th of May, the next day after her arrival, headed a sally upon the quarters of John of Luxembourg; she twice drove the enemy from their entrenchments; finding their numbers to increase every moment, she ordered a retreat; when hard pressed by the pursuers, she turned upon them, and made them again recoil; but being here deserted by her friends, and surrounded by the enemy, she was at last, after exerting the utmost valour, taken prisoner by the Bastard of Vendome, who delivered her up to John of Luxembourg, count of Ligny, commander in chief of the Burgundian army. The common opinion was, that the French officers, finding the merit of every victory ascribed to her, had, in envy to her renown, by which they themselves were so much eclipsed, willingly exposed her to this fatal accident.

The envy of her friends, on this occasion, was not a greater proof of her merit than the triumph of her enemies. A complete victory would not have given more joy to the English and their partizans. The duke of Bedford, under the same influence of superstition which had swayed his troops for some time past, ordered the service of Te Deum, which has so often been profaned by princes, to be publicly celebrated, on this fortunate event, at Paris. He fancied, that, by the captivity of that extraordinary woman, who had blasted all his successes, he should again recover his ascendant over France; and, to push farther the present advantage, he purchased the captive from John of Luxembourg, for the enormous sum of ten thousand pounds, besides an annuity of three hundred pounds, which he granted to the Bastard of Vendome, to whom she had surrendered; and commenced a prosecution against her, which, whether it proceeded from vengeance or from policy, inflicted a stain on his character which the remembrance of his numerous virtues and accomplishments can never entirely obliterate.

There was no possible reason, why Joan should not be regarded as a prisoner of war, and be entitled to all the courtesy and good usage which civilized nations practise towards enemies on these occasions. She had never, in her military capacity, forfeited, by any act of treachery or cruelty, her claim to that treatment: she was unstained by any civil crime: even the virtues and the very decorums of her sex had ever been rigidly observed by her: and though her appearing in war, and leading armies to battle, may seem an exception, she had thereby performed such signal service to her prince, that she had abundantly compensated for this irregularity; and was, on that very account, the more an object of praise and admiration. It was necessary, therefore, for the duke of Bedford to interest religion some way in the prosecution; and to cover, under that cloak, his dishonourable violation of justice and humanity.

Cauchon bishop of Beauvais, a man wholly devoted to the English interests, presented a petition against Joan, on pretence that she was taken within the bounds of his diocese; and he desired to have her tried by an ecclesiastical court for sorcery, impiety, idolatry, and magic: the university of Paris was so mean as to join in the same request: several prelates, among whom the cardinal of Winchester was the only Englishman, were appointed her judges: they held their court at Rouen, where their first session commenced on the 13th of February, 1431; and where the young king of England then resided: and the maid, clothed in her former military apparel, but loaded with irons, was produced before this tribunal.

She first desired to be eased of her chains: her judges answered, that she had once already attempted an escape, by throwing herself from a tower: she confessed the fact, maintained the justice of her intention, and owned that, if she could, she would still execute that purpose. All her other speeches shewed the same firmness and intrepidity: though harrassed with interrogatories during the course of near four months, she never betrayed any weakness or womanish submission; and no advantage was gained over her. The point, which her judges pushed most vehemently, was her visions and revelations, and intercourse with departed saints; and they asked her, whether she would submit to the church the truth of these inspirations: she replied, that she would submit them to God, the fountain of truth. They then exclaimed, that she was a heretic, and denied the authority of the church. She appealed to the pope: they rejected her appeal.

They asked her, why she put trust in her standard, which had been consecrated by magical incantations: she replied, that she put trust in the Supreme Being alone, whose image was impressed upon it. They demanded, why she carried in her hand that standard at the anointment and coronation of Charles at Rheims: she answered, that the person who had shared the danger, was entitled to share the glory. When accused of going to war, contrary to the decorums of her sex, and of assuming government and command over men; she scrupled not to reply, that her sole purpose was to defeat the English, and to expel them the kingdom. In the issue, she was condemned for all the crimes of which she had been accused, aggravated by heresy; her revelations were declared to be inventions of the devil to delude the people; and she was sentenced to be delivered over to the secular arm.

Joan, so long surrounded by inveterate enemies, who treated her with every mark of contumely; brow-beaten and overawed by men of superior rank, and men invested with the ensigns of a sacred character, which she had been accustomed accustomed to revere, felt her spirit at last subdued; and those visionary dreams of inspiration, in which she had been buoyed up by the triumphs of success and the applauses of her own party, gave way to the terrors of that punishment to which she was sentenced. She publicly declared herself willing to recant; she acknowledged the illusion of those revelations which the church had rejected; and she promised never more to maintain them. Her sentence was then mitigated: she was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and to be fed during life on bread and water.

Enough was now done to fulfil all political views, and to convince both the French and the English, that the opinion of divine influence, which had so much encouraged the one and daunted the other, was entirely without foundation. But the barbarous vengeance of Joan's enemies was not satisfied with this victory. Suspecting, that the female dress, which she had now consented to wear, was disagreeable to her, they purposely placed in her apartment a suit of men's apparel; and watched for the effects of that temptation upon her. On the sight of a dress in which she had acquired so much renown, and which, she once believed, she wore by the particular appointment of Heaven, all her former ideas and passions revived; and she ventured in her solitude to clothe herself again in the forbidden garment. Her insidious enemies caught her in that situation: her fault was interpreted to be no less than a relapse into heresy: no recantation would now suffice, and no pardon could be granted her. She was condemned to be burned in the market-place, now the Marché aux Veaux, of Rouen; and the infamous sentence was accordingly executed; her body being reduced to ashes, embracing a cross, and invoking with her dying breath the sacred name of Jesus. This admirable heroine, to whom the more generous superstition of the ancients would have erected altars, was, on pretence of heresy and magic, delivered over alive to the flames, and expiated, by that dreadful punishment, the signal services which she had rendered to her prince and to her native country.

The affairs of the English, far from being advanced by this execution, went every day more and more to decay: the great abilities of the regent were unable to resist the strong inclination which had seized the French, to return under the obedience of their rightful sovereign, and which that act of cruelty was ill fitted to remove. Chartres was surprized by a stratagem of the count of Dunois: a body of the English, under lord Willoughby, was defeated at St. Celerin upon the Sarte (o): the fair in the suburbs of Caen, seated in the midst of the English territories, was pillaged by de Lore, a French officer: the duke of Bedford himself was obliged by Dunois to raise the siege of Lagni, in 1432, with some loss of reputation: and all these misfortunes, though light, yet being continued and uninterrupted, brought discredit on the English, and menaced them with an approaching revolution. But the chief detriment which the regent sustained, was by the death of his duchess, Anne of Burgundy, who had hitherto preserved some appearance of friendship between him and her brother, the duke of Burgundy (p): and his marriage soon afterwards, with Jaqueline of Luxembourg, was the beginning of a breach between them (q). Philip complained, that the regent had never had the civility to inform him of his intentions, and that so sudden a marriage was a slight on his sister's memory. The cardinal of Winchester mediated a reconciliation between these princes, and brought both of them to St. Omer's for that purpose. The duke of Bedford here expected the first visit, both as he was son, brother, and uncle to a king, and because he had already made such advances as to come into the duke of Burgundy's territories, in order to have an interview with him: but Philip, proud of his great power and independent dominions, refused to pay this compliment to the regent: and the two princes, unable to adjust the ceremonial, parted without seeing each other (r). A bad prognostic of their cordial intentions to renew past amity!

Nothing could be more repugnant to the interests of the house of Burgundy, than to unite the crowns of France and England on the same head; an event which, had it taken place, would have reduced the duke to the rank of a petty prince, and have rendered his situation entirely dependant and precarious. The title also to the crown of France, which, after the failure of the elder branches, might accrue to the duke or his posterity, had been sacrificed by the treaty of Troye; and strangers and enemies were thereby irrevocably fixed upon the throne. Revenge alone had carried Philip into these impolitic measures; and a point of honour had hitherto induced him to maintain them. But as it is the nature of passion gradually to decay, while the sense of interest maintains a permanent influence and authority; the duke had, for some years, appeared sensibly to relent in his animosity against Charles, and to hearken willingly to the apologies made by that prince for the murder of the late duke of Burgundy. His extreme youth was pleaded in his favour; his incapacity to judge for himself; the ascendant gained over him by his ministers: and his inability to resent a deed, which, without his knowledge, had been perpetrated by those under whose guidance he was then placed. The more to flatter the pride of Philip, the king of France had banished from his court and presence Tanegui de Chatel, and all those who were concerned in that assassination: and had offered to make every other atonement which could be required of him. The distress which Charles had already suffered, had tended to gratify the duke's revenge; the miseries to which France had been so long exposed, had begun to move his compassion; and the cries of all Europe admonished him, that his resentment, which might hitherto be deemed pious, would, if carried farther, be universally condemned as barbarous and unrelenting. While the duke was in this disposition, every disgust which he received from England, made a double impression upon him; the entreaties of the count of Richemont and the duke of Bourbon, who had married his two sisters, had weight; and he finally determined to unite himself to the royal family of France, from which his own was descended. For this purpose a congress was appointed at Arras under the mediation of deputies from the pope and the council of Basle. When the time fixed for the meeting of the congress arrived, the king of France deputed twenty-nine of the first nobles in the kingdom to attend as his ambassadors; among whom were the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Bourbon, and the count of Richemont. The council of England nominated the cardinal of Winchester, the bishops of Norwich and St. David's, the earls of Huntingdon and Suffolk, with twenty-two other commissioners of high rank and eminence both in church and state; to attend on their part. The duke of Burgundy appeared in person, attended by his whole court, and most of his principal nobility. Two cardinals were sent by the pope and the council of Basle, which was then sitting; and there was scarcely a potentate in Europe who did not send deputies to be present at this celebrated congress. The conferences, which were held in the abbey of St. Vaast, opened on the 20th of August, 1435; and began with discussing the proposals of the two crowns, which were so wide of each other as to admit of no hopes of accommodation. France offered to cede Normandy with Guienne, but both of them loaded with the usual homage and vassalage to the crown. As the claims of England upon France were universally unpopular in Europe, the mediators declared the offers of Charles very reasonable; and the cardinal of Winchester, with the other English ambassadors, without giving a particular detail of their demands, immediately left the congress. There remained nothing but to discuss the mutual pretensions of Charles the Seventh and Philip duke of Burgundy. These were easily adjusted: the vassal was in a situation to give law to his superior; and he exacted conditions, which, had it not been for the present necessity, would have been deemed, to the last degree, dishonourable and disadvantageous to the crown of France.

The pope's legate absolved the duke of Burgundy from the various oaths which he had taken to Henry the Fifth and his successor; and Charles consented to gratify both his pride and ambition by the most ample concessions. He engaged to ask pardon of Philip, either in person or by his delegates, for the murder of his father, as a crime to the commission of which he had been induced to consent by the instigation of evil counsellors; to deliver up all the assassins to justice; to found chapels and perpetual masses for the soul of John duke of Burgundy, as well as for those of his attendants who were killed at the same time; to erect a cross on the spot where the murder was committed; and to pay fifty thousand crowns in gold, as a compensation for the jewels of the duke which had been taken from him after his assassination. He agreed to cede to Philip and his heirs, the counties and cities of Boulogne sur Mer, Maçon, St. Jençon, and Auxerre, with all their dependencies; together with that description of imposts, distinguished by the appellation of aids, which were levied on such parts of Maçon, Chalons, Autun, and Langres, as lay within Burgundy. The castles, towns, and districts of Bar sur Seine, Peronne, Roye, and Montdidier, with their appendages; the whole county of Ponthieu, Dourlens, St. Risquier, Crevecour, Arleux, Mortagne, St. Quintin, Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville, were mortgaged to Philip and his heirs, until four hundred thousand crowns should be paid for their redemption. Philip himself was exempted during the life of Charles, and his vassals from obeying him as their superior lord. The French monarch engaged to succour the duke in case of an attack by the English; and both parties agreed to make no treaty with the enemy without the consent of each other. The duke's vassals and others, who had borne St. Andrew's cross, which was the ensign of Burgundy, were exempted from serving under any other; and a general pardon was granted to all persons, except the assassins before mentioned. Each party renounced every alliance to the prejudice of the other; and, by letters patent, they mutually declared their respective subjects absolved from all ties of allegiance to him who should first violate the present treaty. The princes of the blood in France, and the Burgundian nobles, ratified this agreement under their hands and seals; and it was afterwards confirmed by the council of Basle, which denounced the censures of excommunication and interdict against him who should be guilty of any infringement of the articles. Such were the extravagant terms on which the king of France purchased the friendship and alliance of the duke of Burgundy.

The duke sent a herald to England with a letter, in which he notified the conclusion of the treaty of Arras, and apologised for his departure from that of Troye. The council received the herald with great coldness: they even assigned him his lodging in a shoemaker's house, by way of insult; and the populace were so incensed, that, if the duke of Gloucester had not given him guards, his life had been exposed to danger, when he appeared in the streets. The Flemings, and other subjects of Philip, were insulted, and some of them murdered by the Londoners; and every thing seemed to tend towards a rupture between the two nations (s). These violences were not disagreeable to the duke of Burgundy; as they afforded him a pretence for the farther measures which he intended to take against the English, whom he now regarded as implacable and dangerous enemies.

A few days after the duke of Bedford received intelligence of this treaty, so fatal to the interests of England, he died at Roüen on the 14th of September. He was a prince of great abilities, and of many virtues; and whose memory, except for the barbarous execution of the Maid of Orleans, was unsullied by any considerable blemish. Isabella, queen of France, died a little before him, despised by the English, detested by the French, and reduced in her later years to regard, with an unnatural horror, the progress and successes of her own son, in recovering possession of his kingdom. This period was signalized by the death of the earl of Arundel (t), a great English general, who, though he commanded three thousand men, was foiled by Xaintrailles at the head of six hundred, and soon after expired of the wounds which he received in the action.

The violent factions, which prevailed between the duke of Gloucester and the cardinal of Winchester, prevented the English from taking the proper measures for repairing these multiplied losses, and threw all their affairs into confusion. The popularity of the duke, and his near relation to the crown, gave him advantages in the contest, which he often lost by his open and unguarded temper, unfit to struggle with the politic and interested spirit of his rival. The balance, meanwhile, of these parties kept every thing in suspense: foreign affairs were much neglected; and though Richard duke of York, son to that earl of Cambridge who was executed in the beginning of the last reign, was appointed successor to the duke of Bedford, in the regency of France, it was seven months before his commission passed the seals; and the English remained so long in an enemy's country, without a proper head or governor.

The new governor, having at length received his commission of regent, landed in Normandy with a considerable body of troops, and on his arrival, he found the capital already lost. The Parisians had always been more attached to the Burgundian than to the English interest; and after the conclusion of the treaty of Arras, their affections, without any farther control, universally led them to return to their allegiance under their native sovereign. The constable Richemont, together with mareschal L'Ile Adam, the same person who had before put Paris into the hands of the duke of Burgundy, was introduced in the night-time by intelligence with the citizens: lord Willoughby, who commanded only a small garrison of fifteen thousand men, was expelled: this nobleman discovered valour and presence of mind on the occasion; but unable to guard so large a place against such multitudes, he retired into the Bastile, and being there invested, he delivered up that fortress, and was contented to stipulate for the safe retreat of his troops into Normandy (u).

In the same season, 1436, the duke of Burgundy openly took part against England, and commenced hostilities by the siege of Calais, the only place which now gave the English any sure hold of France, and still rendered them dangerous. As he was beloved among his own subjects, and had acquired the epithet of Good, from his popular qualities, he was able to interest all the inhabitants of the Low Countries in the success of this enterprize; and he invested that place with an army of fifty thousand men, which was without experience, discipline, or military spirit (v). On the first alarm of this siege, the duke of Gloucester assembled some forces, sent a defiance to Philip, and challenged him to wait the event of a battle, which he promised to give, as soon as the wind would permit him to reach Calais. The warlike genius of the English had at that time rendered them terrible to all the northern parts of Europe; especially to the Flemings, who were more expert in manufactures than in arms; and the duke of Burgundy, being already foiled in some attempts before Calais, and observing the discontent and terror of his own army, thought proper to raise the siege, and to retreat before the arrival of the enemy (w).

The English were still, about the middle of 1440, masters of many fine provinces in France; but retained possession, more by the extreme weakness of Charles, than by the strength of their own garrisons, or the force of their armies. Nothing indeed can be more surprising than the feeble efforts made, during the course of several years, by these two potent nations against each other; while the one struggled for independence, and the other aspired to a total conquest of its rival. The general want of industry, commerce, and police, in that age, had rendered all the European nations, and France and England no less than the others, unfit for bearing the burthens of war, when it was prolonged beyond one season; and the continuance of hostilities had, long ere this time, exhausted the force and patience of both kingdoms. Scarcely could the appearance of an army be brought into the field on either side; and all the operations consisted in the surprizal of places, in the rencounter of detached parties, and in incursions upon the open country; which were performed by small bodies, assembled on a sudden from the neighbouring garrisons. In this method of conducting the war, the French king had much the advantage: the affections of the people were entirely on his side; intelligence was early brought him of the state and motions of the enemy; the inhabitants were ready to join in any attempts against the garrisons; and thus ground was continually, though slowly, gained upon the English. The duke of York, who was a prince of abilities, struggled against these difficulties during the course of five years; and being assisted by the valour of lord Talbot, soon after created earl of Shrewsbury, he performed actions which acquired him honour, but merit not the attention of posterity. It would have been well, had this feeble war, in sparing the blood of the people, prevented likewise all other oppressions; and had the fury of men, which reason and justice cannot restrain, thus happily received a check from their impotence and inability. But the French and English, though they exerted such small force, were, however, stretching beyond their resources, which were still smaller; and the troops, destitute of pay, were obliged to subsist by plundering and oppressing the country, both of friends and enemies. The fields in all the north of France, which was the seat of war, were laid waste and left uncultivated (x). The cities were gradually depopulated, not by the blood spilt in battle, but by the more destructive pillage of the garrisons (y): and both parties, weary of hostilities which decided nothing, seemed at last desirous of peace, and they set on foot negociations for that purpose. But the proposals of France, and the demands of England, were still so wide of each other, that all hope of accommodation immediately vanished. The English ambassadors demanded restitution of all the provinces which had once been annexed to England, together with the final cession of Calais and its district; and required the possession of these extensive territories without the burden of any fealty or homage on the part of their prince: the French offered only part of Guienne, part of Normandy, and Calais, loaded with the usual burdens. It appeared in vain to continue the negociation, while there was so little prospect of agreement. The English were still too haughty to stoop from the vast hopes which they had formerly entertained, and to accept of terms more suitable to the present condition of the two kingdoms.

The duke of York soon after resigned his government to Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, a nobleman of reputation, whom death prevented from long enjoying this dignity. The duke, upon the demise of that nobleman, returned to his charge, and during his administration, a truce was concluded between the king of England and the duke of Burgundy, which had become necessary for the commercial interests of their subjects (z). The war with France continued in the same languid and feeble state as before.

The captivity of five princes of the blood, taken prisoners in the battle of Azincour, was a considerable advantage which England long enjoyed over its enemy; but this superiority was now entirely lost. Some of these princes had died; some had been ransomed; and the duke of Orleans, the most powerful among them, was the last that remained in the hands of the English. He offered the sum of fifty-four thousand nobles (a) for his liberty; and when this proposal was laid before the council of England, as every question was there an object of faction, the party of the duke of Gloucester, and that of the cardinal of Winchester, were divided in their sentiments with regard to it. The duke reminded the council of the dying advice of the late king, that none of these prisoners should on any account be released, till his son should be of sufficient age to hold, himself, the reins of government. The cardinal insisted on the greatness of the sum offered, which, in reality, was nearly equal to two-thirds of all the extraordinary supplies that the parliament, during the course of seven years, granted for the support of the war. And he added, that the release of this prince was more likely to be advantageous than prejudicial to the English interests; by filling the court of France with faction, and giving a head to those numerous malcontents whom Charles was at present able, with great difficulty, to restrain. The cardinal's party, as usual, prevailed: the duke of Orleans was released, after a melancholy captivity of twenty-five years (b): and the duke of Burgundy, as a pledge of his entire reconciliation with the family of Orleans, facilitated to that prince the payment of his ransom. It must be confessed, that the princes and nobility, in those ages, went to war on very disadvantageous terms. If they were taken prisoners, they either remained in captivity during life, or purchased their liberty at the price which the victors were pleased to impose, and which often reduced their families to want and beggary.

The duke of Orleans, on his return to France, was received by the people with such marks of affection, that Charles took umbrage at his popularity; and, far from favouring his endeavours to promote a peace, prepared to pursue the war with more vigour than he had lately exerted. Having placed himself at the head of his troops, accompanied by the dauphin, he opened the campaign in the month of April, by the siege of Creil, a town on the river Orise, which he soon obliged to capitulate. His next attempt was on Pontoise, which he invested about the middle of May, with an army of twelve thousand men. The dauphin, and all the best generals of France, were present at this siege, which was conducted with great vigour, as Charles was extremely anxious to obtain possession of a place so important both from its strength and situation. The defence, however, was sustained with equal vigour and intrepidity; and all the precautions of the besiegers proved inadequate to resist the courageous efforts of the gallant Talbot, who forced their entrenchments, and entered the town with a considerable convoy. The garrison, deriving fresh spirits from this seasonable supply, repelled every attack of the enemy, who continued the siege till the middle of August; when the duke of York, having collected an army of eight thousand men, marched from Roüen towards Pontoise. When he approached the place he sent a herald to Charles, challenging him to battle; but the French monarch replied, that he should never suffer an enemy to regulate his conduct. The two armies were separated by the river Orise; and, as the bridge was guarded by a detachment of a thousand men, Charles set the English at defiance, and continued the siege without dread of molestation. His security, however, proved fallacious; for the duke of York, having found means to transport six hundred men in boats, during the night, to the opposite side, they attacked the guard on the bridge; and, having put them all to the sword, opened a passage for the remainder of the army. Charles was thrown into such consternation by this unexpected assault, that he hastily raised the siege, and retired under the cannon of Poissi. Thither he was followed by the duke of York, who once more challenged him to battle: but, finding Charles determined to avoid an engagement, the regent committed depredations on the neighbouring country; and having recruited the garrison of Pontoise, returned into Normandy. The precipitate retreat of the French from an inferior army gave rise to great murmurs in Paris; and the popular discontents became so loud and prevalent, that Charles deemed it necessary to recover his lost reputation by some signal effort. With this view he returned to Pontoise, wholly unexpected by the English; recommenced the siege; and conducted it with so much vigour, that a practicable breach was soon effected, which Charles was the first to mount. His conduct on this occasion inspired his troops with such courage, that their efforts proved irresistible; the place was taken, five hundred of the garrison were put to the sword, and the rest made prisoners.

During these transactions in France, the most violent confusion prevailed in the council of England. The cardinal of Winchester, not content with thwarting the duke of Gloucester in all his views and projects, finding his popularity daily increased, had secretly determined to operate his destruction. He had introduced spies into his family, from the hope that the continued provocations which the duke received from the council, and the contemptuous behaviour of the young king; whose disposition, being now developed, had proved him to be harmless and inoffensive, of a weak mind, and slender abilities—(a fit puppet for the hand of ambition)—would betray him into some unguarded expressions that might give rise to an accusation of treason; but Gloucester, though warm in temper, and nicely susceptible of insults, was too strongly attached to his sovereign to afford the smallest pretence for attacking him on the score of disloyalty; the cardinal was therefore obliged to change his plan, and to seek, by farther provocations, to obtain some advantages over his enemy. Having received information from one of his emissaries that the duchess of Gloucester (who was the daughter of Reginald lord Cobham) had frequent meetings with a priest, named Roger Bolingbroke, a reputed necromancer, and Margery Gourdimain, of Eye, known by the appellation of The Witch of Eye, who acquired a subsistence by the sale of certain powders, calculated to prevent the alienation of affection, he issued a warrant for the apprehension of those people, as well as of the duchess herself, whom he accused of high treason. The sole attempt that was made to support this malicious accusation, was an assertion that the prisoners had made an image of young Henry in wax, which they melted before a slow fire, from the belief that, by the power of magical incantations, a similar gradual consumption of the king's strength and vigour would take place, and produce a total decay. The duchess underwent an examination by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, assisted by several other prelates, who were not ashamed to prostitute the sacred dignity of their character to such base and treacherous purposes. The accusation being confirmed by these infamous priests, a solemn deputation of the peers, among whom were the earls of Huntingdon, Stafford, Suffolk, and Northumberland, was appointed to try her. It will easily be imagined, that the same dishonourable spirit of persecution which dictated the charge obtained at the trial. No evidence could possibly be adduced in support of an assertion that set common sense at defiance; nor was any required: the judges, all creatures of the cardinal, obeyed his injunctions with implicit precision; and, without the smallest proof, pronounced the duchess guilty, and sentenced her to do penance, three different times, at St. Paul's and two other churches, and then doomed her to perpetual imprisonment. Bolingbroke, who, unfortunately for himself possessed some mathematical knowledge, and was therefore deemed a magician, was executed at Tyburn; and Margery Gourdimain, the female vender of love-powders, was burnt in Smithfield (c). The cardinal, however, gained but little by this arbitrary exertion of power; for Gloucester, aware of his designs, was studious to counteract them; and the people, perceiving that the duke was an object of persecution, bestowed on him a greater portion of their esteem.

Since the declension of Gloucester's power in the council, the war with France had been either wholly neglected; or, what was of worse consequence, but feebly pursued. After the reduction of Pontoise, Charles had marched his army into Guienne; and meeting with no opposition, made himself master of the principal places in that province. The duke of York indeed attempted to make a diversion in the northern parts of the kingdom; and lord Talbot, lately created earl of Shrewsbury, landed in Normandy with a reinforcement of troops: but their forces being wholly inadequate to any important enterprize, they were unable to impede the rapid progress of the French.

The duke of Gloucester, in the mean time, justly incensed at the personal injuries he had sustained from the cardinal of Winchester, as well as at the flagitious practices of that prelate, preferred an accusation of high treason against him. The charge consisted of fourteen articles; the most weighty of which set forth, that the said cardinal, in conjunction with John Kemp, archbishop of York, had taken the exclusive possession of the king's person, and assumed to himself the exercise of sovereign authority. By another, these prelates were accused of embezzling immense sums of the public money. Both these accusations were founded in fact; and, as they related to circumstances of public notoriety, might have been easily proved: but the council, blindly devoted to the will of the cardinal, refused to exert themselves; and the king, wholly at his command, rendered the prosecution needless, by granting him a full pardon for all the treasons and crimes he had ever committed—though the cardinal's acceptance of such a pardon certainly amounted to an acknowledgement of his own guilt.

The sentiments of the cardinal of Winchester, some time after, prevailed in a point of great moment. That prelate had always encouraged every proposal of accommodation with France; and had represented the utter impossibility, in the present circumstances, of pushing farther the conquests in that kingdom, and the great difficulty of even maintaining those which were already made. He insisted on the extreme reluctance of the parliament to grant supplies; the disorders in which the English affairs in Normandy were involved; the daily progress made by the French king; and the advantage of stopping his hand by a temporary accommodation, which might leave room for time and accidents to operate in favour of the English. The duke of Gloucester, high-spirited and haughty, and educated in the lofty pretensions which the first successes of his two brothers had rendered familiar to him, could not yet be induced to relinquish all hopes of prevailing over France; much less could he see, with patience, his own opinion thwarted and rejected by the influence of his rival in the English council. But, notwithstanding his opposition, the earl of Suffolk, a nobleman who adhered to the cardinal's party, was dispatched to Tours, in order to negociate with the French ministers. It was found impossible to adjust the terms of a lasting peace; but a truce for twenty-two months was concluded, on the 24th of May, 1444, to last till the first of April, 1446, which left every thing on the present footing between the parties. The numerous disorders under which the French government laboured, and which time alone could remedy, induced Charles to assent to this truce; and the same motives engaged him afterwards to prolong it (d) to six years. But Suffolk, not content with executing this object of his commission, proceeded to another business, with which he was charged, either by a private article of his instructions, or (which is more probable) by the secret commands of the cardinal, to procure for young Henry a consort; who, being indebted to him for her elevation, might prove a formidable acquisition to his party.

In proportion as Henry advanced in years, his character became fully known in the court, and was no longer ambiguous to either faction. Of the most harmless, inoffensive, simple manners; but of the most slender capacity; he was fitted, both by the softness of his temper, and the weakness of his understanding, to be perpetually governed by those who surrounded him; and it was easy to foresee that his reign would prove a perpetual minority. As he had now reached the twenty-third year of his age, it was natural to think of choosing him a queen; and each party was ambitious of having him receive one from their hand; since it was probable that this circumstance would decide, for ever, the victory between them. The duke of Gloucester proposed a daughter of the count of Armagnac; but had not credit to effect his purpose. The cardinal and his friends had cast their eye on Margaret of Anjou, daughter of René, count of Anjou, titular king of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem,—pompous titles, which he inherited from the count of Anjou, brother of Charles V. who had left these magnificent titles to his posterity, but without any real power or possessions to support them. This princess herself was one of the most accomplished women of her age both in body and mind; and seemed to possess those qualities which would equally qualify her to acquire the ascendant over Henry, and to supply all his defects and weaknesses. Of a masculine, courageous spirit, of an enterprising temper, endowed with solidity as well as vivacity of understanding, she had not been able to conceal these great talents even in the privacy of her father's family; and it was reasonable to expect, that when she should mount the throne, they would break out with still superior lustre. The earl of Suffolk, therefore, in concert with his associates of the English council, made proposals of marriage to Margaret, which were immediately accepted. But this nobleman, besides preoccupying the princess's favour, by being the chief means of her advancement, endeavoured to ingratiate himself with her family, by very extraordinary concessions: though Margaret brought no dowry with her, he ventured, of himself, without any direct authority from the council, but probably with the approbation of the cardinal and the ruling members, to engage, by a secret article, that the province of Maine, which was at that time in the hands of the English, should be ceded to Charles of Anjou, her uncle (e), who was prime minister and favourite of the French king, and who had already received from his master the grant of that province as his appanage. The articles of marriage being adjusted, Suffolk returned to England; where the treaty was accordingly ratified. Suffolk obtained first the title of marquis, then that of duke; and even received the thanks of parliament for his services in concluding it.

Matters being thus far prepared, the cardinal prevailed on the weak monarch to confer new honours on some of the most powerful of the nobility. In consequence of which John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, was created duke of Exeter; Humphrey earl of Stafford, duke of Buckingham; and Henry de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, (son to the late regent of France,) was made duke of Warwick. The earl (now marquis) of Suffolk was sent, with a splendid train of peers and peeresses, to conduct the new queen to England, where she landed in April, 1445. On the 22nd of that month the marriage was consummated at Southwick in Hampshire; and, on the 30th of May, the ceremony of her coronation was performed, with great pomp and solemnity, at Westminster Abbey.

The generous duke of Gloucester, though foiled in his endeavours to promote the welfare of this nation, by recommending a more suitable person for the wife of Henry, had attempted to soothe the indignation of Margaret, by going forth to meet her, with five hundred of his followers in livery, as she approached the metropolis, and by shewing her every mark of respect, but her resentment, daily inflamed by the cardinal and his party, became inveterate; and she was soon brought to join in a project for the destruction of that nobleman, who, from the generosity of his heart, and the nobleness of his nature, might have been of the greatest service to her in her exalted station. In order to effect their nefarious purpose, a parliament was summoned to meet,—not at London, which was supposed to be too well affected to the duke, but—at St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk, on the 10th of February, 1447; and the duke of Gloucester, unsuspicious of danger, came to attend it at the appointed time. The assembly was opened with the usual forms, and nothing extraordinary occurred on the first day of the sessions; but, on the second, the duke was arrested by lord Beaumont, the high constable, and committed to prison: his attendants were likewise seized, and secured in different places of confinement. The pretext offered to the public for this violence was, that Gloucester had formed a conspiracy to assassinate the king, and usurp the throne; and it was given out that he would be brought to trial without delay for high-treason. This tale, however, not meeting with that degree of credit which it was expected the authority of those who invented and propagated it would necessarily enforce, the accusers judged it expedient to change their plan, and accordingly resolved on a private assassination, as more certain, and less dangerous, than a public execution. It therefore happened, that a few days after his commitment, the duke of Gloucester was found dead in his bed! and though his body, which had no marks of violence on it, was exposed to the view both of the parliament and the people, no one entertained the smallest doubt that he had fallen a victim to the persecuting spirit and malevolent designs of his enemies. His death happened on the 28th of February, the same month in which the parliament assembled. A similar artifice had formerly been practised in the case of Edward the Second, Richard the Second, and Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester. Several of the duke's friends and retinue were afterwards tried as accomplices in his supposed treasonable projects; and, to the disgrace of their judges, they were convicted, and sentenced to death. The marquis of Suffolk, who conducted this shameful process, sought to avert the odium he had incurred by this which he supposed an act of popularity. He suffered the convicted persons to be conveyed to the place of execution, to be hanged, and to be cut down, but just as the executioner was proceeding to quarter them, their pardon was produced, and they were recovered to life (f). This mode of bestowing mercy (exercised by the Englishmen) was, in this instance, not less cruel than the illegal punishment which rendered the exercise of it necessary. The indecent haste and rapacity with which the queen and her favourites seized on the extensive estates of the duke of Gloucester, and appropriated them to their own use, or bestowed them on their minions, sufficiently explained to the people the motives which had influenced his destruction, and rendered his murderers completely odious (g).

The cardinal of Winchester died six weeks after his nephew, whose murder was universally ascribed to him as well as to the duke of Suffolk, and it is said, that in his last moments he experienced the severest pangs of a guilty conscience—pangs which reduce illustrious vice to its proper station, and afford to obscure virtue a glorious, though a painful triumph! the remorse which he suffered could scarcely be expected from a man hardened, during the course of a long life, in falsehood and in politics. What share the queen had in this guilt, is uncertain; her usual activity and spirit made the public conclude, with some reason, that the duke's enemies durst not have ventured on such a deed without her privity. But there happened soon after, an event, of which she and her favourite, the marquis of Suffolk, bore incontestibly the whole odium.

That article of the marriage treaty, by which the province of Maine was to be ceded to Charles of Anjou, the queen's uncle, had probably been hitherto kept secret; and, during the lifetime of the duke of Gloucester, whose popularity was great, it might have been dangerous to venture on the execution of it. But, as the court of France strenuously insisted on its performance, orders were now dispatched, under Henry's hand, to sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, commanding him to surrender that place to Charles of Anjou. Surienne, either questioning the authenticity of the order, or regarding his government as his sole fortune, refused compliance; and it became necessary for a French army, under the count of Dunois, to lay siege to the city. The governor made as good and as obstinate a defence as his situation could permit; but, receiving no relief from Edmund duke of Somerset, who was at that time governor of Normandy, he was at last obliged to capitulate, and to surrender not only Mans, but all the other fortresses of that province, which was thus entirely alienated from the crown of England.

The bad effects of this measure stopped not here. Surienne, in 1448, at the head of all his garrisons, amounting to two thousand five hundred men, retired into Normandy, in expectation of being taken into pay, and of being quartered in some towns of that province. But Somerset, who had no means of subsisting such a multitude, and who was probably incensed at Surienne's disobedience, refused to admit him; and this adventurer, not daring to commit depredations on the territories either of the king of France or of England, marched into Britanny, seized the rich commercial town of Fougeres, repaired the fortifications of Pontorson and St. Jacques de Beuvron, and subsisted his troops by the ravages which he exercised on that whole province (h). The duke of Britanny, justly enraged at the infraction of a truce, in which, as an ally of France, he had been included, complained of the violence to the king of France, his liege lord: Charles remonstrated with the duke of Somerset; that nobleman replied, that the injury was done without his privity, and that he had no authority over Surienne and his followers (i). This answer, as might have been expected, proved unsatisfactory to Charles, who never would admit of the apology. He insisted that these plunderers should be recalled, and that reparation should be made to the duke of Britanny for all the damages which he had sustained: and, in order to render an accommodation absolutely impracticable, he made the estimation of damages amount to no less a sum than one million six hundred thousand crowns. He was sensible of the superiority which the present state of his affairs gave him over England; and he determined to take advantage of it.

No sooner was the truce concluded between the two kingdoms, than Charles employed himself, with great industry and judgement, in repairing those numberless ills to which France, from the continuance of wars both foreign and domestic, had so long been exposed. He restored the course of public justice; he introduced order into the finances; he established discipline in his troops; he repressed faction in his court; he revived the languid state of agriculture and the arts; and, in the course of a few years, he rendered his kingdom flourishing within itself, and formidable to its neighbours. Meanwhile, affairs in England had taken a very different turn. The court was divided into parties, which were enraged against each other: the people were discontented with the government: conquests in France, which were an object more of glory than of interest, were overlooked amidst domes-

(g) The duke of Gloucester was an excellent prince, and is said to have received a better education than was usual in his age, to have founded one of the first public libraries in England, and to have been a great patron of learned men. Among other advantages which he reaped from this turn of mind, it tended much to cure him of credulity; of which the following instance is given by Sir Thomas More. There was a man who pretended, that, though he was born blind, he had recovered his sight by touching the shrine at St. Albans. The duke, happening soon after to pass that way, questioned the man, and, seeming to doubt of his sight, asked him the colours of several cloaks, worn by persons of his retinue. The man told them very readily. "You are a knave," cried the prince; "had you been born blind, you could not so soon have learned to distinguish colours;" and immediately ordered him to be set in the stocks as an impostor. tic incidents, which engrossed the attention of all men: the governor of Normandy, ill supplied with money, was obliged to dismiss the greater part of his troops, and to allow the fortifications of the towns and castles to become ruinous: and the nobility and people of that province had, during the late open communication with France, enjoyed frequent opportunities of renewing connexions with their ancient master, and of concerting the means for expelling the English. The occasion, therefore, seemed favourable to Charles for breaking the truce. Normandy was at once invaded by four powerful armies; one commanded by the king himself; a second by the duke of Britanny; a third by the duke of Alençon; and a fourth by the count of Dunois. The places opened their gates almost as soon as the French appeared before them: Verneüil, Nogent sur Seine, Chateau Gaillard, Pont eau de Mer, Gisors, Mante, Vernon, Argentan, Lisieux, Fécamp, Coutances, Belesme, Pont de l'Arche, fell in an instant into the hands of the enemy. The duke of Somerset, so far from having an army which could take the field, and relieve these places, was not able to supply them with the necessary garrisons and provisions. He retired, with the few troops of which he was master, into Roüen; and thought it sufficient, if, till the arrival of succours from England, he could save that capital from the general fate of the province. The garrison of that city consisted but of two thousand men; and Charles, having reduced the greatest part of Normandy in less than four months, advanced, in the beginning of October, 1449, to attack the capital, at the head of a formidable army, fifty thousand strong. The dangerous example of revolt had infected the inhabitants; and they called aloud for a capitulation. Somerset, unable to resist, at once, both the enemies within and from without, retired with his garrison into the palace and castle; which, being places not tenable, he was obliged to surrender: he purchased a retreat to Harfleur by the payment of fifty-six thousand crowns, by engaging to surrender Arques, Tancarville, Moustier Villiers, Lislebonne, Caudebec, Honfleur, and other places in Normandy, and by delivering the gallant Talbot earl of Shrewsbury, and several others, as hostages for the performance of articles (k). The governor of Honfleur refused to obey his orders; upon which the earl of Shrewsbury, who was one of the hostages, was detained prisoner; and the English were thus deprived of the only general capable of recovering them from their present distressed situation: it sustained a siege, but was obliged to surrender on the 18th of February, 1450. Harfleur made a better defence under Sir Thomas Curson the governor; but was finally obliged to open its gates to Dunois. Succours at last appeared from England under Sir Thomas Kyriel, and landed at Cherbourgh: but these came very late, amounted only to four thousand men, and were soon after put to rout at Fourmigni by the count of Clermont (l). This battle, or rather skirmish, was the only action fought by the English for the defence of their dominions in France, which they had purchased at such an expence of blood and treasure. Somerset, shut up in Caën without any prospect of relief, found it necessary to capitulate: Falaise opened its gates, on condition that the earl of Shrewsbury should be restored to liberty; and Cherbourgh, the last place of Normandy which remained in the hands of the English, being delivered up, on the 12th August, the conquest of that important province was finished in a twelvemonth by Charles, to the great joy of the inhabitants and of his whole kingdom (m).

A like rapid success attended the French arms in Guienne; though the inhabitants of that province were, from long custom, better inclined to the English government. Dunois was dispatched thither, and met with no resistance in the field, and very little from the towns. Great improvements had been made, during this age, in the structure and management of artillery, and none in fortification; and the art of defence was by that means more unequal, than either before or since, to the art of attack. After all the small places about Bourdeaux were reduced, that city agreed to submit, if not relieved by a certain time; and as no one in England thought seriously of these distant concerns, no relief appeared; the place surrendered; and Bayonne being taken soon after, on the 25th of August, 1451, this whole province, which had remained united to England since the accession of Henry II. was, after a period of three centuries, finally swallowed up in the French monarchy.

Though no peace or truce was concluded between France and England, the war was, in a manner, at an end. The English, torn in pieces by the civil dissensions which ensued, made but one feeble effort more for the recovery of Guienne: and Charles, occupied at home in regulating the government, and fencing against the intrigues of his factious son, Louis the Dauphin, scarcely ever attempted to invade them in their island, or to retaliate upon them, by availing himself of their intestine confusions.

While the English were sustaining these losses on the continent, the popular discontents, aggravated by domestic oppression, increased to a great height, and threatened destruction to the queen's favourite, who had been lately created duke of Suffolk, and to whom all the national calamities had been hastily imputed. A spirit of revolt appeared in Hampshire, at the commencement of the year 1450; when Adam Molyns, bishop of Chichester, and keeper of the privy seal, who was known to be devoted to the will of Suffolk, was murdered by the populace at Portsmouth; and William Ascouth, bishop of Salisbury, soon after experienced a similar fate. An insurrection in Kent was also carried on by one Thany, a fuller, better known by the appellation of Blue-beard; but the interference of legal authority proving sufficient to quell it, the principal insurgents, with Thany at their head, were seized and hanged at Canterbury.

Although the people of England were never willing to grant the supplies necessary for keeping possession of the conquered provinces in France, they repined extremely at the loss of these boasted acquisitions; and fancied, because a sudden irruption could make conquests, that, without steady counsels, and an uniform expence, it was possible to maintain them. The voluntary cession of Maine to the queen's uncle had made them suspect treachery in the loss of Normandy and Guienne. They still considered Margaret as a French woman and a latent enemy of the kingdom. And when they saw her father and all her relations active in promoting the success of the French, they could not be persuaded that she, who was all powerful in the English council, would very zealously oppose them in their enterprizes.

But the most fatal blow given to the popularity of the crown, and to the interests of the house of Lancaster, was by the assassination of the virtuous duke of Gloucester, whose character, had he been alive, would have intimidated the partizans of the house of York; but whose memory, being extremely cherished by the people, served to throw an odium on all his murderers. By this crime the reigning family suffered a double prejudice: it was deprived of its firmest support; and it was loaded with all the infamy of that imprudent and barbarous assassination.

As the duke of Suffolk was known to have have had an active hand in the crime, he partook deeply of the hatred attending it; and the clamours, which necessarily rose against him, as prime minister, and declared favourite of the queen, were thereby augmented to a tenfold pitch, and became absolutely uncontrollable. The great nobility could ill brook to see a subject exalted above them; much more one who was only great grandson to a merchant, and who was of a birth so much inferior to theirs. The people complained of his arbitrary measures; which were, in some degree, a necessary consequence of the irregular power then possessed by the prince, but which the least disaffection easily magnified into tyranny. The great acquisitions which he daily made were the object of envy; and as they were gained at the expence of the crown, which was itself reduced to poverty, they appeared, on that account, to all indifferent persons, the more exceptionable and invidious.

The revenues of the crown, which had long been disproportioned to its power and dignity, had been extremely dilapidated during the minority of Henry (n); both by the rapacity of the courtiers, which the king's uncles could not control, and by the necessary expences of the French war, which had always been very ill supplied by the grants of parliament. The royal demesnes were dissipated; and at the same time the king was loaded with a debt of three hundred and seventy-two thousand pounds, a sum so great, that the parliament could never think of discharging it. This unhappy situation forced the ministers upon many arbitrary measures: the household itself could not be supported without stretching to the utmost the right of purveyance, and rendering it a kind of universal robbery upon the people: the public clamour rose high upon this occasion, and no one had the equity to make allowance for the necessity of the king's situation. Suffolk, once become odious, bore the blame of the whole; and every grievance, in every part of the administration, was universally imputed to his tyranny and injustice.

The parliament assembled on the 28th of January, 1450, when this nobleman, sensible of the public hatred under which he laboured, and foreseeing an attack from the commons, endeavoured to overawe his enemies by boldly presenting himself to the charge, and by insisting upon his own innocence, and even upon his merits, and those of his family, in the public service. He rose in the house of peers; took notice of the clamours propagated against him; and complained, that, after serving the crown in thirty-four campaigns; after living abroad seventeen years without once returning to his native country; after losing a father and three brothers in the wars with France; after being himself a prisoner, and purchasing his liberty by a great ransom; it should yet be suspected, that he had been debauched from his allegiance by that enemy whom he had ever opposed with such zeal and fortitude, and that he had betrayed his prince, who had rewarded his services by the highest honours and greatest offices that it was in his power to confer (o). This speech did not answer the purpose intended. The commons, rather provoked at his challenge, attended by their speaker, repaired to the house of lords, opened their charge against him, and sent up to the peers an accusation of high treason, divided into several articles; whereupon he was immediately committed to the Tower. They insisted, that he had persuaded the French king to invade England with an armed force, in order to depose the king, and to place on the throne his own son, John de la Pole, whom he intended to marry to Margaret, the only daughter of the late John duke of Somerset, and to whom, he imagined, he would by that means acquire a title to the crown: that he had contributed to the release of the duke of Orleans, in hopes that that prince would assist king Charles in expelling the English from France, and recovering full possession of his kingdom: that he had afterwards encouraged that monarch to make open war on Normandy and Guienne, and had promoted his conquests by betraying the secrets of England, and obstructing the succours intended to be sent to those provinces: and that he had, without any powers or commission, promised by treaty to cede the province of Maine to Charles of Anjou, and had accordingly ceded it; which proved in the issue the chief cause of the loss of Normandy (p).

It is evident, from a review of these articles, that the commons adopted, without inquiry, all the popular clamours against the duke of Suffolk, and charged him with crimes, of which none but the vulgar could seriously believe him guilty. Nothing can be more incredible, than that a nobleman, so little eminent by his birth and character, could think of acquiring the crown to his family, and of deposing Henry by foreign force, and, together with him, Margaret, his patron, a princess of so much spirit and penetration. Suffolk appealed to many noblemen in the house, who knew that he had intended to marry his son to one of the co-heirs of the earl of Warwick, and was disappointed in his views, only by the death of that lady: and he observed, that Margaret of Somerset could bring to her husband no title to the crown; because she herself was not so much as comprehended in the entail settled by act of parliament. It is easy to account for the loss of Normandy and Guienne, from the situation of affairs in the two kingdoms, without supposing any treachery in the English ministers; and it may safely be affirmed, that greater vigour was requisite to defend these provinces from the arms of Charles VII. than to conquer them at first from his predecessor. It could never be the interest of any English minister to betray and abandon such acquisitions; much less of one who was so well established in his master's favour, who enjoyed such high honours and ample possessions in his own country, who had nothing to dread but the effects of popular hatred, and who could never think, without the most extreme reluctance, of becoming a fugitive and exile in a foreign land. The only article which carries any face of probability, is his engagement for the delivery of Maine to the queen's uncle: but Suffolk maintained, with great appearance of truth, that this measure was approved of by several at the council table (q); and it seems hard to ascribe to it, as is done by the commons, the subsequent loss of Normandy, and expulsion of the English. Normandy lay open on every side to the invasion of the French: Maine, an inland province, must soon after have fallen without any attack: and as the English possessed in other parts more fortresses than they could garrison or provide for, it seemed no bad policy to contract their force, and to render the defence practicable, by reducing it within a narrower compass.

The commons were probably sensible that this charge of treason against Suffolk would not bear a strict scrutiny; and they therefore, soon after, sent up against him a new charge of misdemeanors, which they also divided into several articles. They affirmed, among other imputations, that he had procured exorbitant grants from the crown, had embezzled the public money, had conferred offices on improper persons, had perverted justice by maintaining iniquitous causes, and had procured pardons for notorious offenders (r). The articles are mostly general; but are not improbable: and as Suffolk seems to have been a bad man and a bad minister, it will not be rash in us to think that he was guilty, and that many of these articles could have been proved against him. The court was alarmed at the prosecution of a favourite minister, who lay under such a load of popular prejudices; and an expedient was fallen upon to save him from present ruin. The king summoned all the lords, spiritual and temporal, to meet on the 17th of March, and the king being seated on his throne, the prisoner was produced before them, and asked what he could say in his own defence? He denied the charges, but submitted to the king's mercy: Henry expressed himself not satisfied with regard to the first impeachment for treason; but in consideration of the second, for misdemeanors, he declared, that, by virtue of Suffolk's own submission, not by any judicial authority, he banished him the kingdom during five years. The lords remained silent; but soon after entered a protest, that this sentence should nowise infringe their privileges; and that, if Suffolk had insisted upon his right, and had not voluntarily submitted to the king's commands, he was entitled to a trial by his peers in parliament.

It was easy to see, that these irregular proceedings were meant to favour Suffolk, and that, as he still possessed the queen's confidence, he would, on the first favourable opportunity, be restored to his country, and be reinstated in his former power and credit. But Suffolk, convinced that his life was not safe in England, hastened to obey the sentence; and, on the 3rd of April, embarked at Ipswich for the continent; but he soon found that the rancour of his enemies was too inveterate to suffer him to escape so easily. The vessel in which he sailed was soon overtaken by a ship, called Nicholas of the Tower, employed for the purpose by the duke of Exeter, to whom it belonged, and boarded by the captain, who seized Suffolk, and conducted him to Dover, where his head was struck off with a rusty sword on the side of a cock boat, and his body thrown into the sea (s). No inquiry was made after the actors and accomplices in this atrocious deed of violence.

The duke of Somerset succeeded to Suffolk's power in the ministry, and credit with the queen; and as he was the person under whose government the French provinces had been lost, the public, who always judge by the event, soon made him equally the object of their animosity and hatred. The duke of York was absent in Ireland during all these transactions; and however it might be suspected that his partizans had excited and supported the prosecution against Suffolk, no immediate ground of complaint could, on that account, lie against him. But there happened, soon after, an incident which roused the jealousy of the court, and discovered to them the extreme danger to which they were exposed from the pretensions of that popular prince.

The humours of the people, set afloat by the parliamentary impeachment, and by the fall of so great a favourite as Suffolk, broke out in various commotions, which being generally begun without a plan, and pursued without an object, were soon suppressed; but there arose one in Kent, which wore a more serious aspect, and promised to be attended with more dangerous consequences. A man of low condition, one John Cade, a native of Ireland, a man possessed of great art, and of a daring spirit, who had been obliged to fly into France for crimes, observed, on his return to England, the discontents of the people; and he laid on them the foundation of projects which were at first crowned with surprising success. He took the name of John Mortimer; intending, as is supposed, to pass himself for a son of that Sir John Mortimer who had been sentenced to death by parliament, and executed, in the beginning of this reign, without any trial or evidence, merely upon an indictment of high treason given in against him (t). On the first mention of that popular name, the common people of Kent, to the number of twenty thousand, flocked to Cade's standard, and he excited their zeal by publishing complaints against the numerous abuses in government, and demanding a redress of grievances. Having assembled a sufficient force, he directed his march towards the metropolis; and, on the first of June, 1450, encamped on Blackheath. From thence the insurgents sent two manifestos, addressed to the king and council; one of which was entitled, "The Complaints of the Commons of Kent, and Causes of the Assembly on the Blackheath;" and the other, "The Requests of the Captain of the great Assembly in Kent." These addresses appear to have been penned with great art: they contained the warmest professions of attachment to the person and government of Henry; and only requested that the king would afford them speedy redress as to certain grievances, which they specified; inflict exemplary punishment on those evil counsellors, by whose treachery and misconduct the people had been oppressed at home, and the national honour irreparably tarnished by continental losses; and, finally, that he would receive into his confidence the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, with other patriotic nobles, whose principles were known to be friendly to the constitution. Independent of the indignity of receiving the dictates of a plebeian, the council were swayed by the more powerful motives of self-preservation to reject the addresses of Cade, as a compliance with them would have occasioned the immediate destruction of many of their own members. Henry therefore determined to attempt the reduction of the insurgents to obedience by force; and an army of fifteen thousand men was forthwith raised for that purpose. On the approach of the troops, Cade and his followers retired to the vicinity of Sevenoaks; and their retreat bearing the appearance of a flight, the king's army returned to London, after a detachment had been sent in pursuit of the fugitives, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, who soon overtook them, when an action ensued, in which Stafford and his brother were slain, and his troops entirely routed. Elated with this success, they returned, on the 29th of June, to their former station on Blackheath, where they were joined by many persons of rank and fortune. They still continued to preserve the same political moderation which had hitherto marked their proceedings; and, having by this means augmented the number of their adherents, and even impressed the soldiers with favourable ideas of their intentions, they reduced the king to the necessity of adopting conciliating measures. The archbishop of Canterbury, and the duke of Buckingham, were accordingly dispatched to confer with Cade, who treated them with becoming respect, though he displayed great firmness, positively refusing to disband his followers till the grievances complained of in his addresses were effectually remedied. On the return of these noblemen, Henry deemed it prudent so far to comply with the requests of the insurgents as to commit lord Say and Seale, the high treasurer, who was most noxious to them, to prison; and, thinking the metropolis no longer a place of safety, since the army was not to be relied on, he retired with his court to the castle of Kenilworth. The day after his departure, Cade entered the city; and seizing lord Say and Seale, together with his son-in-law, Sir James Cromer, sheriff of Kent, immediately caused them to be beheaded, without any form of trial. During some days the insurgents observed the most rigid discipline; but the temptation of acquiring wealth, without labour or difficulty, proved too powerful to be resisted for any length of time. Some opulent houses were plundered; and the pillage would doubtless have become general, but for the spirit of the citizens, who attacked the depredators with great vigour, and driving them from the city, shut the gates upon them. The next morning Cade made an attempt to force an entrance; but, after a bloody conflict, he was obliged to desist; and his followers were so dispirited by this unexpected check, that a well-timed proclamation of pardon, under the great seal, issued by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, who with the chancellor had taken refuge in the Tower, produced a surprizing effect. In a few hours the insurgents were dispersed; and of that army, which had lately appeared so formidable, Cade was almost the only man remaining; when, finding himself thus deserted, he embarked the fruits of his depredations on board a barge that was bound to Rochester, and repaired to the castle of Queenborough; but, being refused admittance, he dismissed the few followers who still adhered to him, and retired for safety to the wilds of Kent. A reward of one thousand marks to whoever should produce him, dead or alive, soon caused the discovery of his retreat: he was found by Alexander Eden, a Kentish gentleman; who, meeting with resistance, put him to death. His body was brought to London, where it was beheaded; his head being placed on London Bridge, and his quarters being sent to different places in Kent. Many of his followers were also capitally punished for their rebellion. Thus ended an insurrection which, under a leader of more consequence, might have produced an important revolution.

Although tranquillity was apparently restored, yet the minds of the people continued in a state of agitation: the same subjects of discontent remained; no change of ministry, no reformation of abuses, no impeachment of evil counsellors, had taken place; and the queen, more intent on projects of revenge than on measures of conciliation, increased the popular discontents, which she greatly heightened by her favours to the duke of Somerset, whom we have before mentioned as succeeding the duke of Suffolk in her esteem and confidence.

A weak prince, seated on the throne of England, had never failed, how gentle soever and innocent, to be infected with faction, discontent, rebellion, and civil commotions; and as the incapacity of Henry appeared every day in a fuller light, these dangerous consequences began, from past experience, to be universally and justly apprehended. Men also of unquiet spirits, no longer employed in foreign wars, whence they were now excluded by the situation of the neighbouring states, were the more likely to excite intestine disorders, and, by their emulation, rivalship, and animosities, to tear the bowels of their native country. But though these causes alone were sufficient to breed confusion, there concurred another circumstance of the most dangerous nature. At this critical conjuncture, a pretender to the crown appeared: the title itself of the weak prince, who enjoyed the name of sovereignty, was disputed; and the English were now to pay the severe, though late, penalty of their turbulence under Richard II. and of their levity in violating, without any necessity or just reason, the lineal succession of their monarchs.

All the males of the house of Mortimer were extinct; but Anne, the sister of the last earl of Marche, having espoused the earl of Cambridge, who was beheaded in the reign of Henry V. had transmitted her latent, but not yet forgotten, claim to her son, Richard duke of York. This prince, thus descended by his mother from Philippa, only daughter of the duke of Clarence, second son of Edward III. stood plainly in the order of succession before the king, who derived his descent from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, third son of that monarch; and that claim could not, in many respects, have fallen into more dangerous hands than those of the duke of York. Richard was a man of valour and abilities, of a prudent conduct and mild dispositions: he had enjoyed an opportunity of displaying these virtues in his government of France: and though recalled from that command by the intrigues and superior interest of the duke of Somerset, he had been sent to suppress a rebellion in Ireland; had succeeded much better in that enterprize than his rival in the defence of Normandy; and had even been able to attach to his person and family the whole Irish nation, whom he was sent to subdue (u). In the right of his father, he bore the rank of first prince of the blood; and by this station he gave a lustre to his title derived from the family of Mortimer, which, though of great nobility, was equalled by other families in the kingdom, and had been eclipsed by the royal descent of the house of Lancaster. He possessed an immense fortune from the union of so many successions; those of Cambridge and York on the one hand, with those of Mortimer on the other: which last inheritance had before been augmented by an union of the estates of Clarence and Ulster with the patrimonial possessions of the family of Marche. The alliances too of Richard, by his marrying the daughter of Ralph Nevil earl of Westmoreland, had widely extended his interest among the nobility, and had procured him many connexions in that formidable order.

The family of Nevil was, perhaps, at this time, the most potent, both from their opulent possessions, and from the characters characters of the men, that has ever appeared in England. For, besides the earl of Westmoreland, and the lords Latimer, Falconbridge, and Abergavenny; the earls of Salisbury and Warwick were of that family, and were of themselves, on many accounts, the greatest noblemen in the kingdom. The earl of Salisbury, brother-in-law to the duke of York, was the eldest son by a second marriage of the earl of Westmoreland; and inherited by his wife, daughter and heir of Montacute earl of Salisbury, killed before Orleans, the possessions and title of that great family. His eldest son Richard, had married Anne, the daughter and heir of Beauchamp earl of Warwick, who died governor of France; and by this alliance he enjoyed the possessions, and had acquired the title, of that other family, one of the most opulent, most ancient, and most illustrious in England. The personal qualities also of these two earls, especially of Warwick, enhanced the splendour of their nobility, and increased their influence over the people. This latter nobleman, commonly known, from the subsequent events, by the appellation of the King-maker, had distinguished himself by his gallantry in the field, by the hospitality of his table, by the magnificence, and still more by the generosity of his expence, and by the spirited and bold manner which attended him in all his actions. The undesigning frankness and openness of his character rendered his conquest over men's affections the more certain and infallible: his presents were regarded as sure testimonies of esteem and friendship; and his professions as the overflowings of his genuine sentiments. No less than thirty thousand persons are said to have daily lived at his board in the different manors and castles which he possessed in England: the military men, allured by his munificence and hospitality, as well as by his bravery, were zealously attached to his interests: the people in general bore him an unlimited affection: his numerous retainers were more devoted to his will, than to the prince or to the laws; and he was the greatest, as well as the last, of those mighty barons, who formerly overawed the crown, and rendered the people incapable of any regular system of civil government (v).

But the duke of York, besides the family of Nevil, had many other partizans among the great nobility. Courtney earl of Devonshire, descended from a very noble family of that name in France, was attached to his interests: Moubray duke of Norfolk had, from his hereditary hatred to the family of Lancaster, embraced the same party; and the discontents, which universally prevailed among the people, rendered every combination of the great the more dangerous to the established government. The duke of York had been greatly disgusted with the treatment which he had experienced from the queen and her party, who had taken from him the regency of France, and neglected no opportunity to hurt his feelings and mortify his pride; and the recent elevation of his chief rival, the duke of Somerset, to the first place in the ministry, could not fail to increase his disgust. The ministry, conscious that he had just subject for discontent, imagined, that it was the duke of York who had secretly instigated the insurrection under John Cade, in order to try, by that experiment, the dispositions of the people towards his title and family (w): and as the event had so far succeeded to his wish, the ruling party had greater reason than ever to apprehend the future consequences of his pretensions. At the same time they heard that he intended to return from Ireland; and fearing that he meant to bring an armed force along with him, they issued orders, in the king's name, for opposing him, and for debarring him entrance into England (x). But the duke refuted his enemies by coming attended with no more than his ordinary retinue: the precautions of the ministers served only to shew him their jealousy and malignity against him: he was sensible that his title, by being dangerous to the king, was also become dangerous to himself: he now saw the impossibility of remaining in his present situation, and the necessity of proceeding forward in support of his claim. His partizans, therefore, were instructed to maintain, in all companies, his right by succession, and by the established laws and constitution of the kingdom: these questions became every day more and more the subject of conversation: the minds of men were insensibly sharpened against each other by disputes, before they came to more dangerous extremities: and various topics were pleaded in support of the pretensions of each party.

The partizans of the house of Lancaster maintained, that though the elevation of Henry IV. might at first be deemed somewhat irregular, and could not be justified by any of those principles on which that prince chose to rest his title, it was yet founded on general consent, was a national act, and was derived from the voluntary approbation of a free people, who, being loosened from their allegiance by the tyranny of the preceding government, were moved by gratitude, as well as by a sense of public interest, to entrust the sceptre into the hands of their deliverer: that, even if that establishment were allowed to be at first invalid, it had acquired solidity by time; the only principle which ultimately gives authority to government, and removes those scruples which the irregular steps attending almost all revolutions naturally excite in the minds of the people: that the right of succession was a rule admitted only for general good, and for the maintenance of public order; and could never be pleaded to the overthrow of national tranquillity, and the subversion of regular establishments: that the principles of liberty, no less than the maxims of internal peace, were injured by these pretensions of the house of York; and if so many reiterated acts of the legislature, by which the crown was entailed on the present family, were now invalidated, the English must be considered, not as a free people, who could dispose of their own government, but as a troop of slaves, who were implicitly transmitted by succession from one master to another: that the nation was bound to allegiance under the house of Lancaster by moral, no less than by political duty; and were they to infringe those numerous oaths of fealty which they had sworn to Henry and his predecessors, they would thenceforth be thrown loose from all principles, and it would be found difficult ever after to fix and restrain them; that the duke of York himself had frequently done homage to the king as his lawful sovereign, and had thereby, in the most solemn manner, made an indirect renunciation of those claims with which he now dares to disturb the tranquillity of the public: that, even though the violation of the rights of blood, made on the deposition of Richard, was perhaps rash and imprudent, it was too late to remedy the mischief; the danger of a disputed succession could no longer be obviated; the people, accustomed to a government, which, in the hands of the late king, had been so inglorious, and in that of his predecessor so prudent and salutary, would still ascribe a right to it; by causing multiplied disorders, and by shedding an inundation of blood, the advantage would only be obtained of exchanging one pretender for another; and the house of York itself, if established on the throne, would, on the first opportunity, be exposed to those revolutions which the giddy spirit excited in the people gave so much reason to apprehend: and that though the present king enjoyed not the shining talents which had appeared in his father and grandfather, he might still have a son who should be endowed with them; he is himself eminent for the most harmless and inoffensive manners; and if active princes were dethroned on pretence of tyranny, and indolent ones on the plea of incapacity, there would thenceforth remain, in the constitution, no established rule of obedience to any sovereign.

These strong topics, in favour of the house of Lancaster, were opposed by arguments no less convincing on the side of the house of York. The partizans of this latter family asserted, that the maintenance of order in the succession of princes, far from doing injury to the people, or invalidating their fundamental title to good government, was established only for the purposes of government, and served to prevent those numberless confusions which must ensue, if no rule were followed but the uncertain and disputed views of present convenience and advantage: that the same maxims which ensured public peace, were also salutary to national liberty; the privileges of the people could only be maintained by the observance of laws; and if no account were made of the rights of the sovereign, it could less be expected that any regard would be paid to the property and freedom of the subject: that it was never too late to correct any pernicious precedent; an unjust establishment, the longer it stood, acquired the greater sanction and validity; it could, with more appearance of reason, be pleaded as an authority for a like injustice; and the maintenance of it, instead of favouring public tranquillity, tended to disjoint every principle by which human society was supported: that usurpers would be happy, if their present possession of power, or their continuance for a few years, could convert them into legal princes; but nothing would be more miserable than the people, if all restraints on violence and ambition were thus removed, and a full scope given to the attempts of every turbulent innovator: that time, indeed, might bestow solidity on a government whose first foundations were the most infirm; but it required both a long course of time to produce this effect, and the total extinction of those claimants, whose title was built on the original principles of the constitution; that the deposition of Richard II. and the advancement of Henry IV. were not deliberate national acts, but the result of the levity and violence of the people, and proceeded from those very defects in human nature, which the establishment of political society, and of an order in succession, was calculated to prevent: that the subsequent entails of the crown were a continuance of the same violence and usurpation; they were not ratified by the legislature, since the consent of the rightful king was still wanting; and the acquiescence, first of the family of Mortimer, then of the family of York, proceeded from present necessity, and implied no renunciation of their pretensions: that the restoration of the true order of succession could not be considered as a change which familiarised the people to revolutions; but as the correction of a former abuse, which had itself encouraged the giddy spirit of innovations, rebellion, and disobedience: and that, as the original title of Lancaster stood only in the person of Henry IV. on present convenience, even this principle, unjustifiable as it was, when not supported by laws, and warranted by the constitution, had now entirely gone over to the other side; nor was there any comparison between a prince utterly unable to sway the sceptre, and blindly governed by corrupt ministers, or by an imperious queen, engaged in foreign and hostile interests; and a prince of mature years, of approved wisdom and experience, a native of England, the lineal heir of the crown, who, by his restoration, would replace every thing on ancient foundations.

So many plausible arguments could be urged on both sides of this interesting question, that the people were extremely divided in their sentiments; and though the noblemen of greatest power and influence seem to have espoused the party of York, the opposite cause had the advantage of being supported by the present laws, and by the immediate possession of royal authority. There were also many great noblemen in the Lancastrian party, who balanced the power of their antagonists, and kept the nation in suspense between them. The earl of Northumberland adhered to the present government: the earl of Westmoreland, in spite of his connections with the duke of York, and with the family of Nevil, of which he was the head, was brought over to the same party; and the whole north of England, the most warlike part of the kingdom, was, by means of these two potent noblemen, warmly engaged in the interests of Lancaster. Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset, and his brother Henry, were great supports of that cause; as were also Henry Holland duke of Exeter, Stafford duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, the lords Clifford, Dudley, Scales, Audley, and other noblemen.

While the kingdom was in this situation, it might naturally be expected that so many turbulent barons, possessed of so much independent authority, would immediately have flown to arms, and have decided the quarrel, after their usual manner, by war and battle, under the standards of the contending princes. But there still were many causes which retarded these desperate extremities, and made a long train of faction, intrigue, and cabal, precede the military operations. By the gradual progress of arts in England, as well as in other parts of Europe, the people were now become of some importance; laws were beginning to be respected by them; and it was requisite, by various pretences, previously to reconcile their minds to the overthrow of such an ancient establishment as that of the house of Lancaster, ere their concurrence could reasonably be expected. The duke of York himself, the new claimant, was of a moderate and cautious character, an enemy to violence, and disposed to trust rather to time and policy, than to sanguinary measures, for the success of his pretensions. The very imbecility itself of Henry, tended to keep the factions in suspense, and make them stand long in awe of each other: it rendered the Lancastrian party unable to strike any violent blow against their enemies; it encouraged the Yorkists to hope, that, after banishing the king's ministers, and getting possession of his person, they might gradually undermine his authority, and be able, without the perilous expedient of a civil war, to change the succession by parliamentary and legal authority.

The dispositions which appeared in a parliament assembled on the 6th of November, 1451, soon after the arrival of the duke of York from Ireland, favoured these expectations of his partizans, and both discovered an unusual boldness in the commons, and were a proof of the general discontents which prevailed against the administration. The lower house, without any previous enquiry or examination, without alledging any other ground of complaint than common fame, ventured to present a petition against the duke of Somerset, the duchess of Suffolk, the bishop of Chester, sir John Sutton, lord Dudley, and several others of inferior rank; and they prayed the king to remove them for ever from his person and councils, and to prohibit them from approaching within twelve miles of the court (y). This was a violent attack, somewhat arbitrary, and supported but by few precedents, against the ministry; yet the king durst not openly oppose it: he replied, that, except the lords, he would banish all the others from court during a year, unless he should have occasion for their service in suppressing any rebellion. At the same time he rejected a bill which had passed both houses, for attainting the late duke of Suffolk, and which, in several of its clauses, discovered a very general prejudice against the measures of the court.

Encouraged by these symptoms the duke of York, soon after his arrival retired into Wales, by the advice of his friends; and, as the people of that country were firmly attached to the family of Mortimer, he found but little difficulty in raising an army of ten thousand men to support such pretensions as he might think it prudent to advance. While he was collecting these troops, he sent the following petition to the king; possibly in the hope that a refusal to comply with its contents might afford a plausive pretext for his subsequent conduct, the real motives of which he was anxious for the present to conceal.

"Please it, your Highness, tenderly to consider the great grudging and rumour that is universally in this your realm, of that justice is not duly ministered to such as trespass and offend against your laws; and in special of them that (have) been endited of treason, and others being openly noised of the same: wherefore, for great inconvenience that have fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter, in your said realm, which God defend, unless by your Highness provision convenable be made for due reformation and punishment in this behalf. Wherefore I, your humble subject and liege man, Richard duke of York, willing, as affectionately as I can, and desiring surety and prosperity of your royal person, and welfare of this your noble realm, counsel and advertise your Excellence, for the conservation of good tranquillity and peaceable rule among all true subjects, for to ordain and provide that due justice be had against all such that (have) been so endited, or openly so noised; wherein I offer, and will put myself in devout (duty) for to execute your commandments in these premises, such offenders and redress of the said misrulers, to my might and power. And for the hasty execution hereof, like it your Highness to address your letters of privy seal and writs, to your officers and ministers, to do, take, and arrest, all such persons so noised or endited, of what estate, degree, or condition soever they be, and them to commit to your Tower of London, or to other your prisons, and there to abide without bail or mainprize unto the time that they be utterly tried and cleared, after the course of your laws."

The answer to this petition was such as could afford no possible excuse for violent proceedings: it expressed an approbation of the plan proposed by the duke; assured him of the speedy adoption of the measures he had recommended; and informed him, that he should be one of the commissioners for enforcing a due execution of them. The duke of York, however, having raised an army of ten thousand men, resolved it should not remain in a state of inactivity; and, as so specious a display of moderation, in men who had recently evinced a quite different disposition, might very reasonably be suspected of insincerity, he determined to be on his guard, and to prepare pare himself either to repel or commence attacks, as necessity should require or policy dictate. With this view he directed his march towards the metropolis in February, 1452, not imagining that the king had a sufficient army on foot to oppose his progress: but in this he was mistaken; for the queen, with that foresight and activity by which all her actions were distinguished, had discovered his intentions by his retreat into Wales, (where he raised his forces,) and had since been busily occupied in levying troops to prevent their completion, though none of the officers who were employed in raising them were informed of their destination. The duke therefore had not proceeded far, before he received intelligence of the king's approach at the head of a superior army. Surprized at the information, he deemed it imprudent to risk an engagement, until he should be better supplied with a pretext for fighting against his sovereign. The assurances of his partizans, (among whom were John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; Richard Nevil, earl of Salisbury; and his son Thomas Courtney, earl of Devonshire; and Edward Brook, lord Cobham;) had led them to believe that his cause was popular, and would be espoused by the people in general; and that the citizens of London, in particular, were anxious to afford him protection and support. These considerations induced him to change his road, and by forced marches to proceed with all possible expedition to the metropolis, where he accordingly arrived before the king. But here he experienced a severe mortification: the gates of the city were shut against him, and the inhabitants pertinaciously refused him admittance. In this emergency, he was obliged to pass the Thames at Kingston; and proceeding to Burntheath, near Dartford in Kent, there fixed his camp. The king likewise crossed the river at London Bridge, and encamped on Blackheath.

While the two armies lay in this situation, Henry sent two prelates, and as many barons, to the duke of York, to demand the reason of his hostile proceedings: to which the duke replied, that when the duke of Somerset should be confined in order to take his trial, he would immediately disband his army, and proffer his respects to the king as his most humble and loyal subject. The same motives which had induced a compliance with the prayer of his former petition, now led the ministry to adopt a similar conduct with regard to his present request. The duke of Somerset was put under arrest; but, when the duke of York had in consequence thereof disbanded his army, and repaired to the king's tent to pay his respects to Henry, and to repeat those accusations of criminal misconduct which he had already preferred against Somerset, he was greatly surprized to see that minister step from behind the curtain, and assert his innocence. His indignation, however, at the base manner in which he had been betrayed into the hands of his enemies, rose superior to his astonishment; and, in obedience to its dictates, he boldly accused Somerset of high treason: a charge which that minister retorted with equal firmness; maintaining, that the duke's ambition had made him forgetful of the allegiance which he owed to Henry, and led him to aspire to the throne by the deposition of his sovereign. After a short altercation, the duke of York retired; but he had no sooner left the tent than he was arrested, and conducted to London, on the first of March.

This was a rash and imprudent step in the ministry, as it plainly evinced the nature of their inclinations, and at the same time betrayed their inability to gratify them: for, though the duke of Somerset, incited by the powerful motives of hatred and revenge, strenuously exhorted the king to the adoption of violent measures, there were very potent considerations to impel the prosecution of a different system. The duke was extremely popular; and the queen, and her party, who greatly dreaded the resentment of the people, were afraid of exciting their indignation by putting him to death. A report moreover prevailed, that the young earl of Marche was advancing, at the head of a very powerful army, to effect the liberation of his father. The queen now, fearful of the consequences of the advance of the earl's army, and knowing that the duke of York had many friends about Henry's court, resolved to set him at liberty; but, previous to his enlargement, she not only compelled him to renew his oath of allegiance to Henry, but led him to St. Paul's, where he was obliged solemnly to swear upon the cross that he would never, on any pretence, take up arms against the king. He was then permitted to retire to his castle of Wigmore, in the county of Hereford, on the borders of Wales; where he remained some time in great privacy, waiting the arrival of a propitious opportunity to violate an oath which had been extorted from him by force.

While the duke of York lived in this retreat, there happened an incident, which, by encreasing the public discontents, proved favourable to his pretensions. Several Gascon lords, affectionate to the English government, and disgusted at the new dominion of the French, came to London, and offered to return to their allegiance under Henry (z). The earl of Shrewsbury, and his son lord Lisle, with a body of eight thousand men, were sent over to support them. Bourdeaux opened its gates to him: he made himself master of Fronsac, Castillon, and some other places. This last place surrendered on the 23rd of April, 1451. Affairs began to wear a favourable aspect: but, as Charles hastened to resist this dangerous invasion, the fortunes of the English were soon reversed: Shrewsbury, a venerable warrior, above fourscore years of age, fell in battle; his conquests were lost; Bourdeaux was again obliged to submit to the French king (a); and all hopes of recovering the province of Gascony were for ever extinguished.

Though the English might deem themselves happy to be fairly rid of distant dominions which were of no use to them, and which they never could defend against the growing power of France, they expressed great discontent on the occasion; and they threw all the blame on the ministry, who had not been able to effect impossibilities. While they were in this disposition, the queen's delivery of a son, at Westminster, on the 13th of October, 1453, who received the name of Edward, was deemed no joyful incident; and as it removed all hopes of the peaceable succession of the duke of York, who was otherwise, in the right of his father, and, by the laws enacted since the accession of the house of Lancaster, next heir to the crown, it had rather a tendency to inflame the quarrel between the parties. But the duke was incapable of violent counsels; and even when no visible obstacle lay between him and the throne, he was prevented by his own scruples from mounting it. Henry, always unfit to exercise the government, fell at this time into a lingering disorder, which deprived him of his memory, and so far impaired the other faculties of his mind, that it rendered him incapable of maintaining even the appearance of royalty. This latter occurrence proved an unfortunate circumstance to the queen and the ministry; who, deprived of the sanction and support of the sovereign, and held in detestation by the people, began to tremble, not only for their places, but even for their personal safety. To augment their consternation, the duke of York issued from his retreat, and, accompanied by the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, repaired with a numerous retinue to London. The arrival of these noblemen, thus formidably attended, convinced the queen and her ministers that resistance would be vain; and that to allay the present foment, which must otherwise end in a civil war, it would be prudent to grant them a voluntary admission into the council. It will easily be supposed that men, possessed of such extensive power, would not fail to exert it for the ruin of their enemies. Somerset, the chief object of their resentment, was arrested in the queen's presence, and committed to the Tower; and the duke of York was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom, with authority to hold a parliament, which was accordingly assembled on the 14th of February, 1454, by a commission under the great seal, dated the preceding day. When the parliament met, an accusation of high treason was preferred against Somerset, and strenuously supported by the duke of Norfolk, who demanded that commissioners should be appointed to examine the various articles contained in the charge. It does not, however, appear, that his request was complied with, or that the peers themselves entered into the merits of the accusation.

During these transactions, John Kemp, archbishop of Canterbury, and chancellor of the kingdom, having died, (in December, 1453,) the house of lords sent a deputation to the king, then residing at Windsor, to know his pleasure as to the appointment of persons to succeed him in those important offices. The deputies, on their return, reported to the house, on the 25th of March, 1454, "That they had been to wait on the king at Windsor; and, after three successive repairs thither, and earnest solicitations to speak with the king, they could by no means have an answer, or token of answer, being only told the king was sick." Henry's incapacity for discharging the ordinary duties of government being now fully established, the appointment pointment of a chief magistrate naturally devolved on the people, from whom his authority could be derived. Their representatives, therefore—the parliament—proceeded to the formation of an act, by which Richard duke of York was appointed to fill that important station, under the title of Protector of the kingdom, but only during the king's pleasure, or until prince Edward should arrive at years of discretion; and this act was confirmed by a commission under the great seal, on the 2nd of April. At the same time the vacant chancellorship was given to the earl of Salisbury. On the 9th of June following, Edward, the infant son of Henry, was created prince of Wales, and, on the 28th of July, the Protector obtained for himself a grant of the government of Calais—hitherto enjoyed by the duke of Somerset—for seven years, with an exclusive power to appoint all his officers.

During his protectorship, the duke of York spared no pains to acquire that popularity which he had found to be so essential to the support of his power: he made a progress into the northern counties; and, by his affability and attention to his inferiors, acquired many friends. His reign, however, was destined to be short, for the king having sufficiently recovered his health, about Christmas, 1454, to resume, or at least to superintend, the management of public affairs, the duke's commission of Protector was of course revoked, and the government returned into its former channel. It was natural that the queen and her party, who had been openly attacked by the Protector, should now exert that power which Providence had once more placed in their hands to counteract the effects of the duke's enmity, and to revoke those grants which he had obtained for himself or others, with the view of confirming his own power. This was certainly a measure which not only policy, but common prudence, required; for, had the duke been permitted to retain any post which could tend to a formidable extension of his influence, their own situation must have been perilous and precarious, and the executive government weak and indecisive. The king was therefore advised to release Somerset; which he did on the 5th of February, 1455; and restored him to that distinguished place which he had ever enjoyed in his confidence. The duke of York was deprived of the government of Calais; which he had caused to be taken from Somerset; and becoming enraged at the loss of his power, he deemed his degradation an insult that could justify the most violent proceedings: he immediately retired from court; and, for the gratification of his revenge and ambition, determined on measures which ultimately involved the nation in all the horrors of a civil war.

The situation of the duke of York was now very different to what it was when he first took up arms. The ministry had then openly avowed their enmity, and had actually commenced hostilities against him; whereas at present his fears for his personal safety could not be very powerful, as he had been suffered for a considerable time to enjoy his repose, nor had the queen and her party ever once attempted to interrupt his tranquillity during his retreat at Wigmore; and his popularity was now sufficiently great to screen him from the effects of their resentment, had they been ever so desirous to exert it. His conduct seems to have been influenced by motives of revenge and ambition; the former of which prompted him to inflict an exemplary punishment on those who had impeded the gratification of the latter; though in the pursuit of it he certainly displayed a mixture of vigour and caution—eager in the search of power, but almost afraid to grasp it when within his reach.

When the duke of York retired from court, he repaired to Wales, and there raised a considerable army, chiefly composed of his friends and vassals; and, being joined by the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the lord Cobham, and several other noblemen of his party, he began his march towards the metropolis. As they proceeded, they gave out that their sole motive for taking up arms was to correct the abuses which prevailed in the government, and to exact the punishment of those ministers who had caused and supported them. When they had advanced as far as Royston, they sent a dutiful letter to the king, containing strong professions of zeal and attachment; which letter was, by some means or other kept from the king's sight; and he, having also raised an army, quitted the metropolis on the 21st of May, accompanied by the dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the earls of Northumberland, Stafford, Dorset, Pembroke, and many other powerful nobles of the Lancastrian party; and, encamping the first night at Walford, proceeded the next morning to the town of St. Alban's, of which they took possession. On the evening of the same day, the duke of York's army encamped at Keyfield, in the vicinity of that place; and, on the morning of the 23rd of May, 1455, the duke of York, having received an insulting answer to a message which he sent to the king, drew up his troops in order of battle, and prepared for the attack. He accordingly assaulted the town in several places; but the vigour of the defence was for some time equal to the impetuosity of the attack. At length, however, the earl of Warwick having forced an entrance into one of the streets, gave admittance to the duke of York; when a fierce and bloody conflict ensued, in which the royalists were defeated. The duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, lord Clifford, and William Cotton, vice-chancellor to Henry, were among the slain. The king himself was wounded; together with the duke of Buckingham and his son, the earl of Stafford, the earl of Dorset, lord Sudly, and many other persons of distinction. The earl of Stafford's wounds proved mortal, and he died a few days after the battle. The number of men killed on the side of the royalists are said to have amounted to five thousand. Hearing that the king was wounded, and had taken refuge in the house of a tanner, the duke of York hastened thither with the earl of Salisbury; and, falling on his knees, made the strongest professions of loyalty, and declared himself ready to obey the commands of his sovereign. The fears of Henry being somewhat dispelled by this pacific declaration, he entreated him to put an immediate stop to the carnage, and to recall his troops from the pursuit: a request which was instantly complied with. The day after the battle he conducted the king to London.

This was the first blood spilt in that fatal quarrel, which was not finished in less than a course of thirty years, which was signalized by twelve pitched battles, which opened a scene of extraordinary fierceness and cruelty, is computed to have cost the lives of eighty princes of the blood, and almost entirely annihilated the ancient nobility of England. The strong attachments which, at that time, men of the same kindred bore to each other, and the vindictive spirit, which was considered as a point of honour, rendered the great families implacable in their resentments, and every moment widened the breach between the parties. Yet affairs did not immediately proceed to the last extremities: the nation was kept some time in suspense: the vigour and spirit of queen Margaret, supporting her small power, still proved a balance to the great authority of Richard, which was checked by his irresolute temper. A parliament, which was assembled on the 9th of July, plainly discovered, by the contrariety of their proceedings, the contrariety of the motives by which they were actuated. They granted the Yorkists a general indemnity; and they restored the protectorship to the duke, who, in accepting it, still persevered in all his former precautions: but at the same time they renewed their oaths of fealty to Henry, and fixed the continuance of the protectorship to the majority of his son Edward, who had been vested with the usual dignities of prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. The only decisive act, passed in this parliament, was a full resumption of all the grants which had been made since the death of Henry V. and which had reduced the crown to great poverty.

It was not found difficult to wrest power from hands so little tenacious as those of the duke of York. Margaret, availing herself of that prince's absence, produced her husband before the house of lords, on the 25th of February, 1456, the day after the parliament had assembled; and, as his state of health permitted him at that time to act his part with some tolerable decency, he declared his intentions of resuming the government, and of putting an end to Richard's authority. This measure being unexpected, was not opposed by the contrary party: the house of lords, who were many of them disgusted with the late act of resumption, assented to Henry's proposal; and the king was declared to be reinstated in sovereign authority. Even the duke of York acquiesced in this irregular act of the peers; and no disturbance ensued. But that prince's claim to the crown was too well known, and the steps which he had taken to promote it, were too evident, even to allow sincere trust and confidence to have place between the parties. The court retired to Coventry, and invited the duke of York and the earls of Salisbury and Warwick to attend the king's person. When they were on the road they received intelligence that designs were formed against against their liberties and lives. They immediately separated themselves: Richard withdrew to his castle of Wigmore: Salisbury to Middleham in Yorkshire; and Warwick to his government of Calais, which had been committed to him after the battle of St. Albans, and which, as it gave him the command of the only regular military force maintained by England, was of the utmost importance in the present juncture. Still, men of peaceable dispositions, and among the rest, Henry Bourchier, archbishop of Canterbury, thought it not too late to interpose with their good offices, in order to prevent that effusion of blood with which the kingdom was threatened; and the awe in which each party stood of the other, rendered the mediation for some time successful. It was agreed that all the great leaders on both sides should meet in London, and be solemnly reconciled. The duke of York and his partizans came thither with numerous retinues, and took up their quarters near each other for mutual security. The leaders of the Lancastrian party used the same precaution. Sir Godfrey Bolleyn, the mayor, at the head of five thousand men, kept a strict watch night and day; and was extremely vigilant in maintaining peace between them (b). Terms were adjusted, which removed not the ground of difference. This was on the 24th of March, 1458. An outward reconciliation only was procured: and in order to notify this accord to the whole people, a solemn procession to St. Paul's was appointed, where the duke of York led queen Margaret, and a leader of one party marched hand in hand with a leader of the opposite. The less real cordiality prevailed, the more were the exterior demonstrations of amity redoubled. But it was evident, that a contest for a crown could not thus be peaceably accommodated; that each party watched only for an opportunity of subverting the other; and that much blood must yet be spilt, ere the nation could be restored to perfect tranquillity, or enjoy a settled and established government.

Even the smallest accident, without any formed design, was sufficient, in the present disposition of men's minds, to dissolve the seeming harmony between the parties; and had the intentions of the leaders been ever so amicable, they would have found it difficult to restrain the animosity of their followers. One of the king's retinue insulted one of the earl of Warwick's: their companions on both sides took part in the quarrel: a fierce combat ensued: the earl apprehended his life to be aimed at: he fled to his government of Calais; and both parties, in every county of England, openly made preparations for deciding the contest by war and arms.

The earl of Salisbury, marching with a body of five thousand men to join the duke of York, was overtaken, at Blore-heath, on the borders of Staffordshire, by lord Audley, who commanded an army amounting to double that number; and a small rivulet with steep banks ran between the armies. Salisbury here supplied his defect in numbers by stratagem; a refinement, of which there occur few instances in the English civil wars, where a headlong courage, more than military conduct, is commonly to be remarked. He feigned a retreat, and allured Audley to follow him with precipitation; but when the van of the royal army had passed the brook, Salisbury suddenly turned upon them; and partly by the surprize, partly by the division, of the enemies' forces, put this body to rout: the example of flight was followed by the rest of the army; and Salisbury, obtaining a complete victory, reached the general rendezvous of the Yorkists at Ludlow (c). This battle was fought on Sunday morning, the 23rd of September, 1459.

The earl of Warwick brought over to this rendezvous a choice body of veterans from Calais, on whom it was thought the fortune of the war would much depend; but this reinforcement occasioned, in the issue, the immediate ruin of the duke of York's party. When the royal army approached, and a general action was every hour expected, Sir Andrew Trollop, who commanded the veterans, deserted to the king in the night-time; and the Yorkists were so dismayed at this instance of treachery, which made every man suspicious of his fellow, that they separated next day without striking a stroke (d): the duke fled to Ireland: the earl of Warwick, attended by many of the other leaders, escaped to Calais: where his great popularity among all orders of men, particularly among the military, soon drew to him partizans, and rendered his power very formidable. The friends of the house of York, in England, kept themselves every where in readiness to rise on the first summons from their leaders.

After meeting with some successes at sea, Warwick landed in Kent, with the earl of Salisbury, and the earl of Marche, eldest son of the duke of York; and being met by the primate, by lord Cobham, and other persons of distinction, he marched, amidst the acclamations of the people to London. The city immediately opened its gates to him; and his troops encreasing on every day's march, he soon found himself in a condition to face the royal army, which hastened from Coventry to attack him. The battle was fought at Northampton, on the 10th of July, 1460; and was soon decided against the royalists by the infidelity of lord Grey of Ruthin, who, commanding Henry's van, deserted to the enemy during the heat of action, and spread a consternation through the troops. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, the lords Beaumont and Egremont, and Sir William Lucie, were killed in the action or pursuit: the slaughter fell chiefly on the gentry and nobility: the common people were spared by orders of the earls of Warwick and Marche (e). Henry himself, that empty shadow of a king, was again taken prisoner: and as the innocence and simplicity of his manners, which bore the appearance of sanctity had procured him the tender regard of the people (f), the earl of Warwick and other leaders took care to distinguish themselves by their respectful demeanour towards him.

A parliament was summoned in the king's name, to meet at Westminster, on the 7th of October following; where the duke soon after appeared from Ireland. This prince had never hitherto advanced openly any claim to the crown: he had only complained of ill ministers, and demanded a redress of grievances; and even, in the present crisis, when the parliament was surrounded by his victorious army, he shewed such a regard to law and liberty, as is unusual during the prevalence of a party in any civil dissensions; and was still less to be expected in those violent and licentious times. He advanced towards the throne; and being met by the archbishop of Canterbury, who asked him, whether he had yet paid his respects to the king? he replied, that he knew of none to whom he owed that title. He then stood near the throne (g), and addressing himself to the house of peers, he gave them a deduction of his title by descent, mentioned the cruelties by which the house of Lancaster had paved their way to sovereign power, insisted on the calamities which had attended the government of Henry, exhorted them to return into the right path, by doing justice to the lineal successor, and thus pleaded his cause before them as his natural and legal judges (h). This cool and moderate manner of demanding a crown, intimidated his friends, and encouraged his enemies: the lords remained in suspense (i); and no one ventured to utter a word on the occasion. Richard, who had probably expected that the peers would have invited him to place himself on the throne, was much disappointed at their silence; but desiring them to reflect on what he had proposed to them, he departed the house. The peers took the matter into consideration, with as much tranquillity as if it had been a common subject of debate: they desired the assistance of some considerable members among the commons in their deliberations: they heard, in several successive days, the reasons alleged for the duke of York: they even ventured to propose objections to his claim, founded on former entails of the crown, and on the oaths of fealty sworn to the house of Lancaster (k): they also observed, that, as Richard had all along borne the arms of York, not those of Clarence, he could not claim as successor to the latter family; and after receiving answers to these objections, derived from the violence and power by which the house of Lancaster supported their present possession of the crown, they proceeded to give a decision. Their sentence was calculated, as far as possible, to please both parties: they declared the title of the duke of York to be certain and indefeasible; but in consideration that Henry had enjoyed the crown, without dispute or controversy, during the course of thirty-eight years, they determined, that he should continue to possess the title and dignity during the remainder of his life; that the administration of the government, meanwhile, should remain with Richard; that he should be acknowledged the true and lawful heir of the monarchy; that every one should swear to maintain his succession, and it should be treason to attempt his life; and that all former settlements of the crown, in this and the two last reigns, should be abrogated and rescinded (l). The duke acquiesced in this decision: Henry himself, being a prisoner, could not oppose it: even if he had enjoyed his liberty, he would not probably have felt any violent reluctance against it; and the act thus passed with the unanimous consent of the whole legislative body. Though the mildness of this compromise is chiefly to be ascribed to the moderation of the duke of York, it is impossible not to observe in those transactions visible marks of a higher regard to law, and of a more fixed authority, enjoyed by parliament, than has appeared in any former period of English history.

It is probable that the duke, without employing either menaces or violence, could have obtained from the commons a settlement more consistent and uniform; but as many, if not all the members of the upper house had received grants, concessions, or dignities, during the last sixty years, when the house of Lancaster was possessed of the government, they were afraid of invalidating their own titles by too sudden and violent an overthrow of that family; and in thus temporising between the parties, they fixed the throne on a basis upon which it could not possibly stand. The duke, apprehending his chief danger to arise from the genius and spirit of queen Margaret, sought a pretence for banishing her the kingdom: he sent her, in the king's name, a summons to come immediately to London; intending, in case of her disobedience, to proceed to extremities against her. But the queen needed not this menace to excite her activity in defending the rights of her family. After the defeat at Northampton, she fled with her infant son to Durham, thence to Scotland; but soon returning, she applied to the northern barons, and employed every motive to procure their assistance. Her affability, insinuation, and address, qualities in which she excelled; her caresses, her promises, wrought a powerful effect on every one who approached her: the admiration of her great qualities was succeeded by compassion towards her helpless condition: the nobility of that quarter, who regarded themselves as the most warlike in the kingdom, were moved by indignation to find the southern barons pretend to dispose of the crown and settle the government; and that they might allure the people to their standard, they promised them the spoils of all the provinces on the other side of the Trent. By these means, the queen had collected an army of twenty thousand men, with a celerity which was neither expected by her friends, nor apprehended by her enemies.

The duke of York, informed of her appearance in the north, hastened thither with a body of five thousand men, to suppress, as he imagined, the beginnings of an insurrection; when, on his arrival at Wakefield, he found himself much outnumbered by the enemy. He threw himself into Sandal castle, which was situated in the neighbourhood; and he was advised by the earl of Salisbury, and other prudent counsellors, to remain in that fortress, till his son, the earl of Marche, who was levying forces in the borders of Wales, could advance to his assistance (m). But the duke, though deficient in political courage, possessed personal bravery in an eminent degree; and notwithstanding his wisdom and experience, he thought that he should be for ever disgraced, if, by taking shelter behind walls, he should for a moment resign the victory to a woman. He descended into the plain, on the 24th of December, and offered battle to the enemy, which was instantly accepted. The great inequality of numbers was sufficient alone to decide the victory; but the queen, by sending a detachment, who fell on the back of the duke's army, rendered her advantage still more certain and undisputed. The duke himself was killed in the action; and as his body was found among the slain, the head was cut off by Margaret's orders, and fixed on the gates of York, with a paper crown upon it, in derision of his pretended title. His son, the earl of Rutland, a youth of seventeen, was brought to lord Clifford; and that barbarian, in revenge of his father's death, who had perished in the battle of St. Albans, murdered in cool blood, and with his own hands, this innocent prince, whose exterior figure, as well as other accomplishments, are represented by historians as extremely amiable. The earl of Salisbury was wounded and taken prisoner, and immediately beheaded, with several other persons of distinction, by martial law at Pomfret (n). There fell near three thousand Yorkists in this battle: the duke himself was greatly and justly lamented by his own party; a prince who merited a better fate, and whose errors in conduct proceeded entirely from such qualities, as render him the more an object of esteem and affection. He perished in the fiftieth year of his age, and left three sons, Edward, George, and Richard, with three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Margaret.

The queen, after this important victory, divided her army. She sent the smaller division, under Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, uterine brother to the king, against Edward, the new duke of York. She herself marched with the larger division towards London, where the earl of Warwick had been left with the command of the Yorkists. Pembroke was defeated by Edward at Mortimer's Cross in Herefordshire, with the loss of near four thousand men, on the 2nd of February, 1461. His army was dispersed; he himself escaped by flight; but his father, Sir Owen Tudor, was taken prisoner, and immediately beheaded by Edward's orders. This barbarous practice, being once begun, was continued by both parties, from a spirit of revenge, which covered itself under the pretence of retaliation (o).

Margaret compensated this defeat by a victory which she obtained over the earl of Warwick. That nobleman, on the approach of the Lancastrians, led out his army, reinforced by a strong body of the Londoners, who were affectionate to his cause; and he gave battle to the queen at St. Albans, on the 17th of February. While the armies were warmly engaged, Lovelace, who commanded a considerable body of the Yorkists, withdrew from the combat; and this treacherous conduct, of which there are many instances in those civil wars, decided the victory in favour of the queen. About two thousand three hundred of the vanquished perished in the battle and pursuit; and the person of the king fell again into the hands of his own party. This weak prince was sure to be almost equally a prisoner whichever faction had the keeping of him; and scarcely any more decorum was observed by one than by the other, in their method of treating him. Lord Bonville, to whose care he had been entrusted by the Yorkists, remained with him after the defeat, on assurances of pardon given him by Henry: but Margaret, regardless of her husband's promise, immediately ordered the head of that nobleman to be struck off by the executioner (p). Sir Thomas Kiriel, a brave warrior, who had signalized himself in the French wars, was treated in the same manner.

The queen made no great advantage of this victory: young Edward advanced upon her from the other side; and the earl of Warwick, collecting the remains of his army, and having joined the duke, Edward was soon in a condition of giving her battle with superior forces. She was sensible of her danger, while she lay between the enemy and the city of London; and she found it necessary to retreat with her army to the north (q). Edward entered the capital on the 28th of February, 1461, amidst the acclamations of the citizens, and immediately opened a new scene to his party. This prince, in the bloom of youth, remarkable for the beauty of his person, for his bravery, his activity, his affability, and every popular quality, found himself so much possessed of public favour, that, elated with the spirit natural to his age, he resolved no longer to confine himself within those narrow limits which his father had prescribed to himself, and which had been found by experience so prejudical to his cause. He determined to assume the name and dignity of king; to insist openly on his claim; and thenceforth to treat the opposite party as traitors and rebels to his lawful authority. But as a national consent, or the appearance of it, still seemed, notwithstanding his plausible title, requisite to precede this bold measure, and as the assembling of a parliament might occasion too many delays, and be attended with other inconveniencies, he ventured to proceed in a less regular manner, and to put it out of the power of his enemies to throw obstacles in the way of his elevation. His army was ordered to assemble in St. John's Fields, on Sunday, the 2nd of March; great numbers of people surrounded them; an harangue was pronounced to this mixed multitude, setting forth the title of Edward, and inveighing against the tyranny and usurpation of the rival family; and the people were then asked, whether they would have Henry of Lancaster for king? They unanimously exclaimed against the proposal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, eldest son of the late duke of York? They expressed their assent by loud and joyful acclamations (r). A great number of bishops, lords, magistrates, and other persons of distinction, were next assembled at Baynard's castle, who ratified the popular election; and the new king was on the subsequent day (March 3) proclaimed in London, by the title of Edward IV (s).

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI. a monarch who, while in his cradle, had been proclaimed king both of France and England, and who began his life with the most splendid prospects that any prince in Europe had ever enjoyed. The revolution was unhappy for his people, as it was the source of civil wars; but was almost entirely indifferent to Henry himself, who was utterly incapable of exercising his authority, and who, provided he personally met with good usage, was equally easy, as he was equally enslaved in the hands of his enemies and of his friends. His weakness and his disputed title were the chief causes of the public calamities: but whether his queen, and his ministers, were not also guilty of some great abuses of power, it is not easy for us at this distance of time to determine; there remain no proofs on record of any considerable violation of the laws, except in the assassination of the duke of Gloucester, which was a private crime, formed no precedent, and was but too much of a piece with the usual ferocity and cruelty of the times.

The most remarkable law, which passed in this reign, was that for the due election of members of parliament in counties. After the fall of the feudal system, the distinction of tenures was in some measure lost; and every freeholder, as well those who held of mesne lords, as the immediate tenants of the crown, were by degrees admitted to give their votes at elections. This innovation (for such it may probably be esteemed) was indirectly confirmed by a law of Henry IV. (t), which gave right to such a multitude of electors as was the occasion of great disorder. In the eighth and tenth of this king, therefore, laws were enacted, limiting the electors to such as possessed forty shillings a year in land, free from all burdens, within the county (u). This sum was equivalent to near twenty pounds a year of our present money; and it were to be wished, that the spirit, as well as letter of this law, had been maintained.

The preamble of the statute is remarkable: "Whereas the elections of knights have of late, in many counties of England, been made by outrages and excessive numbers of people, many of them of small substance and value, yet pretending to a right equal to the best knights and esquires; whereby manslaughters, riots, batteries, and divisions among the gentlemen and other people of the same counties, shall very likely rise and be, unless due remedy be provided in this behalf, &c." We may learn from these expressions, what an important matter the election of a member of parliament was now become in England: that assembly was beginning in this period to assume great authority: the commons had it much in their power to enforce the execution of the laws; and if they failed of success in this particular, it proceeded less from any exorbitant power of the crown, than from the licentious spirit of the aristocracy, and perhaps from the rude education of the age, and their own ignorance of the advantages resulting from a regular administration of justice.

When the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, fled the kingdom upon the desertion of their troops, a parliament was summoned at Coventry in 1460, by which they were all attainted. This parliament seems to have been very irregularly constituted, and scarcely deserves the name: insomuch, that an act passed in it, "that all such knights of any county, as were returned by virtue of the king's letters, without any other election, should be valid, and that no sheriff should, for returning them, incur the penalty of the statute of Henry IV (v)." All the acts of that parliament were afterwards reversed; "because it was unlawfully summoned, and the knights and barons not duly chosen (w)."

The parliaments in this reign, instead of relaxing their vigilance against the usurpations of the court of Rome, endeavoured to enforce the former statutes enacted for that purpose. The commons petitioned, that no foreigner should be capable of any church preferment, and that the patron might be allowed to present anew upon the non-residence of any incumbent (x): but the king eluded these petitions. Pope Martin wrote him a severe letter against the Statute of Provisors; which he calls an abominable law, that would infallibly damn every one who observed it (y). The cardinal of Winchester was legate; and as he was also a kind of prime minister, and immensely rich from the profits of his clerical dignities, the parliament became jealous lest he should extend the papal power; and they protested, that the cardinal should absent himself in all affairs and councils of the king, whenever the pope or see of Rome was touched upon (z).

Permission was given by parliament to export corn when it was at low prices; wheat at six shillings and eight pence a quarter, money of that age; barley at three shillings and four pence (a). It appears from these prices, that corn still remained at near half its present value; though other commodities were much cheaper. The inland commerce of corn was also opened in the eighteenth of the king, by allowing any collector of the customs to grant a licence for carrying it from one county to another (b). The same year a kind of navigation act was proposed with regard to all places within the Streights; but the king rejected it (c).

The first instance of debt contracted upon parliamentary security occurs in this reign (d). The commencement of this pernicious practice deserves to be noted; a practice the more likely to become pernicious, the more a nation advances in opulence and credit. The ruinous effects of it are now become but too apparent, and threaten the very existence of the nation (e).

In the year 1440 the noble art of printing was invented: It was first practised by John Guttemburgh at Mentz in Germany, and was afterwards brought into England by Laurence Coster, a German workman.

CHAP. IV.

The History of the English Church, from the Accession of Henry IV. in 1399, till the Advancement of Edward IV. on the Dethronement of Henry VI. in 1461.

IT is a melancholy task to delineate the ecclesiastical transactions of this period, as they offer nothing to the attention of posterity but a continued series of papal disputes and clerical persecutions. The genial sun of Toleration had not yet diffused its beneficent beams over the realm of England; it had not yet illumined with its rays the minds of those Christian votaries, whose practices were so hostile to the precepts of Christianity, as to bespeak a total ignorance of the doctrine they professed.

Henry the Fourth, conscious that the favour and support of the clergy would be necessary to sanction his usurpation, dispatched the earl of Northumberland to a convocation of the province of Canterbury, assembled in the chapter house of St. Paul's, on the 5th of October, 1399, with a message well calculated to conciliate their esteem. "I am not come," said the earl, "like the commissioners of former kings, to demand your money; but to assure you that my royal master will never exact any money from you, except in cases of the most urgent necessity. I am come earnestly to entreat your prayers for the king and his dominions; to promise that he will protect the clergy in all their privileges and immunities; and afford them assistance, to the utmost of his power, in the extermination of Heretics." The first of these promises was, however, quickly forgotten, for no monarch ever made such frequent demands of money from the clergy as Henry the Fourth, after he was firmly established on the throne; but unfortunately too punctual in his observance of the last.

Thomas Arundel, who was now restored to the primacy, continued to display, in his persecution of the followers of Wickliffe, that implacable spirit of intolerance and cruelty which had distinguished him during his enjoyment of the archbishopric of York. Countenanced by the king, this bigotted priest, seconded by his clergy, made an application to parliament which assembled at Westminster in the first year of the fifteenth century, beseeching them that they would adopt some effectual measure to restrain the preaching of heretical doctrines, the publication of heretical books, and the teaching of errors and heresies in the schools, which were practised by numerous persons without the licence of a bishop. In consequence of this representation, a law was enacted by parliament, or rather by the king and peers, authorizing the bishops to imprison all persons suspected of heresy, and to try them in the Spiritual Court; and, should they prove either obstinate or relapsed heretics, the spiritual judge was directed to call in the sheriff of the county, or the chief magistrate of the town, to be present when the sentence of condemnation was pronounced; and immediately to deliver the person condemned to the secular magistrate, who was to cause him to be burnt to death in some elevated place, in the sight of the people; a sanguinary and tyrannical act, equally disgraceful to the clergy who applied for it, the parliament which passed it, and the monarch who sanctioned it with his consent!

No sooner was this law promulgated, than the primate hastened to put it in force, by bringing William Sautre, rector of St. Osithe's, London, to trial, for heresy, before the convocation of the province of Canterbury, at St. Paul's cathedral. The principal accusations against this minister were, his refusal to worship the Cross, and his denial of the doctrine of Transubstantiation. The unhappy victim, in order to avoid the painful death with which he was threatened, endeavoured to explain away the most offensive part of his opinions. He consented to pay an inferior, vicarious kind of worship, to the Cross, on account of Him who died upon it; but that was not deemed sufficient. He acknowledged the real presence of Christ in the Sacrament; and admitted that, after the words of consecration were pronounced, the bread became the true spiritual Bread of Life. He underwent a long examination on that subject, on the 19th of February, 1401; but, when the primate urged him to profess his belief, "That, after the consecration, the substance of the bread and wine no longer remained, but was converted into the substance of the body and blood of Christ; which were as really and truly in their proper substance and nature in the Sacrament, as they were in the womb of the Virgin Mary, as they hung upon the cross, as they lay in the grave, and as they now resided in heaven!"—he stood aghast; and, after some hesitation declared, "That, whatever might be the consequence, he could neither understand nor believe that doctrine." This declaration induced the primate to pronounce him an obstinate heretic: in consequence of which, he was degraded from all the clerical orders with which he had been invested; and delivered to the mayor and sheriffs of London, with an hypocritical request that they would use him kindly; the literal meaning of which was, that they should inflict on him the penalties of the late abominable law against heretics. He was accordingly burnt in Smithfield; and his name holds a conspicuous place in the annals of English Martyrdom. He is said to have been the first person who suffered death for an adherence to those doctrines which are now maintained by all the Protestant churches (f).

The next object of the bigotted primate's persecution was William Thorp, a clergyman of more learning and erudition than was possessed by most of his brethren in that dark age. An avowed advocate for the doctrines of Wickliffe, he had been frequently imprisoned for daring to support them; but had hitherto been fortunate enough to escape the infliction of a severe punishment. He was, however, apprehended in the year 1407, and underwent a long examination on the first of August, of which he wrote a very distinct account; from whence it appears, that he was so much superior to his judges in the arts of disputation, that they were under the necessity of having alternate recourse to threats and promises, in order to extort either a confession or a recantation of his heretical opinions. The immaculate primate, who, it seems, was much addicted to profane swearing, declared, with many oaths, "That he would pursue him and all his sect so closely, that he would not leave one slip in the land."—Another of his judges told him, that if he did not recant, he should be cursed, degraded, burnt, and damned; and a third proposed to wash away his crimes by throwing him into the sea. But these forcible arguments did not prove convincive to Mr. Thorpe; nor were they able to shake his fortitude. The primate therefore committed him to a loathsome prison at Saltwood, the horrors of which had overcome the constancy of many other Lollards; and it is most probable he died there, since no farther mention is made of him in history.

On the 19th of January, 1409, the primate held a convention of the prelates and clergy of his province, in which thirteen canons, or constitutions, were enacted for the extirpation of the Lollards, by the infliction of wholesome severities on its propagators and professors. In the preface to these canons, to dispute any of the doctrines, or disobey any of the decrees promulgated by the pope—"who carried the keys of eternal life and death; who was the vicegerent, not of a mere man, but of the true God on earth; and to whom God had committed the government of the kingdom of heaven;"—is declared to be the most horrid of all crimes. This language, it must be confessed, was rather bold, especially at a time when there were two popes, who had been consigning each other to eternal damnation, and who were both declared contumacious heretics by the council of Pisa that same year.

Shortly after the publication of these canons, the bishop of Worcester apprehended Thomas Badby, a taylor, in his diocese; whom, after his trial and conviction, he sent to the primate, with a copy of his sentence. The charges against Badby were similar to those which had been preferred against the rector of St. Osithe; only the taylor was farther accused of having pertinently observed, "That no priest was able to make the body of Christ." The primate assured him, that if he would renounce his errors, "he would gage his soul for him at the day of judgement." But Badby, proving inflexible, was sentenced to be burnt; and was accordingly conducted to Smithfield, on the first of March, 1410, where he was placed in a large tub, surrounded with dry wood, and fastened to a stake with iron chains. Before the fire was kindled, the prince of Wales rode up to the pile, and earnestly intreated him to save himself from a painful death by the renunciation of his heretical doctrines, promising to reward his compliance with a competent annuity for life. He thanked the prince for his offer in the warmest terms of gratitude; but declared that he could not consent to preserve his life by renouncing opinions which he firmly believed to be founded in truth. The fire was then applied to the wood; and the violence of the flames extorting from the wretched sufferer an invocation of mercy, the prince, thinking his constancy was overcome by the pain, again approached him; and, commanding the fire to be quenched, renewed his entreaties; but in vain: Badby persevered in his adherence to the truth; the prince, exasperated at his pertinacity, left him to his fate, and the unhappy man was at length reduced to ashes.

The influence of archbishop Arundel and his brethren enabled them to defeat the schemes proposed by the commons, in the sixth and eleventh years of Henry the Fourth, for the seizure of the estates of the church. In the year 1409, the commons represented to the king, "That if he would please to take away the estates of the bishops, abbots, and priors, which only served to support them in luxury and superfluous pomp, the crown and kingdom would reap essential advantages, as they would enable the king to maintain fifteen earls, fifteen hundred knights, six thousand two hundred esquires, and one hundred hospitals." The king's rapacity would perhaps have induced him to take such a step, had not the instability of his throne deterred him from a measure which would have entailed on him the irreconcileable enmity of a formidable body of men, not yet sufficiently humbled to bear with tameness the loss of their possessions. The petition of the commons was therefore rejected; and the peers presented one of an opposite tendency, praying the king to protect the patrimony of the church, and to inflict an exemplary punishment on all such as should strive to convince the people of the legality of taking it away.

(f) The public execution of so respectable a man as Sautre struck terror into the Lollards, and induced many of the disciples of Wickliffe to conceal their sentiments, in order to preserve their lives. Others, less cautious, were apprehended; but, being brought to trial, chose rather to submit to the censure of hypocrisy than the pains of martyrdom: and, though the same opinions secretly prevailed in many parts of the kingdom, some years elapsed before any person could be found sufficiently courageous to maintain them at the risk of personal safety.

Some fruitless efforts were made about this time, by the church of England, in conjunction with other churches, to terminate the schism in the papacy, which had now continued about thirty years. The two rival popes, Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. were both deposed by the council of Pisa, on the 5th of June, 1407, as manifest schismatics and heretics, who had been guilty of contumacy and perjury; and, on the 19th of the same month, the council raised Peter Philaret, a Greek, to the papacy, who assumed the appellation of Alexander the Fifth, and was acknowledged as pope by the English church. But the elevation of Alexander, far from terminating the schism, only increased the number of disputants; so that, for several years, the church had no less than three infallible heads, and the kingdom of heaven three keepers of its keys, who did not scruple to brand each other with the most opprobrious epithets; which a reverend author has gravely observed, did not afford the worst proof of their infallibility. Alexander died on the 3rd of May, 1410; and Balthesar Cosse, a Neapolitan, was appointed to succeed him, and assumed the appellation of John the twenty-third. The new pope, however, was deposed by the council of Constance, in 1415, for heresy, contumacy, perjury, simony, adultery, incest; and a thousand frauds. Benedict the Thirteenth was deposed likewise; and Gregory the Twelfth having resigned, the chair of St. Peter was considered as vacant; and Odon de Colonna, cardinal-deacon of St. George's, was appointed to supply the vacancy, and took the name of Martin the Fifth. But as Benedict refused to submit to the sentence of deposition which had been pronounced against him, and as he had even a successor, named Clement the Seventh, the rancorous disputes between these pretended vicegerents of the God of Peace were not finally decided till 1429, after the schism had continued more than half a century; during which time it had involved the Christian world in confusion, and put all the European states to incredible trouble and expence.

As the doctrines of Wickliffe were more prevalent in the university of Oxford than in any other part of the kingdom, the primate repaired thither with a splendid retinue, in 1411, in order, by his presence, to effect their suppression. But, on his approach to that city, he was met by the chancellor and proctors, who told him that, if he came for the mere gratification of his curiosity, he should experience a reception suitable to his rank; but that, if he came as their visitor, they could not admit him, being exempted by several papal bulls from episcopal visitation. The primate greatly incensed at this repulse, appealed to the king; who, after hearing both parties, pronounced a definitive sentence, on the 9th of February, 1412, against the university. In consequence of this decision, Arundel ordered the university to appoint twelve of its most learned and orthodox members to examine the doctrines of Wickliffe, and to extract from them such opinions as should appear to be founded in heresy or error. Twelve were accordingly chosen, and no less than two hundred and sixty-seven opinions of that description were the fruits of their labours. These being sent to the primate were by him transmitted to the pope, with a pious and christian-like request, not only to condemn the opinions, but to authorize him to take the body of Wickliffe out of the grave, and put it on a dunghill, that it might be trampled on by all good Christians. The pope, however, being endued with more humanity than the prelate, contented himself with granting the former part of his request, and issued his prohibition to disturb the ashes of Wickliffe.

The death of Henry the Fourth, in 1413, rather tended to increase than diminish the reigning spirit of persecution: the first proof of which was the apprehension and imprisonment of lord Cobham. When that nobleman was strenuously urged by the primate to a recantation of his principles, he made no answer; but, drawing out a paper from his bosom, he read it, as the confession of his faith, and then delivered it to Arundel. The following is a copy of that curious paper, extracted from Wilkins's Councils, which may fairly be supposed to contain the leading sentiments of the most intelligent Lollards, though they are expressed with that caution which the spirit of the times rendered necessary:

"I John Oldcastell, knyght, lord of Cobham, wole, that all Cristeyn men wyte and understond, that I clepe Allmighty God in to wytness, that it hath ben, now ys, and ever, with the help of God, shall ben myn entent, and my wylle, to beleve feythfully and fully all the Sacramentis that evyr God ordeyned to be do in holy churche: and, moreover, for to declare me in these four peyntes. I beleve that the most worschipfull sacrament of the auter is Cristes body in forme of bred, the same body that was born of the blessyd Virgyne our Lady Seint Marye, don on the cross, deed and buryed the thrydde day, ros fro deth to lyf; the wych body is now glorified in hevene. Also, as for the sacrament of penance, I beleve that it is nedfull to every man that shall be saved, to forsake synne, and to due penance for synne bifore doon, wyth trewe confession, very contrition, and duhe satisfaction, as Goddes law lymiteth and techeth, and ellys may not be saved. Whych penance I desir all men to do. And of as Ymages I understonde, that thei be not of beleve, but that thei were ordeyned syth the bileve was zew of Crist be sufferaunce of the churche, to be kalenders to lewd men, to represent and brynge to mynde the passion of our Lord Jhesu Crist, and martirdom and good lyving of other seyntes; and that who so it be that doth the worschipe to dede ymages, that is duhe to God, or putteth seych hope or trust in affeccion in one more than in an other, he doth in that the grete sin of mawmentrie. Also I suppose this fully, that every man in this erthe is a pilgrime towarde blyss, or toward peyne; and that he that knoweth not, ne wole not knowe, ne kepe the hole commandementes of God in lyving here, al be it, that he gos on pylgrimage to all the world, an he dy so, he shall be dampned; and he that knowyth the holy comandementys of God, and kepeth hem hys end, he shall be saved, tho he nevir in hys lyve go on pilgrymage, as men use now, to Cantirbury or to Rome, or to any other place."

The primate, after consultation with the other prelates and divines, told lord Cobham, that several articles of his creed wore a good and catholic appearance; but that it was not sufficiently explicit on either of the four points of the eucharist, confession, images, and pilgrimages. For his instructiou therefore he gave him the following paper, containing the doctrine of the church on these important subjects, which he allowed him two days to consider:

"The fayth and the determination of holy churche touchyng the blissfull sacraments of the autur, is this:—That after the sacramentall wordes ben sayde by a prest in hys masse, the material bred that was bifore is turned into Cristis verray body; and the material wyn that was bifore, is turned into Cristis verray blode; and there laweth in the auter no material brede, ne material wyn, the wych wer ther byfore the seying of the sacramental wordes.—How lyve ye this article?—Crist ordeyned Seint Peter the Apostell to ben his vicarie here in erthe; whos see ys the churche of Rome, ordnying and grauntyng the same power that he ga to Petir shuld succede to all Petirs successours; the wych we callyn now popes of Rome; by whos power in churches particuler special ben ordeyned prelates, as archbyshoppes, byshoppes, curates, and other degrees, to whom Cristen men oughte to obeye after the lawes of the churche of Rome. This is determination of holy churche.—How fele ye this articull?—Holy churche hath determined, that it is needful to a Cristyn man to goo a pilgrymach to holy places, and there specially to worship holy reliqes of seyntes, apostelys, martyrs, confessours, and all seyntes approved be churche of Rome. This is determination of holy churche.—How fele ye this articule?"

Such was the ridiculous doctrine maintained by our bigotted ancestors in the fifteenth century, and to which every one was obliged to subscribe, under the pain of being burnt to ashes. The refusal of lord Cobham to comply with these articles, with his conviction, escape, recapture, and execution (g), we have already noticed in the reign of Henry the Fifth.

The primate, whose sanguinary disposition rendered him a disgrace even to the religion he professed, died on the 19th of February, 1415; and was succeeded by Henry Chicheley, bishop of St. David's, who was elected by the monks of Canterbury on the king's recommendation. The pope, however, disannulled the election, as an infringement on his right of nomination: but, being fearful to disoblige disoblige the king at a time when he had powerful enemies to combat in Italy, he again nominated Chicheley to the primacy: who, on receiving his pall, took an oath of canonical obedience, which rendered him more the subject of the pontiff than of his natural sovereign.

(g) Lord Cobham was hung up by an iron chain, in an horizontal posture, and, a fire being kindled under him, he was gradually burnt to death.

The new primate soon shewed himself endued with the same intolerant principles as his predecessor; and, by pursuing the same line of conduct, seemed determined to effect the total extermination of the unfortunate Lollards. Henry the Fifth gave orders to the university of Oxford to draw up a catalogue of those abuses in the church which stood in most need of reformation, that he might lay them before the council of Constance. This catalogue consists of forty-six articles; and though it was composed by ecclesiastics who were doubtless careful not to exaggerate the vices of their fraternity, exhibits a most odious picture of the manners of the clergy in this period, particularly of their avarice and debauchery. The twenty-seventh article contains the following charge: "It is notorious that when a Pagan or Jew, abandoning his former errors, desires to be purified in the holy font of baptism, all his temporal goods are confiscated to the church; which, it is believed, prevents the conversion of many Jews. It would be pious and meritorious in the council to remedy this abuse: for, when Philip baptized the eunuch, he did not seize his chariot, or any other goods which he had with him at his baptism." The thirty-eighth article represents, "That the carnal and debauched lives of the clergy in our days, and their public fornications---which are never punished, except secretly, by a trifling fine---set an evil example before others: it would therefore be a work of holiness, and would greatly contribute to the reformation of the church, if priests of every rank and order, who were public fornicators, were obliged to abstain from the celebration of mass for a limited time."

But the necessary work of reformation was, unfortunately, less attended to than the invidious task of persecution. In the year 1415, one John Claydon, a furrier in London, was burnt in Smithfield for the enormous crime of having listened to the reading of heretical books: and in the following year, an inquisition was set on foot by the primate; who compelled three respectable inhabitants in every parish to take a solemn oath, that they would make diligent enquiry if there were any Lollards, or any suspected of favouring that sect, or any who had English books in their houses, or had any thing singular in their way of living, within their parish; and to send an account in writing to the archdeacon, twice every year, of their names, and of every circumstance relating to them. In consequence of this despotic regulation, which established inquisitors, and consequently tyrants, in every village throughout the kingdoms, numerous prosecutions, founded in envy or malevolence, were commenced; and the devoted followers of Wickliffe were exposed to the most cruel insults and oppressions.

In the years 1426 and 1427, Pope Martin the Fifth, who had obtained full possession of the chair of St. Peter, directed various bulls to the primate, to the king, and to the parliament of England, concerning the statute of Præmunire, by which the Roman pontiffs were deprived of the power of disposing of English benefices at their pleasure. In these bulls he treated the archbishop with great asperity, bestowing on him the most opprobrious epithets, for having suffered a law, which he termed detestable, execrable, and abominable, to subsist so long. Nor did he display much greater delicacy in his addresses to the king and the parliament; telling them plainly, that he was constituted supreme head over them and the universal church by Christ himself; insinuating that, if they did not repeal that odious statute, they would incur the penalty of damnation; and promising, if they would abolish it, that he would exercise his authority with lenity and moderation. The commons, however, like men for once determined to judge for themselves in this age of bigotry and fanaticism, were neither intimidated by his laughable threats, nor allured by his empty promises: they therefore positively refused to comply with his requests, though strongly urged to it by the primate and other prelates of the kingdom. In the year 1428, this turbulent pontiff published a crusade against the Bohemians who had adopted the opinions of Wickliffe; and he promised the pardon of all their sins, and the happiness of heaven, (noble benediction!) to all such as should lose their lives in that meritorious expedition: this induced numbers of the English to engage in it, under the conduct of cardinal Beaufort, bishop of Winchester. These troops, however, to the number of about five thousand men, were not employed against the Bohemian Lollards, but were pressed by the duke of Bedford, then regent of France, and employed by him in the war which he was carrying on against Charles the Seventh, king of France.

Martin the Fifth was with great difficulty prevailed upon, or rather compelled, to summon a general council, in compliance with his own promise, and in submission to a decree of the council of Constance; and he appointed Julian, cardinal of St. Angelo, to preside in it in his name: but Martin died on the 20th of February, before the meeting of the council; and was succeeded by Gabriel Condolmicas, a Venetian, who assumed the title of Eugenius the Fourth, and confirmed the nomination of cardinal Julian to preside at the council, which met at Basil on the 19th of July, 1431. In the second session, February 15th, 1432, the council decreed, That a general council, when sitting, was supreme head of the church; to whose censure all persons, the pope himself not excepted, were subject; and that the sovereign pontiff could not dissolve a general council without the consent of its members. The pope, incensed at decrees which infringed on his authority, published a bull of dissolution; at which the members of the council were so much offended, that they threatened to depose him and appoint a successor to the papacy, (where was then the pope's infallibility?) if he did not immediately recall his bull. When affairs were in this confused state, the archbishop of Canterbury called a convocation of the prelates and clergy of his province on the 7th of November, 1433, and proposed the following questions to the representatives of the clergy in the Lower House: "Hath the pope power to dissolve a general council? Hath the council of Basil power to depose pope Eugenius? If that council depose pope Eugenius, and elect another, will you adhere to the former, or to the pope chosen by the council?" After some deliberation, the following answers were returned to these questions: "The pope hath power to dissolve a general council. The council hath not power to depose pope Eugenius. If that council depose pope Eugenius, we will still pay obedience to him as lawful pope."

The principal inducement with the English to embrace the part of the pontiff, in opposition to the council, appears to have been this: in the council of Constance, the members deliberated and voted by nations, so that the English had one entire vote; but, in the council of Basil, the members were divided into four deputations, each of which was composed of persons of different nations; and the English, being few in number, and thus dispersed, were lost, as it were, in the crowd; and their influence in the council was almost annihilated. Of this they sent home grievous complaints; which irritated the English clergy against the council, and made them eager to promote its dissolution.

The Bohemian Lollards having successfully repelled the unprovoked attacks of their fanatical opponents, reduced the council of Basil to the necessity of negociating with them. Their deputies proposed certain points of reformation; on the acceptance of which they promised, in the name of their countrymen, to return to the communion of the church. The negociation being made known to the archbishop of Canterbury, he put the following question to the same convocation which had decided on the pope's authority in the dissolution of general councils.---Whether any concessions, or what concessions, might be made by the council of Basil to the Bohemians, to bring them back to the communion of the church? To this the clergy answered, That if the Bohemians required the administration of the communion to the laity in both kinds; that all priests and deacons should have authority to preach; that temporal offices should not be enjoyed by the clergy; and that all notorious criminals, without distinction, should be punished---which were the four points the Bohemians were most strenuous to carry---they should be denied; and, in a word, that no concessions whatever should be made to such perverse heretics. So determined were the clergy of this period to persist in error and in vice, and so averse were they to every principle of reformation!

Chicheley, the primate, died on the 12th of April, 1443; and was succeeded in the primacy by John Stafford, bishop of Bath, son to the earl of Stafford. Soon after the elevation of this prelate, an application was made by the clergy to the parliament, relative to a violent contest which had arisen between the church and the common lawyers, on the meaning of a single word in the famous statute of Præmunire. In that statute it was enacted, "If any purchase, or pursue, or do to be purchased or pursued, in the court of Rome, or elsewhere, any such transactions, processes, and sentences of excommunications, bulls, instruments or any other things which touch the king, against him, his regality, or realm, &c." they shall incur the penalties mentioned in the statute. By the court of Rome, or elsewhere, the clergy pretended to understand the Roman court, whether it was held at Rome or any other place; whereas the lawyers interpreted the passage according to its evident meaning, viz. The court of Rome, or any other court: in consequence of which interpretation whenever any of the spiritual courts presumed to judge a cause that was not strictly within their jurisdiction, the courts at Westminster not only issued prohibitions, but punished the spiritual judges, as in the case of a Præmunire. The two archbishops therefore, with all their suffragans and clergy, presented a petition to parliament, in the year 1447, earnestly requesting an explanation of the word elsewhere, in the statute of the sixteenth of Richard the Second, agreeable to their own views. This modest petition contained many bitter complaints against the courts at Westminster, for assuming to themselves the sole right of interpreting acts of parliament; affirming that the spiritual courts were equally entitled, and much better qualified to exercise that privilege. The parliament, however, treated their representations with the contempt they so richly deserved.

Archbishop Stafford died in the year 1452, and was succeeded by John Kemp, archbishop of York, and cardinal of St. Balbina, who enjoyed the primacy only eighteen months; and on his death, Thomas Bourchier, bishop of Ely, and brother to the earl of Essex, was promoted to that important station. This prelate had soon occasion to exercise his archiepiscopal authority; for Reginald Pococke, bishop of Chichester, being accused of maintaining some heretical doctrines, the primate commanded him to appear before him at Lambeth on the 22nd of October, 1457; when, after various examinations, he was prevailed upon, by threats and promises, to subscribe his recantation. The accounts we have, as well of the trial as of the tenets of Pococke, are confused and contradictory; but the opinions which he acknowledged to have held, and which he now recanted, were these---"That we are not bound, by the necessity of faith, to believe that our Lord Jesus Christ, after his death, descended into hell. It is not necessary to salvation to believe in the holy catholic church. It is not necessary to salvation to believe the communion of saints. It is not necessary to salvation to affirm that the body of Christ is materially in the sacrament. The universal church may err in matters which pertain unto faith. It is not necessary to salvation to believe that that which every council doth universally ordain, approve, and determine, should necessarily, for the help of our faith, and the salvation of our souls, be approved and holden of all faithful Christians." Though the renunciation of these opinions saved the life of the prelate who had maintained them, it did not prevent the primate from depriving him of his see, and sentencing him to pass the remainder of his days in confinement.

THE LINE OF YORK.

COMPRIZING THE

REIGNS OF EDWARD IV. EDWARD V. AND RICHARD III.

EDWARD IV.

YOUNG Edward, now in his twentieth year, was of a temper well fitted to make his way through such a scene of war, havoc, and devastation, as must conduct him to the full possession of that crown, which he claimed from hereditary right, but which he had assumed from the tumultuary election alone of his own party. He was bold, active, enterprizing; and his hardness of heart and severity of character rendered him impregnable to all those movements of compassion, which might relax his vigour in the prosecution of the most bloody revenges upon his enemies. The very commencement of his reign gave symptoms of his sanguinary disposition. A tradesman of London, who kept shop at the sign of the Crown, having said that he would make his son heir to the Crown; this harmless pleasantry was interpreted to be spoken in derision of Edward's assumed title; and he was condemned and executed for the offence (h). Such an act of tyranny was a proper prelude to the events which ensued. The scaffold, as well as the field, incessantly streamed with the noblest blood of England, spilt in the quarrel between the two contending families, whose animosity was now become implacable. The people, divided in their affections, took different symbols of party: the partizans of the house of Lancaster chose the red rose as their mark of distinction; those of York were denominated from the white; and these civil wars were thus known, over Europe, by the name of the quarrel between the two roses.

The licence, in which queen Margaret had been obliged to indulge her troops, infused great terror and aversion into the city of London, and all the southern parts of the kingdom; and as she there expected an obstinate resistance, she had prudently retired northwards among her own partizans. The same licence, joined to the zeal of faction, soon brought great multitudes to her standard; and she was able, in a few days, to assemble an army, sixty thousand strong, in Yorkshire. The king and the earl of Warwick hastened with an army of fifty thousand men, to check her progress; and when they reached Pomfret they dispatched a body of troops, under the command of lord Fitzwalter, to secure the passage of Ferrybridge over the river Ayre, which lay between them and the enemy. Fitzwalter took possession of the post assigned him; but was not able to maintain it against lord Clifford, who attacked him with superior numbers. The Yorkists were chased back with great slaughter; and lord Fitzwalter himself was slain in the action (i). The earl of Warwick, dreading the consequences of this disaster, at a time when a decisive action was every hour expected, immediately ordered his horse to be brought him, which he stabbed before the whole army; and, kissing the hilt of his sword, swore that he was determined to share the fate of the meanest soldier (k). And, to shew the greater security, a proclamation was at the same time issued, giving to every one full liberty to retire; but menacing the severest punishment to those who should discover any symptoms of cowardice in the ensuing battle (l). Lord Falconbridge was sent to recover the post which had been lost: he passed the river some miles above Ferrybridge; and falling unexpectedly on lord Clifford, revenged the former disaster by the defeat of the party and the death of their leader (m).

The hostile armies met at Touton, a village about ten miles south-west of York, on the morning of Palm Sunday, the 29th of March, 1461; and a fierce and bloody battle ensued. While the Yorkists were advancing to the charge, there happened a great fall of snow, which driving full in the faces of their enemies, blinded them; and this advantage was improved by a stratagem of lord Falconbridge. That noblemen ordered some infantry to advance before the line, and, after having sent a volley of flight arrows, as they were called, amidst the enemy, immediately to retire. The Lancastrians, imagining that they were within reach of the opposite army, discharged all their arrows, which thus fell short of the Yorkists (n). After the quivers of the enemy were emptied, Edward advanced his line, and did execution with impunity on the dismayed Lancastrians: the bow, however, was soon laid aside, and the sword decided the combat, which ended in a total victory on the side of the Yorkists. Edward issued orders to give no quarter (o). The routed army was pursued to Tadcaster with great bloodshed and confusion; and above thirty-six thousand men are computed to have fallen in the battle and pursuit on the side of the Lancastrians (p). Among these were the earl of Westmoreland, and his brother, sir John Nevil, the earl of Northumberland, the lords Dacres and Welles, and sir Andrew Trollop (q). The earl of Devonshire, who was now engaged in Henry's party, was brought a prisoner to Edward; and was, soon after, beheaded by martial law at York. His head was fixed on a pole erected over the gate of that city; and the head of duke Richard, and that of the earl of Salisbury, were taken down, and buried with their bodies. Henry and Margaret had remained at York during the action; but learning the defeat of their army, and being sensible that no place in England could now afford them shelter, they fled with great precipitation into Scotland. They were accompanied by the duke of Exeter, who, though he had married Edward's sister, had taken part with the Lancastrians, and by Henry duke of Somerset, who had commanded the unfortunate battle of Touton, and who was the son of that nobleman killed in the first battle of St. Albans.

Notwithstanding the great animosity which prevailed between the kingdoms, Scotland had never exerted itself with vigour, to take advantage, either of the wars which England carried on with France, or of the civil commotions which arose between the contending families. James I. more laudably employed, in civilizing his subjects, and taming them to the salutary yoke of law and justice, avoided all hostilities with foreign nations; and though he seemed interested to maintain a balance between France and England, he gave no farther assistance to the former kingdom in its greatest distresses, than permitting, and perhaps encouraging, his subjects to enlist in the French service. After the murder of that excellent prince, the minority of his son and successor James II. and the distractions incident to it, retained the Scots in the same state of neutrality; and the superiority, visibly acquired by France, rendered it then unnecessary for her ally to interpose in her defence. But, when the quarrel commenced between the houses of York and Lancaster, and became absolutely incurable, but by the total extinction of one party; James, who had now risen to man's estate, was tempted to seize the opportunity, and he endeavoured to recover those places which the English had formerly conquered from his ancestors. He laid siege to the castle of Roxborough in 1460, and had provided himself with a small train of artillery for that enterprize: but his cannon were so ill framed, that one of them burst as he was firing it, and put an end to his life in the flower of his age. His son and successor, James III. was also a minor on his accession: the usual distractions ensued in the government: the queen-dowager, Anne of Gueldres, aspired to the regency: the family of Douglas opposed her pretensions: and queen Margaret, when she fled into Scotland, found there a people little less divided by faction, than those by whom she had been expelled. Though she pleaded the connexions between the royal family of Scotland and the house of Lancaster, by the young king's grandmother, a daughter of the earl of Somerset; she could engage the Scottish council to go no farther than to express their good wishes in her favour: but, on her offer to deliver to them immediately the important fortress of Berwick, and to contract her son in marriage with a sister of king James, she found a better reception; and the Scots promised the assistance of their arms to reinstate her family upon the throne (r). But, as the danger from that quarter seemed not very urgent to Edward, he did not pursue the fugitive king and queen into their retreat; but returned to London, where a parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster on the 6th of July, for settling the government; but owing to the unsettled state of the kingdom the parliament did not assemble till the 4th of November (s), when Edward found the good effects of his vigorous measure in assuming the crown, as well as of his victory at Touton, by which he had secured it: the parliament no longer hesitated between the two families, or proposed any of those ambiguous decisions, which could only serve to perpetuate and inflame the animosities of party. They recognized the title of Edward, by hereditary descent, through the family of Mortimer; and declared that he was king by right, from the death of his father, who had also the same lawful title; and that he was in possession of the crown from the day that he assumed the government, tendered to him by the acclamations of the people (t). They expressed their abhorrence of the usurpation and intrusion of the house of Lancaster, particularly that of the earl of Derby, otherwise called Henry IV. which, they said, had been attended with every kind of disorder, the murder of the sovereign and the oppression of the subject. They annulled every grant which had passed in those reigns; they reinstated the king in all the possessions which had belonged to the crown at the pretended deposition of Richard II. and though they confirmed judicial deeds, and the decrees of inferior courts, they reversed all attainders passed in any pretended parliament; particularly the attainder of the earl of Cambridge, the king's grandfather; as well as that of the earls of Salisbury and Gloucester, and of lord Lumley, who had been forfeited for adhering to Richard II. (u).

Many of these votes were without doubt the result of the usual violence of party: but in more peaceable times they were repelled: and the statutes of the house of Lancaster, being the deeds of an established government, and enacted by princes long possessed of authority, have always been held as valid. The parliament, however, in subverting such deep foundations, had still the pretence of replacing the government on its ancient and natural basis: but, in their subsequent measures, they were more guided by revenge, at least by the views of convenience, than by the maxims of equity and justice. The parliament passed an act of forfeiture and attainder against Henry VI. and queen Margaret, and their infant son, prince Edward: the same act was extended to the dukes of Somerset and Exeter; to the earls of Northumberland, Devonshire, Pembroke, Wilts; to the viscount Beaumont; the lords Roos, Nevil, Clifford, Welles, Dacre, Grey of Rugemont, Hungerford; to Alexander Hedie, Nicholas Latimer, Edmund Montford, John Heron, and many other persons of distinction. They vested the estates of all these attainted persons in the crown; though their sole crime was the adhering to a prince, whom every individual of the parliament had long recognised, and whom the very king himself, who was now seated on the throne, had acknowledged and obeyed as his lawful sovereign.

The necessity of supporting the government established will more fully justify some other acts of violence; though the method of conducting them may still appear exceptionable. John earl of Oxford, and his eldest son Aubrey de Vere, were detected in a correspondence with Margaret, were tried by martial law before the constable, were condemned and executed (v) on Tower Hill, in February, 1462. Sir William Tyrrel, sir Thomas Tudenham, and John Montgomery, were convicted in the same arbitrary court, were executed, and their estates forfeited. This introduction of martial law into civil government was a high strain of prerogative; which, were it not for the violence of the times, would probably have appeared exceptionable to a nation so jealous of their liberties as the English were now become. It was impossible but such a great and sudden revolution must leave the roots of discontent and dissatisfaction in the subject, which would require great art, or in lieu of it, great violence, to extirpate them. The latter was more suitable to the genius of the nation in that uncultivated age.

But the new establishment still seemed precarious and uncertain; not only from the domestic discontents of the people, but from the efforts of foreign powers. Louis, the eleventh of the name, had succeeded to his father Charles in 1460; and was led, from the obvious motives of national interest, to feed the flames of civil discord among such dangerous neighbours, by giving support to the weaker party. But the intriguing and politic genius of this prince was here checked by itself: having attempted to subdue the independent spirit of his own vassals, he had excited such an opposition at home, as prevented him from making all the advantage which the opportunity afforded, of the dissensions among the English.

Margaret, accompanied by the duke of Somerset and a small retinue, sailed for the continent, and sought assistance from her foreign connections. All that she could obtain from Louis was a loan of twenty thousand livres, and a body of forces under Varenne, seneschal of Normandy. With these she embarked for England; and, after a tedious and tempestuous passage, arrived off Tinmouth about the end of 1462; but being prevented from landing there, she again put to sea; and her fleet being overtaken by a storm, many of the ships were stranded near Bamborough Castle, and the vessel in which the queen was with difficulty reached the port of Berwick. The French troops effected a landing in Holy Island, where they were soon attacked by a superior force, and most of them either killed or taken; but their leader, with some other officers made their escape, and joined the queen.

The affairs of Henry were now in a desperate situation: but no disasters could intimidate the heroic spirit of Margaret, who determined to make another effort in order to obtain assistance from the continent. Leaving her husband and son at Edinburgh, she sailed from Kirkcudbright in Galloway, on the 8th of April, 1463; and landing in Britanny, obtained a gift of twelve thousand crowns from the duke of that province. From thence she proceeded to the court of France; and by a promise to Louis to deliver up Calais, should her family by his means be restored to the throne of England, procured a body of two thousand men at arms, with which she arrived safely in Northumberland, in the month of October that year: but the inhabitants of the north, though generally friends to the Lancastrian party, deeming the force insufficient to afford a prospect of success, refused to take up arms; she was therefore compelled, after reducing a few castles, to retire into Scotland, where she passed the winter.

In the ensuing spring she again took the field, having been reinforced by a numerous train of Scotch adventurers. Her first efforts were successful: she reduced the castles of Bamburgh, Dunstanburgh, and Alnwick; and, by her active exertions, dispelled the fears of many who had been hitherto deterred from openly espousing her cause. Edward, alarmed at her progress, sent lord Montacute, or Montague, brother to the earl of Warwick, and warden of the east marches between England and Scotland, to oppose her; and issued a proclamation, commanding every man in England, from the age of sixteen to that of sixty, to be prepared to march at a day's notice. Having collected a powerful army, he set out in person for the north, and reached York towards the end of May: but lord Montague, without waiting for his arrival, had first attacked and defeated a detachment of the Lancastrian army, at Hedgeley Moor, near Wooller, on the 25th of April, commanded by sir Ralph Percy, who was killed in the action. Montague was so encouraged with this success, that, while a numerous reinforcement was on their march to join him by orders from Edward, he yet ventured, with his own troops alone, to attack the Lancastrians at Hexham; and he obtained a complete victory over them, on the 15th of May. The duke of Somerset, the lords Roos and Hungerford, were taken in the pursuit, and immediately beheaded by martial law at Hexham. Summary justice was in like manner executed at Newcastle on sir Humphrey Nevil and several other gentlemen. All those who were spared in the field suffered on the scaffold; and the utter extermination of their adversaries was now become the plain object of the York party; a conduct which the Yorkists seem to have adopted from the preceding practice of the Lancastrians.

The fate of the unfortunate royal family, after this defeat was singular. Margaret, flying with her son into a forest, where she endeavoured to conceal herself, was beset, during the darkness of the night, by robbers, who, either ignorant or regardless of her quality, despoiled her of her rings and jewels, and treated her with the utmost indignity. The partition of this rich booty raised a quarrel among them; and while their attention was thus engaged, she took the opportunity of making her escape with her son, into the thickest of the forest, where she wandered for some time, overspent with hunger and fatigue, and sunk with terror and affliction. While in this wretched condition, she saw a robber approach with his naked sword; and finding that she had no means of escape, she suddenly embraced the resolution of trusting entirely for protection to his faith and generosity. She advanced towards him; and presenting to him the young prince, called out to him, "Here, my friend, I commit to your care the safety of your king's son." The man, whose humanity and generous spirit had been obscured, not entirely lost, by this vicious course of life, was struck with the singularity of the event, was charmed with the confidence reposed in him; and vowed, not only to abstain from all injury against the princess, but to devote himself entirely to her service (w). By his means she dwelt some time concealed in the forest, and was at last conducted to the sea-coast, whence she made her escape into Flanders. She passed thence into her father's court, where she lived several years in privacy and retirement. Her husband was not so fortunate or so dexterous in finding the means of escape. Some of his friends took him under their protection, and conveyed him into Lancashire; where he remained concealed during a twelvemonth; but he was at last detected, delivered up to Edward, and thrown into the Tower (x). The safety of his person was owing less to the generosity of his enemies, than to the contempt which they had entertained of his courage and his understanding.

The imprisonment of Henry, the expulsion of Margaret, the execution and confiscation of all the most eminent Lancastrians, seemed to give full security to Edward's government; whose title by blood being now recognized by parliament, and universally submitted to by the people, was no longer in danger of being impeached by any antagonist. In this prosperous situation, the king delivered himself up, without control, to those pleasures which his youth, his high fortune, and his natural temper invited him to enjoy; and the cares of royalty were less attended to, than the dissipation of amusement or the allurements of passion. The cruel and unrelenting spirit of Edward, though enured to the ferocity of civil wars, was at the same time extremely devoted to the softer passions, which, without mitigating his severe temper, maintained a great influence over him, and shared his attachment with the pursuits of ambition and the thirst of military glory. During the present interval of peace, he lived in the most familiar and sociable manner with his subjects (y), particularly with the Londoners; and the beauty of his person, as well as the gallantry of his address, which, even unassisted by his royal dignity, would have rendered him acceptable to the fair, facilitated all his applications for their favour. This easy and pleasurable course of life augmented every day his popularity among all ranks of men: he was the peculiar favourite of the young and gay of both sexes. The disposition of the English, little addicted to jealousy, kept them from taking umbrage at these liberties: and his indulgence and amusements, while it gratified his inclination, was thus become, without design, a means of supporting and securing his government. But as it is difficult to confine the ruling passion within strict rules of prudence, the amorous temper of Edward led him into a snare, which proved fatal to his repose, and to the stability of his throne.

Jaquelin of Luxembourg, duchess of Bedford, had, after her husband's death, so far sacrificed her ambition to love, that she espoused, in second marriage, Sir Richard Woodeville, a private gentleman, to whom she bore several children; and among the rest, Elizabeth, who was remarkable for the grace and beauty of her person, as well as for other amiable accomplishments. This young lady had married Sir John Gray of Groby, by whom she had children; and her husband being slain in the second battle of St. Albans, fighting on the side of Lancaster, and his estate being for that reason confiscated, his widow retired to live with her father, at his seat of Grafton in Northamptonshire. The king came accidentally to the house after a hunting party, in order to pay a visit to the duchess of Bedford; and as the occasion seemed favourable for obtaining some grace from this gallant monarch, the young widow flung herself at his feet, and with many tears entreated him to take pity on her impoverished and distressed children. The sight of so much beauty in affliction strongly affected the amorous Edward; love stole insensibly into his heart under the guise of compassion; and her sorrow, so becoming a virtuous matron, made his esteem and regard quickly correspond to his affection. He raised her from the ground with assurances of favour; he found his passion increase every moment by the conversation of the amiable object; and he was soon reduced, in his turn, to the posture and style of a supplicant at the feet of Elizabeth. But the lady, either averse to dishonourable love from a sense of duty, or perceiving that the impression impression which she had made, was so deep as to give her hopes of obtaining the highest elevation, obstinately refused to gratify his passion; and all the endearments, caresses, and importunities of the young and amiable Edward, proved fruitless against her rigid and inflexible virtue. His passion, irritated by opposition, and increased by his veneration for such honourable sentiments, carried him at last beyond all bounds of reason; and he offered to share his throne, as well as his heart, with the woman, whose beauty of person and dignity of character seemed so well to entitle her to both. The marriage was privately celebrated at Grafton (z). The secret was carefully kept for some time: no one suspected, that so libertine a prince could sacrifice so much to a romantic passion: and there were in particular strong reasons, which at that time rendered this step to the highest degree dangerous and imprudent. When Edward thought the stability of his throne sufficiently established, he discovered his marriage; and Elizabeth, on the 29th of September, 1464, was led to the abbey church of Reading, where the court then resided, and declared queen of England.

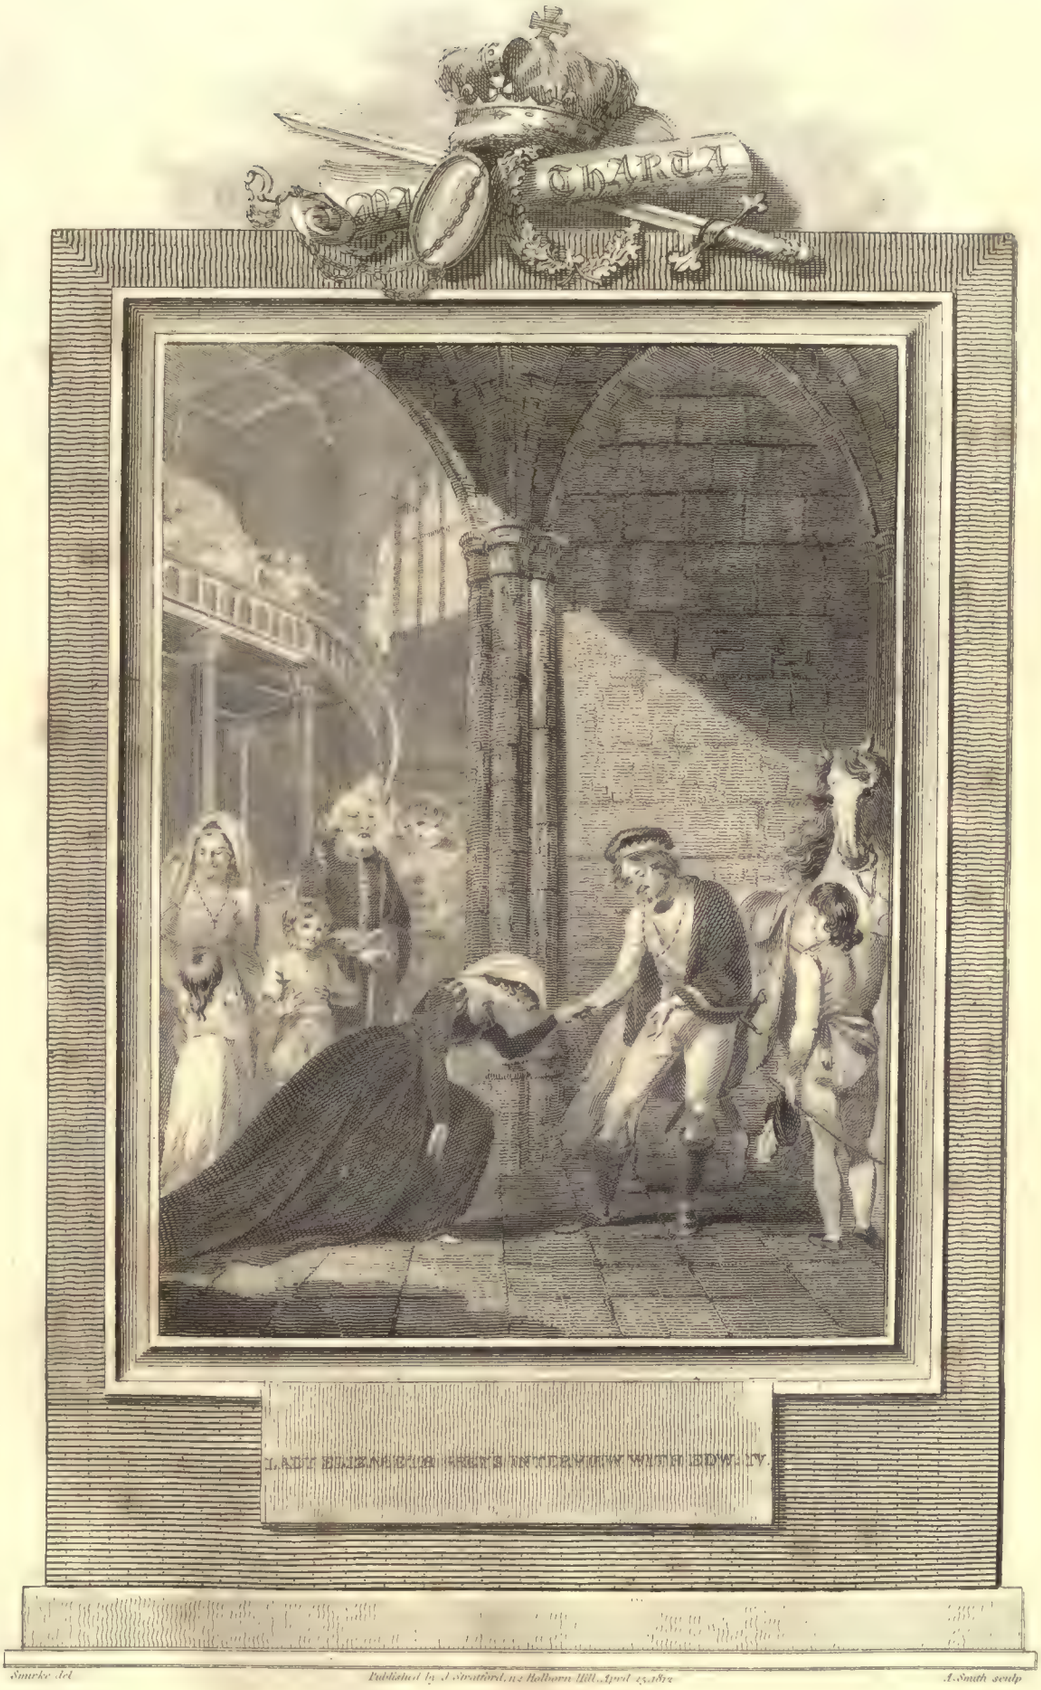
The king, desirous to secure his throne, as well by the prospect of issue, as by foreign alliances, had, a little before, determined to make application to some neighbouring princess; and he had cast his eye on Bona of Savoy, sister of the queen of France, who, he hoped, would, by her marriage, ensure him the friendship of that power, which was alone both able and inclined to give support and assistance to his rival. To render the negociation more successful, the earl of Warwick had been dispatched to Paris, where the princess then resided; he had demanded Bona in marriage for the king; his proposals had been accepted; the treaty was fully concluded; and nothing remained but the ratification of the terms agreed on, and the bringing over the princess to England (a). But when the secret of Edward's marriage broke out, the haughty earl, deeming himself affronted, both by being employed in this fruitless negociation, and by being kept a stranger to the king's intentions, who had owed every thing to his friendship, immediately returned to England, inflamed with rage and indignation. The influence of passion over so young a man as Edward might have served as an excuse for his imprudent conduct, had he deigned to acknowledge his error, or had pleaded his weakness as an apology: but his faulty shame or pride prevented him from so much as mentioning the matter to Warwick; and that nobleman being discontented, departed from the court.

The king, in the mean time, was employed at home in preparing for the coronation of his consort; in honour of which solemnity he made seven and thirty knights of the Bath, on the 23rd of May, 1465; on the following day, the lord mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, richly dressed, went forth on horseback, to Shooter's Hill, to meet the queen, whom they conducted to the Tower; from whence she was conveyed in a litter, preceded by the new made knights, to Westminster, where she was crowned, on Sunday the 26th of the same month, by the archbishop of Canterbury. The coronation was succeeded by magnificent tournaments, which had lasted several days.



About this period the unfortunate Henry, who had long lain concealed in the counties of Westmoreland and Lancaster, among the friends of his family, was betrayed by a monk to Sir James Harrington, who apprehended him as he sat at dinner in Waddington Hall, and conducted him to London; a service for which Edward rewarded him with the grant of the forfeited estates of Sir Richard Tunstall. The royal captive was met at Islington by the earl of Warwick; who actuated by a spirit of revenge, equally unworthy of his character, and inconsistent with the general tenour of his conduct, is said to have insulted him in his misfortunes, in a manner the most gross and indecent, ordering his feet to be tied to the stirrups, and treating him in other respects with the utmost indignity: a convincing proof that, as yet, the earl had formed no intention of deposing Edward, and restoring his rival to the throne. In this ignominious situation the wretched Henry, who in the days of his prosperity had never been betrayed into so base and unmanly an exertion of power, was conducted through the streets of London, after a proclamation had been made to prohibit any person from shewing him any marks of compassion or respect; a mandate which none but a tyrant could have issued, and none but slaves have regarded! When the procession, which reflected more infamy on those who framed it than on the unhappy object it was meant to degrade, reached Tower Hill, the horse on which Henry rode was led three times round the pillory; and the fallen monarch was then lodged in the Tower, where he was treated with a degree of contempt and cruelty which was doubtless intended to shorten the period of his existence.

The queen, who lost not her influence by marriage, was, as might naturally be expected, solicitous to draw every grace and favour to her own friends and kindred, and to exclude those of the earl, whom she regarded as her mortal enemy. Her father, Sir Richard Woodville, was created earl of Rivers: he was made treasurer in the room of lord Mountjoy (b): he was invested in the office of constable for life; and his son Anthony, Elizabeth's eldest brother, received the survivance of that high dignity (c). The same young nobleman was married to the only daughter of lord Scales, enjoyed the great estate of that family, and had the title of Scales conferred upon him. Catharine, the queen's sister, was married to the young duke of Buckingham, who was a ward of the crown (d): Mary, another of her sisters, espoused William Herbert, created earl of Huntingdon: Ann, a third sister, was given in marriage to the son and heir of Grey lord Ruthyn, created earl of Kent (e). The daughter and heir of the duke of Exeter, who was also the king's niece, was contracted to Sir Thomas Grey, one of the queen's sons by her former husband; and as lord Montague was treating of a marriage between his son and this lady, the preference given to young Grey was deemed an affront to the family of Nevil.

The honours which had been so profusely lavished on the queen's relations, and their almost exclusive enjoyment of the royal confidence, appear at this time to have caused some coolness between them and the powerful family of the Nevils; since, at a magnificent entertainment given, in September, 1465, by George Nevil, chancellor of England, brother to the earl of Warwick, on his promotion from the see of Exeter to that of York, though the duke of Gloucester, brother to Edward, with almost all the nobles and prelates of the kingdom were present, not one of the queen's family appeared. But, although a coolness might subsist, no appearance of an open rupture between Edward and Warwick had yet occurred: nor indeed could that coolness itself have risen to any great height, as the earl, soon after, stood godfather to the princess Elizabeth, of whom the queen was delivered at Westminster on the 11th of February, 1466. Yet, as the family of Woodville advanced in greatness, that of Nevil experienced a diminution of the credit they had hitherto enjoyed, so marked and extensive, as to afford the most reasonable grounds for disgust. The post of chancellor, enjoyed by the archbishop of York, brother to Warwick, was abruptly taken from that prelate on the 8th of June, 1467, and conferred on Robert de Stillington, bishop of Bath and Wells, one of the queen's most zealous partizans. The king, probably stimulated by the relations of his consort, continued to subject the man, to whose exertions he was chiefly indebted for his own elevation, to the most pointed insults, in the vain hope, that such unworthy treatment would urge him to retire from court to the enjoyment of a private station, for which he was by no means adapted, either by birth, habit, or inclination. In this view he obtained an act of parliament which empowered him to resume all the grants he had made, with some few exceptions, since his accession to the throne. Thus the family of Nevil was rendered wholly dependent on his pleasure for the possession of those numerous estates which had been conferred on them as rewards for their important services: and Edward imagined that, by holding this act in terrorem over Warwick, he should induce him to bury his disgust in silence and obscurity; or, should the resentment of that nobleman rise superior to his interest, by enforcing its provisions, he might decrease his opulence; and, by the resumption of grants which, according to the computation of Philip de Comines, a writer of great accuracy and undoubted credit, produced, exclusive of his patrimonial estates, an annual revenue of eighty thousand crowns, effect a proportional diminution of his influence and authority. Edward, to shew at once his power and intentions, immediately resumed two manors which he had granted to the archbishop of York, reserving a farther execution of the act for more urgent occasions.

During these transactions, Warwick was absent on an embassy to France; and though when apprized of them, his pride must have suffered considerably, he did not, on his return, evince that spirit of resentment which might naturally have been expected; on the contrary, he suffered his brother, the archbishop of York, to attempt a reconciliation with the queen's relations; for which purpose that prelate had an interview with his father lord Rivers at Nottingham, when an amicable arrangement took place between the rival families. The earl of Warwick, soon after, attended a great council, held at Coventry, in January, 1468; at which he was publicly reconciled to the lords Herbert, Stafford, and Audley, who had married three of the queen's sisters. The king expressed so much pleasure at this circumstance, that he restored to the archbishop of York, by whose means it had been effected, the two manors which he had taken from him the preceding year.

In the mean time, Edward had endeavoured to secure the stability of his throne by foreign alliances. The dark and dangerous, ambition of Louis XI. the more it was known, the greater alarm it excited among his neighbours and vassals; and as it was supported by great abilities, and unrestrained by any principle of faith or humanity, they found no security to themselves but by a jealous combination against him. Philip duke of Burgundy was now dead: his rich and extensive dominions were devolved to Charles his only son, whose martial disposition acquired him the sirname of Bold, and whose ambition, more outrageous than that of Louis, but seconded by less power and policy, was regarded with a more favourable eye by the other potentates of Europe. The opposition of interests, and still more, a natural antipathy of character, produced a declared animosity between these bad princes; and Edward was thus secure of the sincere attachment of either of them, for whom he should chuse to declare himself. The duke of Burgundy being descended by his mother, a daughter of Portugal, from John of Gaunt, was naturally inclined to favour the house of Lancaster (f): but this consideration was easily overbalanced by political motives; and Charles, perceiving the interests of that house to be extremely decayed in England, sent over his natural brother, commonly called the Bastard of Burgundy, to carry in his name proposals of marriage to Margaret the king's sister. The alliance of Burgundy was more popular among the English than that of France; the commercial interests of the two nations invited the princes to a close union; their common jealousy of Louis was a natural cement between them; and Edward, pleased with strengthening himself by so potent a confederate, soon concluded the alliance, and bestowed his sister upon Charles (g). The difficulty, however, of obtaining a dispensation from the pope, arising from the influence of Louis at the court of Rome, retarded the marriage for some months. When that obstacle was removed, and preliminaries arranged, the princess Margaret rode in procession, behind the earl of Warwick, through the streets of London: after which she embarked at Margate on first of July, 1468; arrived in safety at Sluys on the 2nd; and on the 9th, her marriage was celebrated at Dam with great pomp and magnificence. A league which Edward at the same time concluded with the duke of Britanny, seemed both to increase his security, and to open to him the prospect of rivaling his predecessors in those foreign conquests, which, however short-lived and unprofitable, had rendered their reigns so popular and illustrious (h).

The mark of distinction which Edward shewed to Warwick, by appointing him to attend the princess, was soon followed by another proof of the confidence which that monarch either reposed, or pretended to repose, in him. Several gentlemen having been apprehended on a charge of maintaining a correspondence with Margaret of Anjou, the king granted a commission for their trial; in which the earl of Warwick, and his brother the earl of Northumberland, were included, with the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, Edward's own brothers; and the two earls appear to have executed their trust with a zeal that rather tended to justify the confidence of their sovereign than to demonstrate their own attention to the principles of justice and humanity; for great exertions of violence, according to William of Worcester, were employed to procure evidence against the unfortunate culprits, many of whom were condemned and executed on the most vague and inadequate proofs. Though from hence we may infer that Edward had not as yet perceived in Warwick, or his brother, any marks of that disaffection which many circumstances in his conduct were calculated to promote, it is certain the earl was taking such precaution as, in case of a rupture, should render his opposition effectual. For this purpose he contracted an intimacy with George duke of Clarence, who had received the same cause for disgust as himself, in a total exclusion from any active share in the administration, and in the marked preference shewn by his brother to the relations of the queen. Deeply impressed with similar sentiments of animosity against the objects of their common hatred, a strict intercourse and communication of councils speedily ensued between these injured noblemen; and hence arose an union of interests, that was finally cemented by the duke's marriage with Isabella, daughter and co-heiress to the earl, which took place at Calais, on the 11th of July, 1469.

In the mean time, a dangerous insurrection arose in Yorkshire, which by many historians has been hastily imputed to the intrigues of the earl of Warwick; though it is certain that his brother John, earl of Northumberland, exerted the most vigorous efforts to crush it in its infancy. The hospital of St. Leonard's near York had received, from an ancient grant of king Athelstan, a right of levying a thrave of corn upon every plough-land in the county; and as these charitable establishments are liable to abuse, the country people complained that the revenue of the hospital was no longer expended for the relief of the poor, but was secreted by the managers, and employed to their own private purposes. After long repining at the contribution, and their complaints not producing redress, they refused payment: ecclesiastical and civil censures were issued against them: their goods were distrained, and their persons thrown into jail: till, as their ill-humour daily increased, they rose in arms; fell upon the officers of the hospital, whom they put to the sword; and proceeded in a body, fifteen thousand strong, to the gates of York. On their approach, the earl of Northumberland armed his followers, and went forth to meet them; when an action ensued, in which the insurgents were defeated; their leader, Robert Hulderne, commonly called Robin of Redesdale, was taken, and immediately beheaded, by the earl's orders; according to the practice of the times. The rebels, however, still continued in arms; and being soon headed by men of greater distinction, Sir Henry Nevil son of lord Latimer, and Sir John Coniers, they advanced southwards, and began to appear formidable to government. Herbert earl of Pembroke, who had received that title on the forfeiture of Jasper Tudor, was ordered by Edward to march against them at the head of a body of Welshmen; and he was joined by five thousand archers under the command of Stafford earl of Devonshire, who had succeeded in that title to the family of Courtney, which had also been attainted. But a trivial difference about quarters having begotten an animosity between these two noblemen, the earl of Devonshire retired with his archers, and left Pembroke alone to encounter the rebels. The two armies met, on the 26th of July, 1469, at Edgcote, in Northamptonshire, about three miles from Banbury; and Pembroke, having prevailed in a skirmish, and having taken Sir Henry Nevil prisoner, ordered him immediately to be put to death, without any form of process. This execution enraged without terrifying the rebels; they attacked the Welsh army, routed them, put them to the sword without mercy; and having taken Pembroke, and his brother, Sir Richard Herbert, with ten other gentlemen, they took immediate revenge upon them for the death of their leader. The king, imputing this misfortune to the earl of Devonshire, who had deserted Pembroke, ordered him to be executed in a like summary manner. But these speedy executions, or rather open murders, did not stop there: the northern rebels, sending a party to Grafton, took Richard earl Rivers, the queen's father, and his son, Sir John Widville, in the Forest of Dean; men who had become hateful by their near relation to the king, and his partiality towards them; whom they conveyed to Northampton, and they were immediately executed by orders from Sir John Coniers (i).

The murder of earl Rivers and his son, who were the chief enemies of Warwick, and the primary source of his discontents, gave rise to reports that it was undertaken by his advice; but, as Edward himself entertained no such suspicion, these reports must have been wholly devoid of foundation. That Edward did not suspect the earl of being privy to the murder of his father-in-law, is evident from a commission, dated August 17, 1469, by which he constituted Warwick chief justiciary of South Wales: he also bestowed on him several other offices of trust and power, which had been held by his favourite, the late earl of Pembroke.

There is no part of English history since the Conquest so obscure, so uncertain, so little authentic, or consistent, as that of the wars between the two Roses: historians differ about many material circumstances; some events of the utmost consequence, in which they almost all agree, are incredible and contradicted by records; and it is remarkable, that this profound darkness falls upon us just on the eve of the restoration of letters, and when the art of printing was already known in Europe. All we can distinguish with certainty through the deep cloud which covers that period, is a scene of horror and bloodshed, savage manners, arbitrary executions, and treacherous, dishonourable conduct in all parties. There is no possibility, for instance, of accounting for the views and intentions of the earl of Warwick at this time. It is agreed that he resided, together with his son-in-law the duke of Clarence, in his government of Calais, during the commencement of this rebellion; and that his brother Montague acted with vigour against the northern rebels. We may thence presume, that the insurrection had not proceeded from the secret counsels and instigation of Warwick; though the murder committed by the rebels on the earl of Rivers, his capital enemy, forms, on the other hand, a presumption against him. He and Clarence came over to England, offered their services to Edward, were received without any suspicion, were entrusted by him in the highest commands (k), and still persevered in their fidelity. Soon after, we find the rebels quieted and dispersed by a general pardon granted by Edward from the advice of the earl of Warwick: but why so courageous a prince, if secure of Warwick's fidelity, should have granted a general pardon to men who had been guilty of such violent and personal outrages against him, is not intelligible; nor why that nobleman, if unfaithful, should have endeavoured to appease a rebellion, of which he was able to make such advantages.

Though Edward had afforded Warwick very strong marks of his confidence in the month of August, when circumstances appear to have increased the propriety, or rather the prudence, of adopting a different line of conduct. In the short space of three months, without any intervening occurrence preserved in history, that could operate a change in his sentiments, we find that confidence vanished, and suspicion established in its place: for, on the 16th of November following, the king granted a commission of array to John duke of Suffolk, and Anthony (late lord Scales, now) earl of Rivers, to embody all the men capable of bearing arms in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, to be employed against the duke of Clarence and other rebels, who had conspired to effect the liberation of Henry the Sixth. This attack on a prince so nearly allied to Warwick, and in which Warwick himself was doubtless included, was accompanied by another on the brother of that earl. Henry Percy, son and heir to the earl of Northumberland who was slain in the fatal battle of Touton, had from that time been detained a prisoner in the Tower; while his title and estate were conferred on John Nevil, brother to Warwick. Edward is said to have now caused secret intimations to be given to the Percy family, that if they would present a petition for the release of their kinsman, and for the restoration of the estates and honours of his ancestors, it would be attended with success. Petitions were accordingly presented; and young Henry was liberated from confinement, on the 27th of October, and soon after restored to the earldom of Northumberland.

But before the disaffection of Warwick (which this last transaction could not fail to promote) had given rise to any hostile proceedings on his part, and before the commission of array issued by the king had been enforced, another change in the sentiments of Edward, as sudden and unaccountable as the former, appears to have taken place. In consequence of this, John Nevil, who had been recently deprived of the earldom of Northumberland, received the higher title of marquis of Montague; his eldest son, George, was created duke of Bedford, on the 5th of January, 1470; and Edward publicly declared his intention of marrying that young nobleman to his eldest daughter, Elizabeth; who, as he had yet no sons, was presumptive heir to the crown. In short, the reconciliation, at the beginning of this memorable year, at least in appearance, was so cordial and compleat, that Edward granted another commission of array, dated at Waltham Abbey, March the 7th, very different from the former, authorizing the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick to collect all the men able to bear arms in the county of Worcester, and to conduct them to the army then raising by the king, to be employed against the rebels.

The rebels here alluded to were commanded by Sir Robert Welles, eldest son of Richard lord Welles, in conjunction with some other gentlemen of Lincolnshire; but the motive which induced them to take up arms is as unaccountable as the other events of this obscure period: their proceedings, however, are better authenticated. The rebel army amounted to thirty thousand men: they first attacked the castle of Sir Robert Burgh, an officer of the king's household, which they speedily demolished; then expelled its owner from the county, and plundered his estate. Lord Welles, the father of Sir Robert, was so far from approving the conduct of his son, that he fled into a sanctuary, in order to secure himself from the king's anger or suspicion. Thither Edward sent to him, with a solemn assurance of safety, if he would write to his son, and direct him to lay down his arms; a request with which that nobleman immediately complied: but Edward, justly doubting the success of this application, assembled his army; and, accompanied by lord Welles, began his march to the north.

Previous, however, to his departure, the king is said to have paid a visit to George Nevil, archbishop of York, at his house of Moor Park; when, as he was about to sit down to supper, one of his attendants, named Ratcliff, gave him private notice that a hundred men at arms were in waiting to secure his person. Alarmed at this intelligence, he immediately left the house, mounted his horse, and rode full speed to Windsor; from whence he advanced against the northern rebels.

It appears that the intelligence thus conveyed to Edward was without foundation, though for what purpose it was formed, unless by the relations of the queen to widen the breach between Warwick and his sovereign, it is difficult to conceive. If that was the intention, it was fully answered; for not only Warwick, and his brother the archbishop, but even the duke of Clarence, who was present at the time, were so much enraged at the king's abrupt departure, which indicated a rooted distrust of their loyalty, and seemed calculated to fix the imputation of perfidy on their conduct, that they immediately dispatched a messenger to Sir Robert Welles, exhorting him not to lay down his arms, and promising him speedy and effectual assistance; and, to enable themselves to put their promise in execution, the duke and earl immediately departed for Warwick to collect their forces.

But the temerity of Sir Robert Welles, who suffered an impulse of passion to overcome his prudence, disconcerted their projects. Edward, when he reached Stamford, having found that Sir Robert Welles paid no attention to the repeated solicitations of his father, who strenuously urged him to return to his allegiance, in violation of a solemn promise, ordered that nobleman to be beheaded. This act of inhumanity inspired the son with such a thirst for revenge, that, without waiting for the reinforcements which Warwick had promised to send him, he attacked the king's army at Stamford, on the 13th of March, 1470, where he was defeated, taken prisoner, and soon after beheaded; together with Sir Thomas Dymoc, and some other leaders of the insurrection.

Meanwhile, Warwick and Clarence advanced into Lancashire, in the hope of being reinforced by Thomas lord Stanley, who had married the earl of Warwick's sister; but Stanley refusing to join them, they were about to march into Yorkshire, to form a junction with the northern insurgents under Sir John Coniers. The king, however, got the start of them, having reached York with his victorious army; from whence he issued a proclamation on the 20th of March, denouncing the severest penalties against all propagators of false reports. Four days after he published a long declaration from the same place, acquainting his subjects with the treasonable designs of which the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick had been accused by Sir Robert Welles and the other insurgents in their last moments; and summoning those noblemen to appear before fore him on the 28th of the same month, in order to answer the charges which had been preferred against them, on pain of being pronounced rebels and traitors. As they paid no regard to Edward's declaration, another was actually published at Nottingham, on the 31st of the same month, proclaiming them rebels and traitors; offering rewards (l) for their apprehension, and prohibiting all persons, under the severest penalties, from affording either them or their adherents any assistance.

Finding the north thus secured, Clarence and Warwick directed their course to Devonshire, whither Edward followed them with great expedition; and from Exeter issued commissions to the earl of Wiltshire, lord Mountjoye, Sir John Fortescue, and others, to array men in Devon and Cornwall; but, before these troops could be collected, the fugitive nobles escaped to Dartmouth, where they embarked for Calais.

The deputy-governor, to whom Warwick had entrusted the command of Calais during his absence, was one Vaucleur, a Gascon, who seeing the earl return in the miserable condition of an exile, refused him admittance; and would not so much as permit the duchess of Clarence to land; though a few days before she had been delivered on ship-board of a son, and was at that time extremely disordered by sickness. With difficulty he would allow a few flaggons of wine to be carried to the ship for the use of the ladies: but as he was a man of sagacity, and well acquainted with the revolutions to which England was subject, he secretly apologized to Warwick for this appearance of infidelity, and represented it as proceeding entirely from personal regard and zeal for his service. He said, that the fortress was ill supplied with provisions; that he could not depend on the attachment of the garrison; that the inhabitants, who lived by the English commerce, would certainly declare for the established government; that the place was at present unable to resist the power of England on the one hand, and that of the duke of Burgundy on the other; and that, by seeming to declare for Edward, he would acquire the confidence of that prince, and still keep it in his power, when it should become safe and prudent, to restore Calais to its ancient master (m). It is uncertain whether Warwick was satisfied with this apology, or suspected a double infidelity in Vaucleur (n); but he feigned to be entirely convinced by him; and having seized some Flemish vessels which he found lying off Calais, he immediately made sail towards Normandy, and arrived at Harfleur on the 2nd of May. He there found the Bastard of Bourbon, admiral of France, who received him with the utmost friendship and cordiality; and, having provided suitable accommodations for the duchess of Clarence, and the ladies who had attended her, at Valongis, he conducted Warwick and the duke, together with Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and John de Vere, earl of Oxford, (who had likewise fled from England,) to the court of France, which then resided at Amboise.

The king of France, uneasy at the close conjunction between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, received with the greatest demonstrations of regard the unfortunate Warwick (o), with whom he had formerly maintained a secret correspondence, and whom he hoped still to make his instrument in overturning the government of England, and re-establishing the house of Lancaster. No animosity was ever greater than that which had long prevailed between that house and the earl of Warwick. His father had been executed by orders from Margaret: he himself had twice reduced Henry to captivity, had banished the queen, had put to death all their most zealous partizans either in the field or on the scaffold, and had occasioned innumerable ills to that unhappy family. For this reason, believing that such inveterate rancour could never admit of any cordial reconciliation, he had not mentioned Henry's name, when he took arms against Edward; and rather than revive a party which he sincerely hated, he meant to confer the regal dignity on his own son-in-law, the duke of Clarence. But his present distresses and the entreaties of Louis made him hearken to terms of accommodation; and Margaret being sent for from Angers, where she then resided, an agreement was from common interest soon concluded between them. It was stipulated, that Warwick should espouse the cause of Henry, and endeavour to restore him to liberty, and to re-establish him on the throne; that the administration of the government, during the minority of young Edward, Henry's son, should be entrusted conjointly to the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence; that prince Edward should marry the lady Anne, second daughter of Warwick; and that the crown, in case of the failure of male issue in that prince, should descend to the duke of Clarence, to the entire exclusion of king Edward and his posterity. Never was confederacy, on all sides, less natural, or more evidently the work of necessity: but Warwick hoped, that all former passions of the Lancastrians might be lost in present political views; and that at worst, the independent power of his family, and the affections of the people, would suffice to give him security, and enable him to exact the full performance of all the conditions agreed on. The marriage of prince Edward with the lady Anne Nevil was immediately celebrated in France.

Edward foresaw that it would be easy to dissolve an alliance composed of such discordant parts. For this purpose he sent over a lady of great sagacity and address, who belonged to the train of the duchess of Clarence, and who, under colour of attending her mistress, was empowered to negociate with the duke, and to renew the connexions of that prince with his own family (p). She represented to Clarence, that he had unwarily, to his own ruin, become the instrument of Warwick's vengeance, and had thrown himself entirely in the power of his most inveterate enemies; that the mortal injuries which the one royal family had suffered from the other, were now past all forgiveness, and no imaginary union of interests could ever suffice to obliterate them; that even if the leaders were willing to forget past offences, the animosity of their adherents would prevent a sincere coalition of parties, and would, in spite of all temporary and verbal agreements, preserve an eternal opposition of measures between them; and that a prince who deserted his own kindred, and joined the murderers of his father, left himself single, without friends, without protection, and would not, when misfortunes inevitably fell upon him, be so much as entitled to any pity or regard from the rest of mankind. Clarence was only one and twenty years of age, and seems to have possessed but a slender capacity; yet could he easily see the force of these reasons; and upon the promise of forgiveness from his brother, he secretly engaged, on a favourable opportunity, to desert the earl of Warwick, and abandon the Lancastrian party.

During this negociation, Warwick was secretly carrying on a correspondence of the same nature with his brother the marquis of Montague, who was entirely trusted by Edward; and like motives produced a like resolution in that nobleman. The marquis also, that he might render the projected blow the more deadly and incurable, resolved, on his side, to watch a favourable opportunity for committing his perfidy, and still to maintain the appearance of being a zealous adherent to the house of York.

After these mutual snares were thus carefully laid, the decision of the quarrel advanced apace. Louis prepared a fleet to escort the earl of Warwick, and granted him a supply of men and money (q). The duke of Burgundy, on the other hand, enraged at that nobleman for his seizure of the Flemish vessels before Calais, and anxious to support the reigning family in England, with whom his own interests were now connected, fitted out a larger fleet, with which he guarded the Channel; and he incessantly warned his brother-in-law of the imminent perils to which he was exposed. But Edward, though always brave and often active, had little foresight or penetration. He was not sensible of his danger: he made no suitable preparations against the earl of Warwick (r): he even said, that the duke might spare himself the trouble of guarding the seas, and that he wished for nothing more than to see Warwick set foot on English ground (s). A vain confidence in his own prowess, joined to the immoderate love of pleasure, had made him incapable of all sound reason and reflection.

(l) The king offered by proclamation a reward of one thousand pounds, or one hundred pounds a year in land, to any that would seize them. Whence we may learn that land was at that time sold for about ten years' purchase. See Rymer, vol. xi. p. 654.

(m) Comines, liv. iii. chap. 4. Hall, fol. 205.

(n) We think there is little doubt of the treachery of Vaucleur towards the earl of Warwick; because his conduct was so highly approved both by Edward and the duke of Burgundy, that, as we are told by Philip de Comines, the former gave him the government of Calais, and the latter granted him a pension of one thousand crowns a year; on which he took a solemn oath to remain faithful to the king, and to resist every solicitation that could tempt him to swerve from his duty.

(s) Comines, liv. iii. chap. 5. Hall, fol. 208.

The event soon happened, of which Edward seemed so desirous. A storm dispersed the Flemish navy, and left the sea open to Warwick (t). That nobleman seized the opportunity, and setting sail from Harfleur, landed at Dartmouth, on the 13th of September, with the duke of Clarence, the earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and a small body of troops; with which he directed his march towards the metropolis, distributing a manifesto, commanding all loyal subjects, who were able to bear arms, to repair to his standard, and assist him in deposing the tyrant Edward, and in restoring their lawful sovereign Henry the Sixth.

When Edward received intelligence of Warwick's descent, he was in the north, engaged in suppressing an insurrection which had been raised by lord Fitz-Hugh, brother-in-law to Warwick. The scene which ensues resembles more the fiction of a poem or romance than an event in true history. The prodigious popularity of Warwick (u), the zeal of the Lancastrian party, the spirit of discontent with which many were infected, and the general instability of the English nation, occasioned by the late frequent revolutions, drew such multitudes to his standard, that in a very few days his army amounted to sixty thousand men, and was continually increasing. Edward hastened southwards to encounter him; and the two armies approached each other near Nottingham, where a decisive action was every hour expected. The rapidity of Warwick's progress had incapacitated the duke of Clarence from executing his plan of treachery; and the marquis of Montague, who was at the head of six thousand men, had here the opportunity of striking the first blow. He communicated the design to his adherents, who promised him their concurrence: they took to arms in the night-time, and hastened with loud acclamations to Edward's quarters: the king was alarmed at the noise, and starting from his bed, heard the cry of war usually employed by the Lancastrian party. Lord Hastings, his chamberlain, informed him of the danger, and urged him to make his escape by speedy flight from an army where he had so many concealed enemies, and where few seemed zealously attached to his service. He had just time to get on horseback, and to hurry, with his brother the duke of Gloucester, the earl of Rivers, and a small retinue to Lynn in Norfolk, where he luckily found some ships ready, on board of which he embarked (v), on the 3rd of October. And after this manner the earl of Warwick, in no longer space than eleven days after his first landing, was left entire master of the kingdom.

But Edward's danger did not end with his embarkation. The Easterlings or Hanse-Towns were then at war both with France and England; and some ships of these people, hovering on the English coast, espied the king's vessels, and gave chase to them; nor was it without extreme difficulty that he made his escape into the port of Alcmaer in Holland. He had fled from England with such precipitation, that he had carried nothing of value along with him; and the only reward which he could bestow on the captain of the vessel that brought him over, was a robe lined with sables; promising him an ample recompence if fortune should ever become more propitious to him (w).

It is not likely that Edward could be very fond of presenting himself in this lamentable plight before the duke of Burgundy; and that having so suddenly, after his mighty vaunts, lost all footing in his own kingdom, he could be insensible to the ridicule which must attend him in the eyes of that prince. The duke on his part was no less embarrassed how he should receive the dethroned monarch. As he had ever borne a greater affection to the house of Lancaster than to that of York, nothing but political views had engaged him to contract an alliance with the latter; and he foresaw, that probably the revolution in England would now turn this alliance against him, and render the reigning family his implacable and jealous enemy. For this reason, when the first rumour of that event reached him, attended with the circumstance of Edward's death, he seemed rather pleased with the catastrophe; and it was no agreeable disappointment to find, that he must either undergo the burthen of supporting an exiled prince, or the dishonour of abandoning so near a relation. He began already to say that his connexions were with the kingdom of England, not with the king; and it was indifferent to him whether the name of Edward, or that of Henry, were employed in the articles of treaty. These sentiments were continually strengthened by the subsequent events. Vaucleur, the deputy governor of Calais, though he had been confirmed in his command by Edward, and had even received a pension from the duke of Burgundy on account of his fidelity to the crown, no sooner saw his old master Warwick reinstated in authority, than he declared for him, and with great demonstrations of zeal and attachment put the whole garrison in his livery. And the intelligence which the duke received every day from England, seemed to promise an entire and full settlement in the family of Lancaster.

After Edward's retreat, his army submitted to Warwick, who forthwith marched to London, which he entered in triumph on the 5th of October. The day after his arrival the earl released king Henry from his confinement in the Tower, into which he himself had been the chief cause of throwing him, and conducted him to the bishop's palace, where he resided for some days; and then went in procession, accompanied by all the prelates and nobles of his party, to return thanks to God for his restoration.

Elizabeth, Edward's queen, had, during these transactions, privately retired from the Tower, with her infant daughters, and a few faithful adherents, and taken refuge in a sanctuary at Westminster; where she was delivered of a son, named Edward, on the 4th of November.

Henry being seated on the throne, a parliament was summoned, in the name of that prince, to meet at Westminster; and as this assembly could pretend to no liberty, while surrounded by such enraged and insolent victors, governed by such an impetuous spirit as Warwick, their votes were entirely dictated by the ruling faction. The treaty with Margaret was here fully executed: Henry was recognized as lawful king; but his incapacity for government being avowed, the regency was entrusted to Warwick and Clarence till the majority of prince Edward; and in default of that prince's issue, Clarence was declared successor to the crown. The usual business of reversals went on without opposition: every statute made during the reign of Edward was repealed; that prince was declared to be an usurper; he and his adherents were attainted; and in particular Richard duke of Gloucester, his younger brother: all the attainders of the Lancastrians, the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Richmond, Pembroke, Oxford, and Ormond, were reversed; and every one was restored who had lost either honours or fortune by his former adherence to the cause of Henry. Among these was Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke; who, soon after the prorogation of parliament, repaired to Wales, to visit the county from whence he derived his title. Having there found his nephew Henry, the young earl of Richmond, then in the tenth year of his age, who was detained, as it were, in captivity, (though, according to Hall, he was well and honourably educated by lady Herbert,) the earl brought this young prince to the king; who, as Hollingshed asserts, fixed his eyes stedfastly upon him, and foretold that he should one day mount the throne of England, and terminate the fatal contest between the rival families.

The ruling party were more sparing in their executions than was usual after any revolutions during those violent times. The only victim of distinction was John Tibetot, earl of Worcester. This accomplished person, born in an age and nation where the nobility valued themselves on ignorance as their privilege, and left learning to monks and schoolmasters, for whom indeed the spurious erudition that prevailed was best fitted, had been struck with the first rays of true science, which began to penetrate from the south, and had been zealous, by his exhortation and example, to propagate the love of letters among his unpolished countrymen. It is pretended, that knowledge had not produced on this nobleman himself the effect which so naturally attends it, of humanizing the temper and softening the heart (x); and that he had enraged the Lancastrians against him, by the severities which he exercised upon them during the prevalence of his own party. He endeavoured to conceal himself after the flight of Edward; but was caught on the top of a tree in the forest of Weybridge, was conducted to London, tried before the earl of Oxford, condemned, and executed. All the other considerable Yorkists either fled beyond sea, or took shelter in sanctuaries; where the ecclesiastical privileges afforded them protection.

Queen Margaret had not yet appeared in England; but on receiving intelligence of Warwick's success, was preparing with prince Edward for her journey. All the banished Lancastrians flocked to her; and among the rest, the duke of Somerset, son of the duke beheaded after the battle of Hexham. This nobleman, who had long been regarded as the head of the party, had fled into the Low Countries on the discomfiture of his friends; and as he concealed his name and quality, he had there languished in extreme indigence. Philip de Comines tells us (y), that he himself saw him, as well as the duke of Exeter, in a condition no better than that of a common beggar; till being discovered by Philip duke of Burgundy, they had small pensions allotted them, and were living in silence and obscurity, when the success of their party called them from their retreat.

Edward, who since his flight had hitherto resided in Holland, after his sister, the duchess of Burgundy, had in vain solicited her husband to take some decisive steps in his favour, demanded an interview with Charles, which he could not with any delicacy refuse to grant. At this conference, Edward represented that delays must prove extremely prejudicial to his interests, as his friends and adherents in England would gradually forsake his cause; while the power of Warwick, his enemy, would daily receive confirmation and strength: that the duke, therefore, ought either to afford him speedy and effectual assistance, or wholly abandon him to his evil fate. In order to reinforce this remonstrance, he imparted to Charles the engagements which his brother Clarence had contracted with him: he reminded him of the oath by which that prince was bound to assist him, should he ever stand in need of his assistance; and he desired him to consider that, by aiding him in his distress, he would act for the benefit of his own family, which might one day be in want of equal support, and at the same time enjoy the glory of having restored a near relation to his throne. He solemnly promised to unite with him in opposition to France, so soon as he should be re-established in his regal dignity; and observed, that the neutrality which the duke had hitherto observed, could be productive of no possible advantage, nor even prevent Louis and the earl of Warwick from the adoption of measures wholly destructive to his power and repose. This expostulation was not fruitless; the duke of Burgundy, though still afraid to furnish Warwick with a plausible pretext for attacking his dominions, contrived an expedient which enabled him to accommodate the fugitive king without incurring the risk of a rupture with England. He caused four large vessels to be equipped, in the name of some private merchants, at the free port of Ter-veer in Zealand; to which he added fourteen ships secretly hired from the Easterlings. This squadron, accompanied by a sum of money, he delivered to Edward, who immediately set sail for England on the 11th of March, 1471, with an army of fifteen hundred men, partly composed of English fugitives, and partly of Flemish (z). No sooner was Charles informed of Edward's departure, than he issued a proclamation inhibiting all his subjects from giving him countenance or assistance (a): an artifice which could not deceive the earl of Warwick, but which might serve as a decent pretence, if that nobleman were so disposed, for maintaining friendship with the duke of Burgundy. In the mean time queen Margaret with the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and many other Lancastrian exiles, were waiting on the coast of France to embark for England and join their friends; but a constant succession of bad weather and contrary winds prevented their embarkation for several months.

Edward, impatient to take revenge on his enemies, and to recover his lost authority, made an attempt to land with his forces on the coast of Norfolk, where he attempted to land in the vicinity of Cromer; but being there repulsed, he sailed northwards, and disembarked at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, on the 14th of March, though not without some opposition. Finding that the new magistrates, who had been appointed by the earl of Warwick, kept the people every where from joining him, he pretended, and even made oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but only the inheritance of the house of York, which of right belonged to him; and that he did not intend to disturb the peace of the kingdom. To convince the people of the sincerity of this declaration, he wore an ostrich feather, the ensign of prince Edward, in his hat; and commanded his followers to exclaim on their march, "Long live king Henry!" When he approached the city of York, he found the gates shut against him; nor could he obtain admittance till he had taken a solemn oath, in the presence of the mayor and aldermen, that he had no intention to lay claim to the crown---an oath which he renewed at the high altar of the cathedral.

It is probable that the earl of Warwick had received authentic intelligence of the motions and designs of Edward during his residence in Holland; as it appears that, so early as the 21st of December, 1470, a commission was given to his brother, the marquis of Montague, to arm all such as were capable of bearing arms in the five northern counties, for the purpose of repelling an expected invasion in those parts; and on the 28th of the same month, a similar commission was granted, for every other county in the kingdom, to the earl of Warwick, the earl of Oxford, and sir John Scroop. In the succeeding month, (January, 1471,) Warwick was constituted admiral of England; and, in conjunction with the duke of Clarence and earl of Pembroke, received another commission to array the Welsh. But we are not informed what progress these commissioners had made in the collection of troops when Edward landed at Ravenspur.

Edward having refreshed his few troops at York, began his march towards the south, in a situation which afforded but little prospect of success. The marquis of Montague was at Pomfret (Pontefract) with an army of six thousand men, and of course could have impeded his progress with facility; and Clarence and Warwick were on their march to meet him at the head of two powerful armies. Montague, however, to the astonishment of the whole kingdom, would not suffer his forces to move, and permitted Edward to pass without any interruption. No historian has assigned any satisfactory reason for this mysterious conduct, the true motive for which must remain enveloped in the same cloud with many other important events of this obscure period. Conjectures indeed have been offered on the subject; the most public of which is that of Stowe, who supposes that the marquis had received orders from the duke of Clarence not to fight till he should have joined him. Be that as it may, Edward was allowed to continue his march to Nottingham, where he received considerable reinforcements from lord Stanley, sir Thomas Parre, sir James Harrington, sir Thomas Montgomery, and others of the York party. Deeming himself now sufficiently strong to throw off the mask he had hitherto worn, he made known the true object of his enterprize; and, in direct violation of an oath the most solemn, assumed the title of king.

Warwick had assembled an army by this time, with which he marched to Leicester, with an intention of meeting and of giving battle to the enemy; but Edward, by taking the road to Coventry, passed him unmolested, and soon after presented himself before the gates of London. Had he here been refused admittance, he was totally undone: but there were many reasons which inclined the citizens to favour him. His numerous friends, to the amount of about two thousand, issuing from their sanctuaries, were active in his cause; many rich merchants, who had formerly lent him money, saw no other chance for their payment but his restoration; the city-dames, who had been liberal of their favours to him, and who still retained an affection for this young and gallant prince, swayed their husbands and friends in his favour (b); and above all the archbishop of York, Warwick's brother, to whom the care of the city was committed, had secretly, from unknown reasons, entered into a correspondence with him; and he facilitated Edward's admission into London, on the 11th of April. The most likely cause which can be assigned for those multiplied infidelities, even in the family of Nevil itself, is the spirit of faction, which, when it becomes inveterate, it is very difficult for any man entirely to shake off. The persons who had long distinguished themselves in the York party, were unable to act with zeal and cordiality for the support of the Lancastrians; and they were inclined, by any prospect of favour or accommodation offered them by Edward, to return to their ancient connexions. However (z) But although the duke of Burgundy, by appearing to neglect Edward, and by paying court to the established government, had endeavoured to conciliate the friendship of the Lancastrians, he found that he had not succeeded to his wish; and the connexions between the king of France and the earl of Warwick still held him in great anxiety. This nobleman, too hastily regarding Charles as a determined enemy, had sent over to Calais a body of four thousand men, who made inroads into the Low Countries.

(y) Liv. iii. chap. 4.

(a) Comines, liv. iii. chap. 6. (b) Comines liv. iii. chap. 7.

this may be, Edward's entrance into London made him master not only of that rich and powerful city, but also of the person of Henry, who, destined to be the perpetual sport of fortune, thus fell again into the hands of his enemies (c), and was immediately sent to the Tower.

It appears not that Warwick, during his short administration, which had continued only six months, had been guilty of any unpopular act, or had anywise deserved to lose that general favour with which he had so lately overwhelmed Edward. But this prince, who was formerly on the defensive, was now the aggressor; and having overcome the difficulties which always attend the beginnings of an insurrection, possessed many advantages above his enemy: his partizans were actuated by that zeal and courage which the notion of an attack inspires; his opponents were intimidated for a like reason; every one who had been disappointed in the hopes which he had entertained from Warwick's elevation, either became a cool friend or an open enemy to that nobleman: and each malcontent, from whatever cause, proved an accession to Edward's army. The king, therefore, found himself in a condition to face the earl of Warwick; who, being reinforced by his son-in-law the duke of Clarence, and his brother the marquis of Montague, took post at Barnet, in the neighbourhood of London. The arrival of queen Margaret was every day expected, who would have drawn together all the genuine Lancastrians, and have brought a great accession to Warwick's forces: but this very consideration proved a motive to the earl rather to hurry on a decisive action, than to share the victory with rivals and ancient enemies, who he foresaw would, in case of success, claim the chief merit in the enterprize (d). But while his jealousy was all directed towards that side, he overlooked the dangerous infidelity of friends, who lay the nearest to his bosom. His brother Montague, who had lately temporized, seems now to have remained sincerely attached to the interests of his family: but his son-in-law, though bound to him by every tie of honour and gratitude, though he shared the power of the regency, though he had been invested by Warwick in all the honours and patrimony of the house of York, resolved to fulfil the secret engagements which he had formerly taken with his brother, and to support the interests of his own family: he deserted to the king in the night-time, and carried over a body of twelve thousand men along with him (e). Warwick was now too far advanced to retreat; and as he rejected with disdain all terms of peace offered by Edward and Clarence, he was obliged to hazard a general engagement. The earl of Warwick encamped at Barnet on the 12th of April; and Edward, having marched from London, encamped in its neighbourhood on the evening of the same day. At the break of day, therefore, on Easterday, April 14, the earl drew up his troops in order of battle, and immediately attacked the king's forces with incredible fury. The battle was long, obstinate, and bloody. The two armies, in imitation of their leaders, displayed uncommon valour: and the victory remained long undecided between them. But an accident threw the balance to the side of the Yorkists. Edward's cognizance was a sun; that of Warwick a star with rays; and the mistiness of the morning rendering it difficult to distinguish them, the earl of Oxford, who fought on the side of the Lancastrians, was by mistake attacked by his friends, and chased off the field of battle (f). Warwick, contrary to his more usual practice, engaged that day on foot, resolving to show his army that he meant to share every fortune with them; and he was slain in the thickest of the engagement (g): his brother Montague underwent the same fate: and as Edward had issued orders not to give any quarter, a great and undistinguished slaughter was made in the pursuit (h). There fell about fifteen hundred on the side of the victors.

The same day on which this decisive battle was fought (i), queen Margaret and her son, now about eighteen years of age, and a young prince of great hopes, landed at Weymouth, supported by a small body of French forces. When this princess received intelligence of her husband's captivity, and of the defeat and death of the earl of Warwick, her courage, which had supported her under so many disasterous events, here quite left her; and she immediately foresaw all the dismal consequences of this calamity. At first she took sanctuary in the abbey of Beaulieu (k); but being encouraged by the appearance of Tudor earl of Pembroke, and Courtney earl of Devonshire, of the lords Wenloc and St. John, with other men of rank, who exhorted her still to hope for success, she resumed her former spirit, and determined to defend to the utmost the ruins of her fallen fortunes. She advanced through the counties of Devon, Somerset, and Gloucester, increasing her army on each day's march; but was at last overtaken by the rapid and expeditious Edward at Tewkesbury, on the banks of the Severn. The Lancastrians were here totally defeated, on the 4th of May, 1471: the earl of Devonshire and the lord Wenloc were killed in the field: the duke of Somerset, and about twenty other persons of distinction, having taken shelter in a church, were surrounded, dragged out, and immediately beheaded: about three thousand of their side fell in battle; and the army was entirely dispersed.

Queen Margaret and her son were taken prisoners: the former was sent to the Tower, where she suffered a tedious and painful confinement: but the prince was brought to the king, who asked him, after an insulting manner, how he dared to invade his dominions? The young prince, more mindful of his high birth than of his present fortune, replied, that he came thither to claim his just inheritance. The ungenerous Edward, insensible to pity, struck him on the face with his gauntlet; and the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, lord Hastings, and sir Thomas Grey, taking the blow as a signal for farther violence, hurried the prince into the next apartment, and there dispatched him with their daggers (l). King Henry expired in the the Tower a few days after the battle of Tewkesbury; but whether he died a natural or violent death is uncertain. It is certain, however, that Henry's death was sudden; and though he laboured under an ill state of health, this circumstance, joined to the general manners of this age, gave a natural ground of suspicion; which was rather increased than diminished by the exposing of the body to public view. That precaution served only to recal many similar instances in the English history, and to suggest the comparison (m).

All the hopes of the house of Lancaster seemed now to be utterly extinguished. Every legitimate prince of that family was dead: almost every great leader of the party had perished in battle or on the scaffold; the earl of Pembroke, who was levying forces in Wales, disbanded his army when he received intelligence of the battle of Tewkesbury; and he fled into Britanny with his nephew, the young earl of Richmond (n). Thomas Nevil, commonly called the bastard of Falconbridge, who had levied some forces, and had advanced to London during Edward's absence, was repulsed; his men deserted him; he was taken prisoner, and immediately executed (o): and peace being now fully restored to the nation, Edward, who had recently created his infant son prince of Wales, summoned a great council of prelates, peers, and a few knights, which met at Westminster on the 3rd of July; when all

(m) On the 21st of May, 1471, Edward returned to London; and, on the following morning, Henry the Sixth was found dead in his appartments in the Tower. That his death was therefore the effect of violence can scarcely admit of a doubt. Such indeed was the general belief of the times, as appears from the accounts of Philip de Comines, and the author of the Continuation of the Chronicle of Croyland, both of them contemporary writers.—How different to the tyrannical and sanguinary monster Edward was the unfortunate Henry! Though not endued with those splendid talents, and those active qualities of the mind, which are essential to the formation of a great monarch, he was possessed of every virtue which could entitle him to the more enviable character of a good man. Pious and devout; not more rigidly attentive to the external forms of religion than strictly observant of its principles and precepts; warmed with a Christian love for his fellow creatures that resisted the infectious cruelty of the times, and inspired him with sentiments of compassion and charity; in prosperity moderate, in adversity patient. With these endowments he had certainly a much stronger claim to the title of Philosopher than many of his biographers and historians who have stigmatized him for his imbecility.—Henry the Sixth founded the college of Eton; as well as King's College, Cambridge, for the reception of those students who had commenced their learning at Eton.—On the morning that succeeded his death, his body was exposed in the cathedral of St. Paul for public inspection. The day after it was sent, by water, to Chertsey, where it was interred; but it was afterwards removed from thence, by order of Richard the Third, to Windsor, and there buried with great solemnity.

THE PRINCE OF WALES BROUGHT BEFORE EDWARD IV.
AFTER THE BATTLE OF TEWKESBURY.

the members took a solemn oath to maintain the succession of the young prince, who was named after his father. The duke of Gloucester was the second temporal peer who took this oath. Though Edward never relaxed in his rigour to the laity in the smallest degree, the influence of the clergy was such as induced him to adopt a different line of conduct with them; at least with those from whom no danger was to be apprehended. From motives of policy therefore---for to more laudable sources can his actions never be traced---he pardoned several bishops who had taken an active part against him in the late contest. But, to make himself amends for these extraordinary exertions of lenity, he summoned a parliament on the sixth of October, which indulged him in the free use of attainders and confiscations, in the ratification of all his acts, and the recognition of his regal authority.

The tranquillity which succeeded the last active and memorable year suffered a short interruption from the return of the earl of Oxford, one of the few Lancastrians who had escaped from the battle of Tewkesbury, and retired to the continent. Having experienced a cool reception from Louis the Eleventh, in whose court he had sought for refuge, he contrived to assemble a small band of resolute followers, with whom he embarked for England; and landing at St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, took that fortress by surprize. The king, alarmed at this unexpected invasion, sent a strong detachment of troops to retake the place before Oxford could have been joined by his friends and adherents. The earl, however, defended himself with great bravery for some time; though he was at length obliged to capitulate, on the 15th of February, 1472, on condition that his life should be safe. But he lost his liberty, being imprisoned in the castle of Hammes, in the vicinity of Calais, where he remained no less than twelve years; while his extensive possessions were confiscated; and his countess, sister to the late earl of Warwick, was reduced to the necessity of earning a scanty subsistence by her needle. Edward likewise seized the effects and revenues of George Nevil, archbishop of York, to whom he was in a great measure indebted for his restoration to the throne; and although he had granted him a full pardon, he now sent him into confinement in the castle of Guisnes, under pretence of his having maintained a criminal correspondence with the earl of Oxford.

But all his severities could not exempt him from occasional disquietudes; and though no civil commotion now threatened to shake the stability of his throne, his domestic felicity was interrupted by a violent altercation which occurred between his brothers, the dukes of Gloucester and Clarence. Gloucester had entertained the design of espousing lady Anne Nevil, widow of the late prince of Wales, and one of the co-heiresses of the immense estates of the late earl of Warwick: but Clarence, who had married her eldest sister, from a spirit of rapaciousness that induced him to covet the whole of the succession, was anxious to prevent their union; and for that purpose he concealed the young lady so carefully as to elude the strictest researches for several months. At length, however, she was discovered, by the vigilance of Gloucester, in the dress of a cook maid, and placed in the sanctuary of St. Martin's. The cause of the two brothers was pleaded by themselves, before the king in council, with much warmth and acrimony, though the continuator of the Chronicle of Croyland observes, that the strength and solidity of their arguments excited the admiration of all who heard them. The decision was not less curious than the cause itself; Gloucester was allowed to marry the lady, but only to receive a small share of her portion, Clarence being suffered to retain the greatest part of it, while the mother of these opulent heiresses, from whom these immense riches were chiefly derived, was left in a state of absolute indigence. This dispute gave great uneasiness to Edward, who was also harrassed by perpetual fears of the young earl of Richmond, now resident in Britanny, on whom he knew all the secret friends of the house of Lancaster had cast their eyes. Anxious to have the earl in his power, he sent ambassadors to the duke of Britanny, to require that he would give him up; but that prince refused to commit so flagrant a violation of the laws of hospitality, as to comply with his demand; though he assured Edward that he would watch Richmond so closely that he should never have an opportunity of disturbing his government: in consideration of which promise, the king paid a yearly pension to the duke.

But this prince, who had been so firm, and active, and intrepid, during the course of adversity, was still unable to resist the allurements of a prosperous fortune; and he wholly devoted himself, as before, to pleasure and amusement, after he became entirely master of the kingdom, and had no longer any enemy who could give him any anxiety or alarm. He recovered, however, by this gay and inoffensive course of life, and by his easy familiar manners, that popularity which it is natural to imagine he had lost by the repeated cruelties exercised upon his enemies; and the example also of his jovial festivity served to abate the former acrimony of faction among his subjects, and to restore the social disposition which had been so long interrupted between the opposite parties. All men seemed to be fully satisfied with the present government; and the memory of past calamities served only to impress the people more strongly with a sense of their allegiance, and with the resolution of never incurring any more the hazard of renewing such direful scenes.

But while the king was thus indulging himself in pleasure, he was roused from his lethargy in 1474 by a prospect of foreign conquests, which it is probable his desire of popularity, more than the spirit of ambition, had made him covet. Though he deemed himself little beholden to the duke of Burgundy for the reception which that prince had given him during his exile (p), the political interests of their states maintained still a close connexion between them; and they agreed to unite their arms in making a powerful invasion on France. A league was formed, in which Edward stipulated to pass the seas with an army exceeding ten thousand men, and to invade the French territories: Charles promised to join him with all his forces: the king was to challenge the crown of France, and to obtain at least the provinces of Normandy and Guienne: the duke was to acquire Champaign and some other territories, and to free all his dominions from the burthen of homage to the crown of France; and neither party was to make peace without the consent of the other (q). They were the more encouraged to hope for success from this league, as the count of St. Pol, constable of France, who was master of St. Quintin, and other towns on the Somme, had secretly promised to join them; and there were also hopes of engaging the duke of Britanny to enter into the confederacy.

The prospect of a French war was always a sure means of making the parliament open their purses, as far as the habits of that age would permit. They voted the king a tenth of rents, or two shillings in the pound; which must have been very inaccurately levied, since it produced only thirty-one thousand four hundred and sixty pounds; and they added to this supply a whole fifteenth, and three quarters of another (r): but as the king deemed these sums still unequal to the undertaking, he attempted to levy money by way of benevolence; a kind of exaction which, except during the reigns of Henry III. and Richard II. had not been much practised in former times, and which, though the consent of the parties were pretended to be gained, could not be deemed entirely voluntary (s). The clauses annexed to the parliamentary grant show sufficiently the spirit of the nation in this respect. The money levied by the fifteenth was not to be put into the king's hands, but to be kept in religious houses; and if the expedition into France should not take place, it was immediately to be refunded to the people. After these grants the parliament was dissolved, which had sitten near two years and a half, and had undergone several prorogations; a practice not very usual at that time in England.

The king passed over to Calais, about Midsummer, 1475, with an army of one thousand five hundred men at arms, and fifteen thousand archers; attended by all the chief nobility of England, who, prognosticating future successes from the past, were eager to appear on this great theatre of honour (t). But all their sanguine hopes were damped when they found, on entering the French territories, that neither did the constable open his gates to them, nor the duke of Burgundy bring them the smallest assistance. That prince, transported by his ardent temper, had carried all his armies to a great distance, and had employed them in wars on the frontiers of Germany, and against the duke of Lorrain; and though he came in person to Edward, and endeavoured to apologize for this breach of treaty, there was no prospect that they would be able this campaign to make a conjunction with the English. This circumstance gave great disgust to the king, and inclined him to hearken to those advances which Louis continually made him for an accommodation.

That monarch, more swayed by political views than by the point of honour, deemed no submissions too mean, which might free him from enemies who had proved so formidable to his predecessors, and who, united to so many other enemies, might still shake the well-established government of France. It appears from Comines, that discipline was at this time very imperfect among the English; and that their civil wars, though long continued, yet being always decided by hasty battles, had still left them ignorant of the improvements which the military arts were beginning to receive upon the continent. But Louis was sensible that the warlike genius of the people would soon render them excellent soldiers, he was far from despising them for their present want of experience; and he employed all his art to detach them from the alliance of Burgundy. When Edward sent him a herald to claim the crown of France, and to carry him a defiance in case of refusal, so far from answering to this bravado in like haughty terms, he replied with great temper, and even made the herald a considerable present (u): he took afterwards an opportunity of sending a herald to the English camp; and having given him directions to apply to the lords Stanley and Howard, who he heard were friends to peace, he desired the good offices of these noblemen in promoting an accommodation with their master (v). As Edward was now fallen into like dispositions, a truce was concluded on the 29th of August, on terms more advantageous than honourable to Louis. He stipulated to pay Edward immediately seventy-five thousand crowns, on condition that he should withdraw his army from France, and promised to pay fifty thousand crowns a year during their joint lives; it was added, that the dauphin when of age should marry Edward's eldest daughter (w). In order to ratify this treaty, the two monarchs agreed to have a personal interview; and for that purpose suitable preparations were made at Pecquigni, near Amiens. A close rail was drawn across a bridge in that place, with no larger intervals than would allow the arm to pass; a precaution against a similar accident to that which befel the duke of Burgundy in his conference with the dauphin at Montereau. Edward and Louis came to the opposite sides; conferred privately together; and having confirmed their friendship, and interchanged many mutual civilities, they soon after parted (x).

Louis was anxious not only to gain the king's friendship, but also that of the nation, and of all the considerable persons in the English court. He bestowed pensions, to the amount of sixteen thousand crowns a year, on several of the king's favourites; on lord Hastings two thousand crowns; on lord Howard and others in proportion; and these great ministers were not ashamed thus to receive wages from a foreign prince (y). As the two armies, after the conclusion of the truce, remained some time in the neighbourhood of each other, the English were not only admitted freely into Amiens, where Louis resided, but had also their charges defrayed, and had wine and victuals furnished them in every inn, without any payments being demanded. They flocked thither in such multitudes, that once above nine thousand of them were in the town, and they might have made themselves masters of the king's person; but Louis concluding, from their jovial and dissolute manner of living, that they had no bad intentions, was careful not to betray the least sign of fear or jealousy. And when Edward, informed of this disorder, desired him to shut the gates against him, he replied, that he would never agree to exclude the English from the place where he resided; but that Edward, if he pleased, might recal them, and place his own officers at the gates of Amiens to prevent their returning (z).

Louis's desire of confirming a mutual amity with England engaged him even to make imprudent advances, which it cost him afterwards some pains to evade. In the conference at Pecquigni, he had said to Edward, that he wished to have a visit from him at Paris; that he would there endeavour to amuse him with the ladies; and that, in case any offences were then committed, he would assign him the cardinal of Bourbon for confessor, who from fellow-feeling would not be over and above severe in the penances which he would enjoin. This hint made deeper impression than Louis intended. Lord Howard, who accompanied him back to Amiens, told him, in confidence, that, if he were so disposed, it would not be impossible to persuade Edward to take a journey with him to Paris, where they might make merry together. Louis pretended at first not to hear the offer; but, on Howard's repeating it, he expressed his concern that his wars with the duke of Burgundy would not permit him to attend his royal guest, and do him the honours he intended. "Edward," said he, privately to Comines, "is a very handsome and a very amorous prince: some lady at Paris may like him as well as he shall do her; and may invite him to return in another manner. It is better that the sea be between us (a)."

This treaty did very little honour to either of these monarchs: it discovered the imprudence of Edward, who had taken his measures so ill with his allies, as to be obliged, after such an expensive armament, to return without making any acquisitions adequate to it: it showed the want of dignity in Louis, who, rather than run the hazard of a battle, agreed to subject his kingdom to a tribute, and thus acknowledge the superiority of a neighbouring prince, possessed of less power and territory than himself. But, as Louis made interest the sole test of honour, he thought that all the advantages of the treaty were on his side, and that he had over-reached Edward, by sending him out of France on such easy terms. For this reason he was very solicitous to conceal his triumph; and he strictly enjoined his courtiers never to show the English the least sign of mockery or derision. But he did not himself very carefully observe so prudent a rule: he could not forbear, one day, in the joy of his heart, throwing out some raillery on the easy simplicity of Edward and his council; when he perceived that he was overheard by a Gascon who had settled in England. He was immediately sensible of his indiscretion; sent a message to the gentleman; and offered him such advantages in his own country, as engaged him to remain in France. "It is but just," said he, "that I pay the penalty of my talkativeness (b)."

The most honourable part of Louis's treaty with Edward was the stipulation for the liberty of queen Margaret, who, though after the death of her husband and son, she could no longer be formidable to government, was still detained in custody by Edward. Louis paid fifty thousand crowns for her ransom; and that princess, who had been so active on the stage of the world, and who had experienced such a variety of fortune, passed the remainder of her days in tranquillity and privacy, till the year 1482, when she died: an admirable princess, but more illustrious by her undaunted spirit in adversity, than by her moderation in prosperity. She seems neither to have enjoyed the virtues, nor been subject to the weaknesses, of her sex; and was as much tainted with the ferocity as endowed with the courage of that barbarous age in which she lived.

Though Edward had so little reason to be satisfied with the conduct of the duke of Burgundy, he reserved to that prince a power of acceding to the treaty of Pecquigni: but Charles, when the offer was made him, haughtily replied, that he was able to support himself without the assistance of England, and that he would make no peace with Louis till three months after Edward's return into his own country. This prince possessed all the ambition and courage of a conqueror; but being defective in policy and prudence, qualities no less essential, he was unfortunate in all his enterprises, and perished at last in battle against the Swiss (c); a people whom he despised, and who, though brave and free, had hitherto been in a manner overlooked in the general system of Europe. This event, which happened in the year 1477, produced a great alteration in the views of all the princes, and was attended with consequences which were felt for many generations. Charles left only one daughter, Mary, by his first wife; and this princess being heir of his opulent and extensive dominions, was courted by all the potentates of Christendom, who contended for the possession of so rich a prize. Louis, the head of her family, might, by a proper application, have obtained this match for the dauphin, and have thereby united to the crown of France all the provinces of the Low Countries, together with Burgundy, Artois, and Picardy; which would at once have rendered his kingdom an overmatch for all its neighbours. But a man wholly interested is as rare as one entirely endowed with the opposite quality; and Louis, though impregnable to all the sentiments of generosity and friendship, was, on this occasion, carried from the road of true policy by the passions of animosity and revenge. He had imbibed so deep a hatred to the house of Burgundy, that he rather chose to subdue the princess by arms, than unite her to his family by marriage: he conquered the duchy of Burgundy and that part of Picardy, which had been ceded to Philip the Good by the treaty of Arras: but he thereby forced the states of the Netherlands to bestow their sovereign in marriage on Maximilian of Austria, son of the emperor Frederic, from whom they looked for protection in their present distresses: and by these means France lost the opportunity, which she never could recal, of making that important acquisition of power and territory.

During this interesting crisis, Edward was no less defective in policy, and was no less actuated by private passions, unworthy of a sovereign and a statesman. Jealousy of his brother Clarence had caused him to neglect the advances which were made of marrying that prince, now a widower, to the heiress of Burgundy (d); and he sent her proposals of espousing Anthony earl of Rivers, brother to his queen, who still retained an entire ascendant over him. But the match was rejected with disdain (e); and Edward, resenting this treatment of his brother-in-law, permitted France to proceed without interruption in her conquests over his defenceless ally. Any pretence sufficed him for abandoning himself entirely to indolence and pleasure, which were now become his ruling passions. The only object which divided his attention, was the improving of the public revenue, which had been dilapidated by the necessities or negligence of his predecessors; and some of his expedients for that purpose, though unknown to us, were deemed, during the time, oppressive to the people (f). The detail of private wrongs naturally escapes the notice of history; but an act of tyranny, of which Edward was guilty in his own family, has been taken notice of by all writers, and has met with general and deserved censure.

The duke of Clarence, by all his services in deserting Warwick, had never been able to regain the king's friendship, which he had forfeited by his former confederacy with that nobleman. He was still regarded at court as a man of a dangerous and a fickle character; and the imprudent openness and violence of his temper, though it rendered him much less dangerous, tended greatly to multiply his enemies, and to incense them against him. Among others, he had had the misfortune to give displeasure to the queen herself, as well as to his brother the duke of Gloucester, a prince of the deepest policy, of the most unrelenting ambition, and the least scrupulous in the means which he employed for the attainment of his ends. A combination between these potent adversaries being secretly formed against Clarence, it was determined to begin by attacking his friends; in hopes, that if he patiently endured this injury, his pusillanimity would dishonour him in the eyes of the public; if he made resistance, and expressed resentment, his passion would betray him into measures which might give them advantages against him. The king, hunting one day in the park of Thomas Burdet of Arrow, in Warwickshire, had killed a white buck, which was a great favourite of the owner; and Burdet, vexed at the loss, said, in a passion, that he wished the horns of the deer were in the belly of the person who had advised the king to commit that insult upon him. This natural expression of resentment, which would have been overlooked or forgotten had it fallen from any other person, was rendered criminal and capital in that gentleman, by the friendship in which he had the misfortune to live with the duke of Clarence; he was tried for his life; the judges and jury were found servile enough to condemn him; and he was publicly beheaded at Tyburn for this pretended offence (g). About the same time, one John Stacey, an ecclesiastic, much connected with the duke, as well as with Burdet, was exposed to a like iniquitous and barbarous prosecution. This clergyman, being more learned in mathematics and astronomy than was usual in that age, lay under the imputation of necromancy with the ignorant vulgar; and the court laid hold of this popular rumour to effect his destruction. He was brought to his trial for that imaginary crime; many of the greatest peers countenanced the prosecution by their presence; he was condemned, put to the torture, and executed (h).

The duke of Clarence was alarmed when he found these acts of tyranny exercised on all around him: he reflected on the fate of the good duke of Gloucester in the last reign, who, after seeing the most infamous pretences employed for the destruction of his nearest connexions, at last fell himself a victim to the vengeance of his enemies. Soon after the executions of Burdet and Stacey, the duke of Clarence went to the council chamber, attended by one Goddard, a celebrated divine, who had assisted the sufferers in their last moments; where he delivered copies of the declarations, both private and public, which those persons had made of their innocency, and then withdrew.

Edward, determined to seize on the first pretext his brother should afford him, however frivolous or contemptible, made this proceeding a ground of criminal accusation against Clarence. He forthwith summoned a council of peers and prelates, to which he invited the mayor and aldermen to attend; and inveighed with extreme virulence against the duke, whose most trifling indiscretions he was studious to magnify into crimes of the deepest dye; and whose last imprudence he represented as an act of high treason. The council, with that base obsequiousness which marked every assembly throughout this tyrannical reign, agreed with Edward that he should be immediately committed to the Tower, from whence he was remanded, on the 16th of January, 1478, to be tried before the House of Peers, the supreme tribunal of the nation (i).

The duke was accused of arraigning public justice, by maintaining the innocence of men who had been condemned in courts of judicature; and of inveighing against the iniquity of the king, who had given orders for their prosecution (k). Many rash expressions were imputed to him, and some too reflecting on Edward's legitimacy; but he was not accused of any overt act of treason; and even the truth of these speeches may be doubted of, since the liberty of judgement was taken from the court, by the king's appearing personally as his brother's accuser (l), and pleading the cause against him. But a sentence of condemnation, even when this extraordinary circumstance had not taken place, was a necessary consequence in those times, of any prosecution by the court or the prevailing party; and the duke of Clarence was condemned, and sentence of death was pronounced on him by Henry duke of Buckingham, who acted in the capacity of High Steward on this memorable occasion. The house of commons were no less slavish and unjust: they both petitioned for the execution of the duke, and afterwards passed a bill of attainder against him (m). Clarence was accordingly put to death in the Tower privately, on the 11th of March; but by whom or in what manner, remains a secret. The continuator of the History of Croyland, who was a contemporary writer, and who gives the most ample detail of the different proceedings in this dark and infamous transaction, is wholly silent as to the mode of his execution; which affords a strong presumption that he was ignorant of it. Fabian, who was very young at the time, tells us that he was drowned in a butt of malmesey, by his own desire, Edward having given him the choice of his death; but, in this assertion, it is more than probable, that he was guided by mere popular report. As the duke was fond of that liquor, it is by no means improbable, that his assassins might have purposely propagated such a report, in order, by dressing a tragical fact in a ridiculous habit, to diminish in some measure that degree of horror with which the mind must be naturally impressed on the contemplation of a murder attended with such aggravated circumstances. Many of the duke of Clarence's estates were, after his death granted by the king to the earl of Rivers, under the curious pretence that the soul of the deceased would receive more benefit from the grant of his estates to a person he had so greatly injured.

The measures of the parliament, during that age, furnish us with examples of a strange contrast of freedom and servility: they scruple to grant, and sometimes refuse, to the king the smallest supplies, the most necessary for the support of government, even the most necessary for the maintenance of wars, for which the nation, as well as the parliament itself, expressed great fondness: but they never scruple to concur in the most flagrant act of injustice or tyranny, which falls on any individual, however distinguished by birth or merit. These maxims, so ungenerous, so opposite to all principles of good government, so contrary to the practice of present parliaments, are very remarkable in all the transactions of the English history, for more than a century after the period in which we are now engaged.

The duke left two children by the elder daughter of the earl of Warwick; a son, created an earl by his grandfather's title, and a daughter, afterwards countess of Salisbury. Both this prince and princess were also unfortunate in their end, and died a violent death; a fate which for many years attended almost all the descendants of the royal blood in England. There prevails a report, that a chief source of the violent prosecution of the duke of Clarence, whose name was George, was a current prophecy, that the king's son should be murdered by one, the initial letter of whose name was G (n). It is not impossible but, in those ignorant times, such a silly reason might have some influence: but it is more probable that the whole story is the invention of a subsequent period, and founded on the murder of these children by the duke of Gloucester. Comines remarks, that, at that time, the English never were without some superstitious prophecy or other, by which they accounted for every event.

All the glories of Edward's reign terminated with the civil wars; where his laurels too were extremely sullied with blood, violence, and cruelty. His spirit seems afterwards to have been sunk in indolence and pleasure, or his measures were frustrated by imprudence and the want of foresight. There was no object on which he was more intent than to have all his daughters settled by splendid marriages, though most of these princesses were yet in their infancy, and though the completion of his views, it was obvious, must depend on numberless accidents, which were impossible to be foreseen or prevented. His eldest daughter, Elizabeth, was contracted to the dauphin; his second, Cicely, to the eldest son of James III. king of Scotland; his third, Anne, to Philip only son of Maximilian and the duchess of Burgundy; his fourth, Catharine, to John son and heir to Ferdinand king of Arragon, and Isabella queen of Castile (o). None of these projected marriages took place; and the king himself saw, in his life-time, the rupture of the first, that with the dauphin, for which he had always discovered a peculiar fondness. Louis, who paid no regard to treaties or engagements, found his advantage in contracting the dauphin to the princess Margaret daughter of Maximilian; and the king, notwithstanding his indolence, prepared to revenge the indignity. The French monarch, eminent for prudence as well as perfidy, endeavoured to guard against the blow; and by a proper distribution of presents in the court of Scotland, he incited James to make war upon England. This prince, who lived on bad terms with his nobility, and whose force was very unequal to the enterprize, levied an army; but when he was ready to enter England, the barons, conspiring against his favourites, put them to death without trial; and the army presently disbanded. The duke of Gloucester, attended by the duke of Albany, James's brother, who had been banished his country, entered Scotland at the head of an army, took Berwick, and obliged the Scots to accept of a peace, by which they resigned that fortress to Edward. This success emboldened the king to think more seriously of a French war; but while he was making preparations for that enterprize, he was seized with a distemper, of which he expired, on the 9th of April, 1483, in the forty-second year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

In point of external grace and beauty of countenance, Edward the Fourth is said to have equalled all, and excelled most, of the princes which had worn the crown before him: but a course of luxury and intemperance gradually detracted from the elegance of his appearance, by occasioning an ungraceful corpulence. His manners were polished without affectation; his talents of persuasion were irresistible; and he had the art of subduing clamour and discontent by the insinuating affability of his address, and the engaging frankness of his deportment. His understanding was far from being contemptible; and, though he was duped by the artful Louis, whose whole life was employed in artifice and dissimulation, he was not destitute of political sagacity. It has been remarked, however, that he was less qualified to prevent misfortunes by wise precautions, than to remedy them, after they had occurred, by rigorous and decisive conduct. This observation is exemplified in various parts of his reign; and we may perhaps impute the circumstance more to his extravagant love of pleasure, and to the indolence which arose from that source, than to an original want of penetration or judgement. When the near approach of danger called forth his exertions, he was remarkably active; but when years of peace succeeded, he gave way to idleness and debauchery, and, while immured in a sea of pleasure, too easily resigned himself to the guidance of his queen and her favourites.

Edward the Fourth particularly shone in the military department. The many battles that he won against experienced officers, may be considered as ample testimonials of his warlike talents. But his early initiation in the practice of slaughter seems to have inspired him with a tincture of cruelty, of which he never divested himself in the sequel. With much apparent mildness and complacency in social life, he mingled in his public character, a strong propensity to cool bloodshed and inhuman revenge. It is an invalid excuse to assign, that the Lancastrians gave the example of ferocity, in the execution of their prisoners of rank. A practice so brutal did not merit imitation; and Edward's cause was not so destitute of support as to require the deliberate extermination of the chief advocates of the opposite party of men, who had committed no other crime than that of adhering to a family which had filled the throne, with the assent of the parliament and the nation, for above half a century. Besides the numerous executions of the Lancastrians, other proofs occur of this monarch's sanguinary disposition. His treatment of his brother the duke of Clarence and his friends cannot be justified without the suspicion of that partiality which has induced some historians to celebrate the compassionate and merciful character of a prince whose whole reign falsifies the eulogium.

He affected such a zeal for religion, and such a regard for the clergy, that a contemporary monk represents him as "a most severe enemy of heretics, a most affectionate patron of wise and learned ecclesiastics, a most devout venerator of the sacraments of the church, and a sincere penitent for his misdeeds (p)." But we may justly question the piety of one who violated without scruple the obligation of oaths, and laboured to cement his throne with the blood of those persons whom his tyrannical suspicions marked out as enemies.

In his earlier years, he was liberal and generous, but he gradually became more sparing of his distributions, and more inclined to amass wealth. To supply his pleasures, and also give scope to his desire of accumulation, he practised various arts of rapacity; but, in point of parliamentary imposts, his reign was not oppressive.

Edward the Fourth had, by Elizabeth, his queen, three sons and seven daughters, viz. Edward, prince of Wales, who succeeded him in the throne, being in the thirteenth year of his age when his father died; Richard, duke of York, then in his ninth year; George, who died in his infancy; Elizabeth, who was contracted to the dauphin of France, and afterwards married Henry the Seventh, king of England; Mary, bethrothed to the king of Denmark, who died before marriage; Cecilia, contracted to James king of Scotland, first married to John viscount Wells, and afterwards to Sir John Kyme; Margaret, who died an infant; Anne, contracted to Philip of Burgundy, and married to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; Bridget, who took the veil, and died in the nunnery at Dartford; and Catharine, married to William Courteney, earl of Devonshire.

His natural children were, Arthur Plantagenet, born of Elizabeth Lucy, and created lord Lisle in the reign of Henry the Eighth; and Elizabeth Plantagenet, married

CHAP. II.

EDWARD V.

THE principal transactions of the reign on which we are about to enter, as well as of that which succeeds it, are involved in such obscurity, as to have given rise to serious doubts on the very existence of events which, till lately, had been received as established facts. The pen of historical scepticism has been employed—with more ingenuity, indeed, than candour—in attacking the characters of authors, whose veracity had been deemed irreproachable; and in representing, as a model of meekness and patience, a prince whose life had always been considered as one continued scene of vicious and tyrannical actions.

The only contemporary historians of these reigns are John Fabian, a merchant of London; and the Continuator of the Chronicle of Croyland, a doctor of the canon law, and one of the king's counsellors. That the facts related by them ought to obtain credit, is not contradicted by authentic records, or at least controverted by presumptive evidence so strong as almost to possess the force of absolute proof, no person, who is not more anxious to confirm doubts than to establish truth, will attempt to deny. The information, however, furnished by these writers, is far from copious: recourse therefore has been had to the testimony of Sir Thomas More, chancellor to Henry the Eighth, from whom the generality of modern historians have derived their intelligence; and though Sir Thomas was only three years old on the accession of Edward the Fifth, he was certainly not so far removed from the period in question as to be unable to acquire a full and compleat knowledge of the transactions he relates with equal precision, candour, and eloquence: while the singular probity of his mind, and the known magnanimity of his conduct, cannot fail to give his evidence a degree of credit which modern sceptics have in vain attempted to diminish. From an attentive consideration of the credit due to these authorities; from a thorough investigation of the objections opposed to them; a close comparison of stated facts with relative circumstances; and, finally, from strict researches into every possible source of information; we have endeavoured to form an impartial history of a reign in which much must inevitably be left to conjecture.

During the later years of Edward IV. the nation having, in a great measure, forgotten the bloody feuds between the two roses, and peaceably acquiescing in the established government, was agitated only by some court-intrigues, which, being restrained by the authority of the king, seemed nowise to endanger the public tranquillity. These intrigues arose from the perpetual rivalship between two parties; one consisting of the queen and her relations, particularly the earl of Rivers her brother, and the marquis of Dorset her son; the other composed of the ancient nobility, who envied the sudden growth and unlimited credit of that aspiring family (q). At the head of this latter party was the duke of Buckingham, a man of very noble birth, of ample possessions, of great alliances, of shining parts; who, though he had married the queen's sister, was too haughty to act in subserviency to her inclinations, and aimed rather at maintaining an independent influence and authority. Lord Hastings, the chamberlain, was another leader of the same party; and as this nobleman had, by his bravery and activity, as well as by his approved fidelity, acquired the confidence and favour of his master, he had been able, though with some difficulty, to support himself against the credit of the queen. The lords Howard and Stanley maintained a connexion with these two noblemen, and brought a considerable accession of influence and reputation to their party. All the other barons, who had no particular dependence on the queen, adhered to the same interest; and the people in general, from their natural envy against the prevailing power, bore great favour to the cause of these noblemen.

But Edward knew that, though he himself had been able to overawe those rival factions, many disorders might arise from their contests during the minority of his son; and he therefore took care, in his last illness, to summon together several of the leaders on both sides, and, by composing their ancient quarrels, to provide, as far as possible, for the future tranquillity of the government. After expressing his intentions that his brother the duke of Gloucester, then absent in the north, should be entrusted with the regency, he recommended to them peace and unanimity during the tender years of his son; represented to them the dangers which must attend the continuance of their animosities; and engaged them to embrace each other with all the appearance of the most cordial reconciliation. But this temporary or feigned agreement lasted no longer than the king's life: he had no sooner expired, than the jealousies of the parties broke out afresh: and each of them applied, by separate messages, to the duke of Gloucester, and endeavoured to acquire his favour and friendship.

This prince, during his brother's reign, had endeavoured to live on good terms with both parties; and his high birth, his extensive abilities, and his great services, had enabled him to support himself without falling into a dependance on either. But the new situation of affairs, when the supreme power was devolved upon him, immediately changed his measures; and he secretly determined to preserve no longer that neutrality which he had hitherto maintained. His exorbitant ambition, unrestrained by any principle either of justice or humanity, made him carry his views to the possession of the crown itself; and as this object could not be attained without the ruin of the queen and her family, he fell, without hesitation, into concert with the opposite party. But being sensible, that the most profound dissimulation was requisite for effecting his criminal purposes, he redoubled his professions of zeal and attachment to that princess; and he gained such credit with her, as to influence her conduct in a point, which, as it was of the utmost importance, was violently disputed between the opposite factions.

The young king, at the time of his father's death, resided in the castle of Ludlow, on the borders of Wales; whither he had been sent, that the influence of his presence might overawe the Welch, and restore the tranquillity of that country, which had been disturbed by some late commotions (r). His person was committed to the care of his uncle, the earl of Rivers, the most accomplished nobleman in England, who, having united an uncommon taste for literature (s) to great abilities in business, and valour in the field, was entitled, by his talents, still more than by nearness of blood, to direct and superintend the education of the young monarch. The queen and her friends, after a consultation on the subject, wrote to the earl of Rivers, that he should levy a body of forces, in order to escort the king to London, to protect him during his coronation, and to keep him from falling into the hands of their enemies. The opposite faction, sensible that Edward was now of an age when great advantages could be made of his name and countenance, and was approaching to the age when he would be legally entitled to exert in person his authority, foresaw, that the tendency of this measure was to perpetuate their subjection under their rivals; and they vehemently opposed a resolution which they represented as the signal for renewing a civil war in the kingdom. Lord Hastings threatened to depart instantly to his government of Calais (t): the other nobles seemed resolute to oppose force by force; and as the duke of Gloucester, on pretence of pacifying the quarrel, had declared against all appearance of an armed power, which might be dangerous, and was nowise necessary, the queen, trusting to the sincerity of his friendship, and overawed by so violent an opposition, recalled her orders to her brother, and desired him to bring up no greater retinue than should be necessary to support the state and dignity of the young sovereign (u).

The duke of Gloucester, meanwhile, set out from York, attended by a numerous train of the northern gentry. When he reached Northampton, he was joined by the duke of Buckingham, who was also attended by a splendid retinue; and as he heard that the king was hourly expected on that road, he resolved to wait his arrival, under colour of conducting him thence in person to London. The earl of Rivers, apprehensive that the place would be too narrow to contain so many attendants, sent his pupil forward by another road to Stony-Stratford; and remained himself in Northampton, in order to concert measures with Gloucester—of whose designs he was not yet aware—for the approaching coronation. He was received with the greatest appearance of cordiality: he passed the evening in an amicable manner with Gloucester and Buckingham: he proceeded on the road with them next day to join the king: but as he was entering Stony-Stratford, he was arrested by orders from the duke of Gloucester, on the first of May (v): sir Richard Grey, one of the queen's sons, and uterine brother to Edward, was at the same time put under a guard, together with sir Thomas Vaughan, who possessed a considerable office in the king's household; and all the prisoners were instantly conducted to Pomfret in Yorkshire. At the same time they dismissed all the other attendants of the king; and issued a proclamation, forbidding them to approach the court under pain of death (w). Gloucester having secured his prisoners, approached the young prince with the greatest demonstrations of respect; and endeavoured to satisfy him with regard to the violence committed on his uncle and brother: but Edward, much attached to these near relations, by whom he had been tenderly educated, was not so much a master of dissimulation as to conceal his displeasure (x).

The queen no sooner received intelligence of her brother's imprisonment, than she became justly alarmed for the safety of her family, and wisely concluding that the man who had dared to proceed thus far, would not hesitate to proceed much farther; she foresaw that from Gloucester's violence her own ruin, if not that of all her children, was finally determined. She therefore fled into the sanctuary of Westminster, attended by the marquis of Dorset; and she carried thither the five princesses, together with the duke of York (y). She trusted, that the ecclesiastical privileges which had formerly given her protection against the fury of the Lancastrian faction, would not now be violated by her brother-in-law, while her son was on the throne; and she resolved to await there the return of better fortune.

When intelligence was brought to London of the violent proceedings of the duke of Gloucester, it gave rise to the utmost confusion. The friends of either party, in great crowds, and some of them armed, had frequent meetings and consultations: the royalists met in Westminster; and the adherents of Gloucester, headed by lord Hastings, in the city; but as the real intentions of those who had possession of the king's person could not be known, no resolutions of a decisive nature were adopted.

The duke of Gloucester, anxious to have the duke of York in his power, proposed to take him by force from the sanctuary at Westminster; and he represented to the privy-council, both the indignity put upon the government by the queen's ill-grounded apprehensions, and the necessity of the young prince's appearance at the ensuing coronation of his brother. It was farther urged, that ecclesiastical privileges were originally intended only to give protection to unhappy men persecuted for their debts or crimes; and were entirely useless to a person who, by reason of his tender age, could not lie under the burden of either, and who, for the same reason, was utterly incapable of claiming security from any sanctuary. But the two archbishops, cardinal Bourchier the primate, and Thomas Rotherham, archbishop of York, protesting against the sacrilege of this measure, it was agreed, that they should first endeavour to bring the queen to compliance by persuasion, before any violence should be employed against her. These prelates were persons of known integrity and honour; and being themselves entirely persuaded of the duke's good intentions, they employed every argument, accompanied with earnest entreaties, exhortations, and assurances, to bring her over to the same opinion. She long continued obstinate, and insisted, that the duke of York, by living in the sanctuary, was not only secure himself, but gave security to the king, whose life no one would dare to attempt, while his successor and avenger remained in safety. But finding that none supported her in these sentiments, and that force, in case of refusal was threatened by the council, she at last complied, and produced her son to the two prelates. She was here on a sudden struck with a kind of presage of his future fate: she tenderly embraced him; she bedewed him with tears; and bidding him an eternal adieu, delivered him, with many expressions of regret and reluctance, into their custody (z). The duke of York was therefore immediately conducted to the Tower, and delivered to the Protector. This happened on the 16th of June, 1483, three days after her brother and son had been murdered at Pomfret; and of which cruelty she had been kept entirely ignorant.

The duke of Gloucester, being the nearest male of the royal family capable of exercising the government, seemed entitled, by the customs of the realm, to the office of protector; and the council, not waiting for the consent of parliament, made no scruple of investing him with that high dignity (a). The general prejudice entertained by the nobility against the queen and her kindred, occasioned this precipitation and irregularity; and no one foresaw any danger to the succession, much less to the lives of the young princes, from a measure so obvious and so natural. Besides that the duke had hitherto been able to cover, by the most profound dissimulation, his fierce and savage nature; the numerous issue of Edward, together with the two children of Clarence, seemed to be an eternal obstacle to his ambition; and it appeared equally impracticable for him to destroy so many persons possessed of a preferable title, and imprudent to exclude them. But a man who had abandoned all principles of honour and humanity, was soon carried by his predominant passion beyond the reach of fear or precaution; and Gloucester, having so far succeeded in his views, no longer hesitated in removing the other obstructions which lay between him and the throne. The death of the earl of Rivers, and of the other prisoners detained in Pomfret, was first determined; and he easily obtained the consent of the duke of Buckingham, as well as of lord Hastings, to this violent and sanguinary measure. However easy it was in those times, to procure a sentence against the most innocent person, it appeared still more easy to dispatch an enemy, without any trial or form of process; and orders were accordingly issued to sir Richard Ratcliffe, a proper instrument in the hands of this tyrant, to cut off the heads of the prisoners. The protector then assailed the fidelity of Buckingham by all the arguments capable of swaying a vicious mind, which knew no motive of action but interest and ambition. He represented, that the execution of persons so nearly related to the king, whom that prince so openly professed to love, and whose fate he so much resented, would never pass unpunished; and all the actors in that scene were bound in prudence to prevent the effects of his future vengeance: that it would be impossible to keep the queen for ever at a distance from her son, and equally impossible to prevent her from instilling into his tender mind the thoughts of retaliating, by like executions, the sanguinary insults committed on her family: that the only method of obviating these mischiefs was to put the sceptre in the hands of a man of whose friendship the duke might be assured, and whose years and experience taught him to pay respect to merit, and to the rights of ancient nobility: and that the same necessity which had carried them so far in resisting the usurpation of these intruders, must jussify them in attempting farther innovations, and in making, by national consent, a new settlement of the succession. To these reasons he added the offers of great private advantages to the duke of Buckingham; and he easily obtained from him a promise of supporting him in all his enterprizes.

The duke of Gloucester, knowing the importance of gaining lord Hastings, sounded at a distance his sentiments, by means of Catesby, a lawyer, who lived in great intimacy with that nobleman; but found him impregnable in his allegiance and fidelity to the children of Edward, who had ever honoured him with his friendship (b). He saw, therefore, that there were no longer any measures to be kept with him; and he determined to ruin utterly the man whom he despaired of engaging to concur in his usurpation. On the very day (June 13,) when Rivers, Grey, and Vaughan were executed, or rather murdered at Pomfret, by the advice of Hastings, the protector summoned a council in the Tower; whither that nobleman, suspecting no design against himself, repaired without hesitation. The duke of Gloucester was capable of committing the most bloody and treacherous murders with the utmost coolness and indifference. On taking his place at the council-table, he appeared in the most jovial humour imaginable. He seemed to indulge himself in familiar conversation with the counsellors, before they should enter on business; and having paid some compliments to Morton bishop of Ely, on the good and early strawberries which he raised in his garden at Holborn, he begged the favour of having a dish of them, which that prelate immediately dispatched a servant to bring to him. The protector then left the council, as if called away by some other business; but soon after returning with a ferocious countenance, he asked them what punishment those deserved that had plotted against his life, who was so nearly related to the king, and was entrusted with the administration of government? Hastings replied, that they merited the punishment of traitors. "These traitors," cried the protector, "are the sorceress, my brother's wife, and Jane Shore his mistress, with others their associates: see to what a condition they have reduced me by their incantations and witchcraft!" Upon which he laid bare his left arm, all shrivelled and decayed. But the counsellors, who knew that this infirmity had attended him from his birth, looked on each other with amazement; and above all lord Hastings, who, as he had since Edward's death engaged in an intrigue with Jane shore, was naturally anxious concerning the issue of these extraordinary proceedings. "Certainly, my lord," said he, "if they be guilty of these crimes they deserve the severest punishment."---"And do you reply to me," exclaimed the protector, "with your ifs and your ands? You are the chief abettor of that witch Shore: you are yourself a traitor: and I swear by St. Paul, that I will not dine before your head be brought me." He then struck the table with his hand; armed men rushed in at the signal; the counsellors were thrown into the utmost consternation; and one of the guards, as if by accident or mistake, aimed a blow with a poll-axe at lord Stanley, who aware of the danger, slunk under the table; and though he saved his life, received a severe wound in the head in the protector's presence. Hastings was seized, was hurried away, and instantly beheaded on a timber-log which lay in the court of the Tower (c). Two hours after, a proclamation, well penned and fairly written, was read to the citizens of London, enumerating his offences, and apologising to them, from the suddenness of the discovery, for the sudden execution of that nobleman, who was very popular among them: but the saying of a merchant was much talked of on the occasion, who remarked, 'that the proclamation was certainly drawn by the spirit of prophecy (d).

(w) These are stubborn facts, which the most strenuous of Gloucester's apologists have not ventured to call in question. "And thus far," says Mr. Walpole, "he (the duke of Gloucester) acted as most princes would have done in his situation, in a lawless and barbarous age." In other words, he acted like a treacherous and sanguinary tyrant, whom no attention to the laws, no ties of honour, no principles of loyalty, no considerations of justice, could restrain from pursuing the projects of an ambitious mind. He acted like a daring rebel, in violently seizing the person of his sovereign, in imprisoning his relations, and in exercising an act of regal authority. "The barbarism of the age," affords but a pitiful palliation of such flagrant conduct; like state necessity, the tyrant's universal plea to sanction injustice, violence, murder, or oppression, it can only be employed by those who seek to justify tyrannical actions.

Lord Stanley, the archbishop of York, the bishop of Ely, and other counsellors, were committed prisoners in the different chambers of the Tower: and the protector, in order to carry on the farce of his accusations, ordered the goods of Jane Shore to be seized; and he summoned her to answer before the council for sorcery and witchcraft. But as no proofs which could be received even in that ignorant age were produced against her, he directed her to be tried in the spiritual court for her adulteries and lewdness; and she did penance in a white sheet at St. Paul's, before the whole people (e).

These acts of violence, exercised against all the nearest connexions of the late king, prognosticated the severest fate to his defenceless children; and after the murder of Hastings, the protector no longer made a secret of his intentions to usurp the crown. The licentious life of Edward, who was not restrained in his pleasures either by honour or prudence, afforded a pretence for declaring his marriage with the queen invalid, and all his posterity illegitimate. It was asserted, that before espousing the lady Elizabeth Grey, he paid court to the lady Eleanor Talbot, daughter of the earl of Shrewsbury; and being repulsed by the virtue of that lady, he was obliged, ere he could gratify his desires, to consent to a private marriage, without any witnesses, by Stillington bishop of Bath, who afterwards divulged the secret (f). It was also maintained, that the act of attainder passed against the duke of Clarence had virtually incapacitated his children from succeeding to the crown; and these two families being set aside, the protector remained the only true and legitimate heir of the house of York. But as it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove the preceding marriage of the late king and as the rule, which excludes the heirs of an attainted blood from private successions, was never extended to the crown; the protector resolved to make use of another plea still more shameful and scandalous. His partizans were taught to maintain, that both Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence were illegitimate; that the duchess of York had received different lovers into her bed, who were the fathers of these children; and their resemblance to those gallants was a sufficient proof of their spurious birth; and the duke of Gloucester alone, of all her sons, appeared by his features and countenance to be the true offspring of the duke of York. Nothing can be imagined more impudent than this assertion, which threw so foul an imputation on his own mother, a princess of irreproachable virtue, and then alive; yet the place chosen for first promulgating it was the pulpit, before a large congregation, and in the protector's presence. Dr. Ralph Shaw, a popular preacher, and brother to the lord mayor, was appointed to sound the inclinations of the people in a sermon, which he was directed to preach at Paul's Cross, on Sunday, the 22nd of June. Accordingly, on the day agreed upon, he repaired to that place, and took for his text a passage out of the Apocrypha, viz. "Bastard slips shall not prosper." He enlarged on all the topics which could discredit the birth of Edward IV. the duke of Clarence, and of all their children. He then broke out in a panegyric on the duke of Gloucester; and exclaimed, "Behold this excellent prince, the express image of his noble father, the genuine descendant of the house of York; bearing, no less in the virtues of his mind, than in the features of his countenance, the character of the gallant Richard, once your hero and favourite: he alone is entitled to your allegiance: he must deliver you from the dominion of all intruders: he alone can restore the lost glory and honour of the nation." It was previously concerted, that as the doctor should pronounce these words, the duke of Gloucester should make his appearance; and it was expected that the audience would cry out "God save king Richard!" which would immediately have been laid hold of as a popular consent, and interpreted to be the voice of the nation: but by a ridiculous mistake, worthy of the whole scene, the duke did not appear till after this exclamation was already recited by the preacher. The doctor was therefore obliged to repeat this rhetorical figure out of its proper place: the audience, less from the absurd conduct of the discourse, than from their detestation of these proceedings, kept a profound silence; and the protector and his preacher were equally abashed at the ill success of their stratagem.

The duke, however, was too far advanced to recede from his criminal and ambitious purpose. A new expedient was tried to work on the people. The lord mayor, who was entirely in the protector's interests, called an assembly of the citizens on the 24th of June, two days after the above famous sermon had been preached by his brother; where the duke of Buckingham, who possessed some talents for eloquence, harangued them on the protector's title to the crown, and displayed those numerous virtues of which he pretended that prince was possessed. He next asked them, whether they would have the duke for king? and then stopped, in expectation of hearing the cry, "God save king Richard!" He was surprised to observe them silent; and turning about to the mayor asked him the reason. The mayor replied, that perhaps they did not understand him. Buckingham then repeated his discourse with some variation; enforced the same topics, asked the same question, and was received with the same silence. "I now see the cause;" said the mayor; "the citizens are not accustomed to be harrangued by any but their recorder; and know not how to answer a person of your grace's quality." The recorder, Fitz-Williams, was then commanded to repeat the substance of the duke's speech; but the man, who was averse to the office, took care, throughout his whole discourse, to have it understood that he spoke nothing of himself, and that he only conveyed to them the sense of the duke of Buckingham. Still the audience kept a profound silence: "This is wonderful obstinacy," cried the duke: "Express your meaning, my friends, one way or other: when we apply to you on this occasion, it is merely from the regard which we bear to you. The lords and commons have sufficient authority, without your consent, to appoint a king: but I require you here to declare, in plain terms, whether or not you will have the duke of Gloucester for your sovereign?" After all these efforts some of the lower class, incited by the protector's and Buckingham's servants, raised a feeble cry, "God save king Richard (g)!" The sentiments of the people were now sufficiently declared: the voice of the people was the voice of God; and Buckingham, with the mayor, hastened the next day (June 25) to Baynard's Castle, where the protector then resided, that they might make him a tender of the crown.

(e) This lady was born of reputable parents in London, was well educated, and married to a substantial citizen; but unhappily, views of interest, more than the maid's inclinations, had been consulted in the match, and her mind, though framed for virtue, had proved unable to resist the allurements of the libidinous Edward, who solicited her favours. But while seduced from her duty by this licentious monarch, she still made herself respectable by her other virtues; and the ascendant which her charms and vivacity long maintained over him, was all employed in acts of beneficence and humanity. She was still forward to oppose calumny, to protect the oppressed, to relieve the indigent; and her good offices, the genuine dictates of her heart, never waited the solicitation of presents, or the hopes of reciprocal services. But she lived not only to feel the bitterness of shame imposed on her by this tyrant, but to experience, in old age and poverty, the ingratitude of those courtiers who had long solicited her friendship, and been protected by her credit. No one, among the great multitude whom she had obliged, had the humanity to bring her consolation or relief: she languished out her life in solitude and indigence; and amidst a court, inured to the most atrocious crimes, the frailties of this woman justified all violations of friendship towards her, and all neglect of former obligations.

When Richard was told that a great multitude was in the court, he refused to appear to them, and pretended to be apprehensive for his personal safety: a circumstance taken notice of by Buckingham, who observed to the citizens that the prince was ignorant of what had passed. At last he was persuaded to step forth, but he still kept at some distance; and he asked the meaning of their intrusion and importunity. Buckingham told him that the nation was resolved to have him for king: the protector declared his purpose of maintaining his loyalty to the present sovereign, and exhorted them to adhere to the same resolution. He was told that the people had determined to have another prince; and if he rejected their unanimous voice, they must look out for one who would be more compliant. This argument was too powerful to be resisted: he was prevailed on to accept of the crown: and he thenceforth acted as legitimate and rightful sovereign.

On the morning of Thursday, the 26th of June, all the nobles and prelates of the protector's party repaired to Baynard Castle; where this hypocritical scene was brought to a conclusion in the following manner, as described in that account of Gloucester's accession to the throne which he sent to the garrison of Calais, to persuade them to take an oath of fealty to him, but which they refused, because they had before taken an oath to Edward the Fifth: "They porrected to him a bill of petition, wherein his sure and true title was evidently shewed and declared. Whereupon the king's highnis,"—so he now called himself—"notably assisted by wel nere al the lords spiritual and temporall of this reyalme, went the same day unto the palais at Westminster; and ther, in such roial honourable apparrel led, within the gret hal ther, toke possession and declared his mind, that the same day he would begin to reyne upon his people; and from thence rode solemnly to the cathedral church of London, and was received ther with procession and gret congratulation and acclamation of al the people in every place."

(g) Sir T. More, p. 496.

(h) This nobleman had become hateful by his first opposition to Richard's views, and also by his marrying the countess dowager of Richmond, heir of the Somerset family; but, sensible of the necessity of submitting to the present government, he feigned such ardent zeal for Richard's service, that he was received into favour, and even found means to insinuate himself so far into the good graces of that politic and jealous tyrant, as to be entrusted with the most important commands.

(i) Fabian informs us, that as soon as Richard accepted the sovereignty, "the prince, or of right king Edward the Fifth, were put under surer kepynge in the Towre, in such wyse that they never came abrode after."

CHAP. III.

RICHARD III.

RICHARD, in his attempts to acquire possession of the throne, had not trusted entirely to the pretended validity of his title, the rank and number of his accomplices, or the favour of the people: he had taken the precaution to bring a formidable body of armed followers with him to London; the duke of Buckingham, his chief supporter, had brought one still greater, and had sent for more forces from Wales; and an army of five thousand men had arrived from the north. These troops being united, constituted, as the historian of Croyland asserts, "a terrible and unheard-of number of armed men." Fabian indeed says, that the rusty armour, and shabby accoutrements of the northern forces excited the mirth and derision of the citizens of London; but Fabian might have known that many a courageous heart beats beneath a tattered garment, while the tinselled robe often serves as a covering to the bosom of cowardice. Certain it is, that the troops of the north were ever distinguished for their valour, which it is not likely could suffer diminution from any defect in their dress; and these being led by that experienced ruffian and murderer, sir Richard Radcliffe, whose ferocious mind was capable of the most sanguinary exertions, were rather to be considered as objects of fear than of ridicule, and were consequently entitled to a due share of the honour of this revolution.

Richard was proclaimed king in London on the 27th of June, 1483; and on the same day he delivered the great seal to the bishop of Lincoln, one of the prelates who had contributed to his elevation. Conscious of the influence of a coronation on the minds of the people, he determined to have that ceremony performed as soon as possible; and while the necessary preparations were making, he rewarded such of his adherents as had assisted him in usurping the throne, and bestowed favours on others whose assistance he deemed requisite to support his future government. John lord Howard was created duke of Norfolk; sir Thomas Howard his son, earl of Surrey; lord Lovel, a viscount by the same name; even lord Stanley was set at liberty, and made steward of the household (h). At length every thing being prepared, Richard and his consort, Anne Nevil, daughter of the celebrated earl of Warwick, were crowned at Westminster, with the usual formalities, on the 6th of July (i).

The first act of Richard's government, after his coronation, was to seize the treasures which had been amassed by Edward the Fourth for defraying the expences of his intended expedition to France; and these enabled him to secure the friendship and attachment of many with whom interest was the prevailing principle. He was particularly careful to reward his northern forces, and sent them home contented with his bounty. To those foreign potentates whose friendship he was desirous of cultivating, he sent ambassadors to announce his accession to the throne. His envoy to the duke of Britanny was authorized, as appears from Rymer's Fœdera, "to negociate any business he thought proper, even though it were of such a nature as to require a special mandate;" by which it is evident must be meant, a secret negociation concerning Henry earl of Richmond, whom the tyrant was certainly anxious to get into his power.

The person, however, who, both from the greatness of his services, and the power and splendour of his family, was best entitled to favours under the new government, was the duke of Buckingham (k); and Richard seemed determined to spare no pains or bounty in securing him to his interests. The duke of Buckingham laid hold of the present opportunity, and claimed the restitution of that portion of the Hereford estate which had escheated to the crown, as well as that of the great office of constable, which had long continued by inheritance in his ancestors of that family. Richard readily complied with these demands, which were probably the price stipulated to Buckingham for his assistance in promoting the usurpation. That nobleman was invested with the office of constable; he received a grant of the estate of Hereford (l); many other dignities and honours were conferred upon him; and the king thought himself sure of preserving the fidelity of a man whose interest seemed so closely connected with his own.

(k) Buckingham was descended from a daughter of Thomas of Woodstock duke of Gloucester, uncle to Richard II. and by this pedigree he not only was allied to the royal family, but had claims for dignities as well as estates of a very extensive nature. The duke of Gloucester, and Henry earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV. had married the two daughters and coheirs of Bohun earl of Hereford, one of the greatest of the ancient barons, whose immense property came thus to be divided into two shares. One was inherited by the family of Buckingham; the other was united to the crown by the house of Lancaster, and, after the attainder of that royal line, was seized as legally devolved to them by the sovereigns of the house of York.

Having adopted these necessary precautions, and placed a guard on the sanctuary at Westminster, to prevent the escape of the queen and her daughters, he commenced a progress through a part of his dominions, accompanied by his consort, his son Edward, and a splendid retinue. He first directed his course to Oxford, where he remained some days; during which time, at a particular request of the members of the university, he released John Morton, bishop of Ely, from his confinement in the Tower, and delivered him into the custody of the duke of Buckingham. At Gloucester, Coventry, and the various places through which he passed, Richard is said to have exerted every art for the acquisition of popularity, and to have been studious to raise expectations of a mild and equitable reign. The duke of Buckingham took leave of the king at Gloucester with every appearance of friendship and harmony, and retired to his castle at Brecknock, whither he had before sent his reverend prisoner the bishop of Ely.

Richard, attached to the city of Gloucester, as the place from whence he derived his former title, and the inhabitants of which had ever remained faithful to the house of York, resided there some time; and from thence he is said to have sent his first orders for the murder of his nephews. Richard sent one of his pages to sir Robert Brackenbury, constable of the Tower, commanding him to assassinate the two young princes, Edward the Fifth and his brother Richard duke of York: but that gentleman, possessing too much honour to participate in the guilt of so atrocious an act, positively refused to obey his orders. The tyrant then sent sir James Tyrrel, master of the horse, from Warwick,—whither the court had by this time proceeded,—with a commission to take upon him the command of the Tower for one night. Tyrrel, chusing three associates, Slater, Dighton, and Forest, came in the night-time to the door of the chamber where the princes were lodged; and sending in the assassins, he bade them execute their commission, while he himself staid without. They found the young princes in bed, and fallen into a profound sleep. After suffocating them with the bolster and pillows, they showed their naked bodies to Tyrrel, who ordered them to be buried at the foot of the stairs, deep in the ground, under a heap of stones (m). These circumstances were all confessed by the actors in the following reign; and they were never punished for the crime: probably, because Henry, whose maxims of government were extremely arbitrary, desired to establish it as a principle, that the commands of the reigning sovereign ought to justify every enormity in those who paid obedience to them. But there is one circumstance not so easy to be accounted for: it is pretended that Richard, displeased with the indecent manner of burying his nephews, whom he had caused to be murdered, gave his chaplain orders to dig up the bodies, and to inter them in consecrated ground; and as the man died soon after, the place of their burial remained unknown, and the bodies could never be found by any search which Henry could make for them. Yet in the reign of Charles II. when there was occasion to remove some stones, and to dig in the very spot which was mentioned as the place of their first interment, by More, Bacon, and other ancient authors, the bones of two persons were there found, which by their size exactly corresponded to the age of Edward and his brother: they were concluded with certainty to be the remains of those princes, and were interred under a marble monument, by orders of king Charles (n). Perhaps Richard's chaplain had died before he found an opportunity of executing his master's commands; and the bodies being supposed to be already removed, a diligent search was not made for them by Henry in the place where they had been buried (o).

Richard having effected his purpose continued his progress to the north, and arrived at York about the end of August; where, for the gratification of his northern friends, who were firmly attached to his interests, he was crowned a second time, on the 8th of September, by archbishop Rotherham; and on the same day he created his son Edward, then in the ninth year of his age, prince of Wales.

But while he was thus seeking to acquire the confidence and affections of his subjects in the north, his absence from the metropolis gave an opportunity to such as were disaffected to his government to form projects for overturning it. No longer awed by the presence of mercenary troops, the inhabitants of Kent, Essex, Sussex, Hampshire, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Berkshire, and, in short, of almost all the southern and western counties, began to express their abhorrence of the late transactions, and to enter into confederacies for the destruction of that usurpation which they had tended to establish. But the enemy which Richard had the most reason to dread, was the duke of Buckingham; who had been the chief instrument of his elevation to the throne, and whose friendship, as we have already shewn, he had been studious to preserve by a profusion of honours and rewards. The motive of this sudden change in Buckingham is not perfectly known: some historians ascribe their first rupture to the king's refusal of making restitution of the Hereford estate; but it is certain, from records, that he passed a grant for that purpose, and that the full demands of Buckingham were satisfied in this particular. Perhaps Richard was soon sensible of the danger which might ensue from conferring such an immense property on a man of so turbulent a disposition, and afterwards raised difficulties about the execution of his own grant: perhaps he refused some other demands of Buckingham, whom he found it impossible to gratify for his past services: perhaps he resolved, according to the usual maxim of politicians, to seize the first opportunity of ruining this powerful subject, who had been the principal instrument of his own elevation; and the discovery of this intention began the first discontent in the duke of Buckingham. However this may be, it is certain that the duke, soon after Richard's accession, began to form a conspiracy against the government; and attempted to overthrow that usurpation which he himself had so zealously contributed to establish.

Never was there in any country, says Hume, an usurpation more flagrant than that of Richard, or more repugnant to every principle of justice and public interest. His claim was entirely founded on impudent allegations, never attempted to be proved, some of them incapable of proof, and all of them implying scandalous reflections on his own family, and on the persons with whom he was the most nearly connected. His title was never acknowledged by any national assembly, scarcely even by the lowest populace to whom he appealed; and it had become prevalent, merely for want of some person of distinction who might stand forth against him, and give a voice to those sentiments of general detestation which arose in every bosom. Were men disposed to pardon these violations of public right, or the sense of private and domestic duty, which is not to be effaced in the most barbarous times, must have begotten an abhorrence against him; and have represented the murder of the young and innocent princes, his nephews, with whose protection he had been entrusted, in the most odious colours imaginable. To endure such a bloody usurper seemed to draw disgrace upon the nation, and to be attended with immediate danger to every individual who was distinguished by birth, merit, or services. Such was become the general voice of the people; all parties were united in the same sentiments; and the Lancastrians, so long oppressed, and of late so much discredited, felt their blasted hopes again revive, and anxiously expected the consequences of these extraordinary events. The duke of Buckingham, whose family had been devoted to that interest, and who by his mother, a daughter of Edmund duke of Somerset, was allied to the house of Lancaster, was easily induced to espouse the cause of this party, and to endeavour the restoring of it to its ancient superiority. Morton bishop of Ely, a zealous Lancastrian, whom the king had imprisoned, and had afterwards committed to the custody of Buckingham, encouraged these sentiments; and by his exhortations the duke cast his eye towards the young earl of Richmond, as the only person who could free the nation from the tyranny of the present usurper (p).

(o) The bones of these two princes were put into a marble urn, and deposited among the monuments of the royal family, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel, at Westminster; and the following inscription is placed upon their tomb:

"H. S. S. Reliquiæ Edwardi Vti. regis Angliæ, et Richardi ducis Eboracensis. "Here lie the remains of Edward V. king of England, and of Richard duke of York. These unhappy brothers, who were shut up in the Tower, and there smothered with pillows, by order of their perfidious uncle, Richard, the usurper of the throne, were privately and indecently buried. Their much desired bones, diligently and often sought for, in vain, July 17, 1674, one hundred and ninety-one years after their death, were dug up in the ruins of a stair-case, that formerly led to the chapel of the White Tower, and known by most undoubted tokens. The most compassionate king Charles II. pitying their severe fate, thought fit to order those most unfortunate princes this place amongst the monuments of their forefathers, in the year of our Lord 1678, and the thirtieth of his reign."

Henry earl of Richmond was at this time detained in a kind of honourable custody at the court of the duke of Britanny; and his descent, which seemed to give him some pretensions to the crown, had been a great object of jealousy both in the late and in the present reigns. John the first duke of Somerset, who was grandson of John of Gaunt, by a spurious branch, but legitimated by act of parliament, had left only one daughter, Margaret; and his younger brother Edmund had succeeded him in his titles, and in a considerable part of his fortune. Margaret had espoused Edmund earl of Richmond, half-brother of Henry VI. and son of sir Owen Tudor and Catharine of France, relict of Henry V. and she bore him only one son, who received the name of Henry, and who after his father's death inherited the honours and fortune of Richmond. His mother, being a widow, had espoused, in second marriage, sir Henry Stafford, uncle to Buckingham, and after the death of that gentleman had married lord Stanley; but had no children by either of these husbands; and her son Henry was thus, in the event of her death, the sole heir of all her fortunes. But this was not the most considerable advantage which he had reason to expect from her succession: he would represent the elder branch of the house of Somerset; he was the heir to the title of that family to the crown; and though its claim, while any legitimate branch subsisted of the house of Lancaster, had always been much disregarded, the zeal of faction, after the death of Henry VI. and the murder of prince Edward, immediately conferred a weight and consideration upon it.

Edward IV. finding that all the Lancastrians had turned their attention towards the young earl of Richmond as the object of their hopes, thought him also worthy of his attention; and pursued him into his retreat in Britanny, whither his uncle the earl of Pembroke had carried him after the battle of Tewkesbury, so fatal to his party. He applied to Francis II. duke of Britanny, who was his ally, a weak but a good prince; and urged him to deliver up his fugitive, who might be the source of future disturbances in England; but the duke, averse to the dishonourable proposal, would only consent that, for the security of Edward, the young nobleman should be detained in custody; and he received an annual pension from England for the safe-keeping or the subsistence of his prisoner. But towards the end of Edward's reign, when the kingdom was menaced with a war both from France and Scotland, the anxieties of the English court with regard to Henry were much increased; and Edward made a new proposal to the duke, which covered, under the fairest appearances, the most bloody and treacherous intentions. He pretended that he was desirous of gaining his enemy, and of uniting him to his own family by a marriage with his daughter Elizabeth; and he solicited to have him sent over to England, in order to execute a scheme which would redound so much to his advantage. These pretences, seconded as is supposed by bribes to Peter Landais, a corrupt minister, by whom the duke was entirely governed, gained credit with the court of Britanny: Henry was delivered into the hands of the English agents: he was ready to embark: when a suspicion of Edward's real design was suggested to the duke, who recalled his orders, and thus saved the unhappy youth from the imminent danger which hung over him.

These symptoms of continued jealousy in the reigning family of England, both seemed to give some authority to Henry's pretensions, and made him the object of general favour and compassion, on account of the dangers and persecutions to which he was exposed. The universal detestation of Richard's conduct turned still more the attention of the nation towards Henry; and as all the descendants of the house of York were either women or minors, he seemed to be the only person from whom the nation could expect the expulsion of the odious and bloody tyrant. But notwithstanding these circumstances, which were so favourable to him, Buckingham and the bishop of Ely well knew that there would still lie many obstacles in his way to the throne; and that though the nation had been much divided between Henry VI. and the duke of York, while present possession and hereditary right stood in opposition to each other; yet as soon as these titles were united in Edward IV. the bulk of the people had come over to the reigning family; and the Lancastrians had extremely decayed, both in numbers and in authority. It was therefore suggested by Morton, and readily assented to by the duke, that the only means of overturning the present usurpation, was to unite the opposite factions, by contracting a marriage between the earl of Richmond and the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of king Edward, and thereby blending together the opposite pretensions of their families, which had so long been the source of public disorders and convulsions. They were sensible that the people were extremely desirous of repose, after so many bloody and destructive commotions; that both Yorkists and Lancastrians, who now lay equally under oppression, would embrace this scheme with ardour; and that the prospect of reconciling the two parties, which was in itself so desirable an end, would, when added to the general hatred against the present government, render their cause absolutely invincible. In consequence of these views the prelate, by means of Reginald Bray, steward to the countess of Richmond, first opened the project of such an union to that lady; and the plan appeared so advantageous for her son, and at the same time so likely to succeed, that it admitted not of the least hesitation. Dr. Lewis, a Welch physician, who had access to the queen-dowager in her sanctuary, carried the proposals to her; and found, that revenge for the murder of her brother and of her three sons, apprehensions for her surviving family, and indignation against her confinement, easily overcame all her prejudices against the house of Lancaster, and procured her approbation of a marriage to which the age and birth, as well as the present situation of the parties, seemed so naturally to invite them. She secretly borrowed a sum of money in the city, sent it over to the earl of Richmond, required his oath to celebrate the marriage as soon as he should arrive in England, advised him to levy as many foreign forces as possible, and promised to join him on his first appearance, with all the friends and partizans of her family.

The plan being thus laid upon the solid basis of good sense and sound policy, it was secretly communicated to the principal persons of both parties in all the counties of England; and a wonderful alacrity appeared in every order of men to forward its success and completion. But it was impossible that so extensive a conspiracy could be conducted in so secret a manner as entirely to escape the jealous and vigilant eye of Richard; and he soon received intelligence that his enemies, headed by the duke of Buckingham, were forming some design against his authority. He immediately put himself in a posture of defence by levying troops in the north; and he summoned the duke to appear at court, in such terms as seemed to promise him a renewal of their former amity. But that nobleman, well acquainted with the barbarity and treachery of Richard, replied only, by taking arms in Wales, and giving the signal to his accomplices for a general insurrection in all parts of England. But at that very time, in October, 1483, there happened to fall such heavy rains, so incessant and continued, as exceeded any known in the memory of man; and the Severn, with the other rivers in that neighbourhood, swelled to a height which rendered them impassable, and prevented Buckingham from marching into the heart of England to join his associates. The Welshmen, partly moved by superstition at this extraordinary event, partly distressed by famine in their camp, fell off from him; and Buckingham, finding himself deserted by his followers, put on a disguise, and took shelter in the house of Bannister, an old servant of his family. But being detected in his retreat, he was brought to the king at Salisbury; and was instantly executed, according to the summary method practised in that age (q). The other other conspirators, who took arms in four different places, at Exeter, at Salisbury, at Newbury, and at Maidstone, hearing of the duke of Buckingham's misfortunes, despaired of success, and immediately dispersed themselves.

The marquis of Dorset and the bishop of Ely made their escape beyond sea: many others were equally fortunate: several fell into Richard's hands, of whom he made some examples. We are told of one gentleman, William Colingbourne, who suffered under colour of this rebellion, but in reality for a distich of quibbling verses which he had composed against Richard and his ministers (r). The earl of Richmond, in concert with his friends, had set sail from St. Malo's, carrying on board a body of five thousand men, levied in foreign parts; but his fleet being at first driven back by a storm, he appeared not on the coast of England till after the dispersion of all his friends; and he found himself obliged to return to the Court of Britanny.

The king, every where triumphant, and fortified by this unsuccessful attempt to dethrone him, ventured at last to summon a parliament; a measure which his crimes and flagrant usurpation had induced him hitherto to decline. The parliament assembled on the 20th of January, 1484. Though it was natural that the parliament, in a contest of national parties, should always adhere to the victor, he seems to have apprehended, lest his title, founded on no principle, and supported by no party, might be rejected by that assembly. But his enemies being now at his feet, the parliament had no choice left but to recognize his authority, and acknowledge his right to the crown. His only son Edward, then a youth of twelve years of age, was created prince of Wales: the duties of tonnage and poundage were granted to the king for life; and Richard, in order to reconcile the nation to his government, passed some popular laws, particularly one against the late practice of extorting money on pretence of benevolence.

All the other measures of the king tended to the same object. Sensible, that the only circumstance which could give him security, was to gain the confidence of the Yorkists; he paid court to the queen-dowager with such art and address, made such earnest protestations of his sincere good-will and friendship, that this princess, tired of confinement, and despairing of any success from her former projects, ventured to leave her sanctuary, and to put herself and her daughters into the hands of the tyrant. But he soon carried farther his views for the establishment of his throne. He had married Anne the second daughter of the earl of Warwick, and widow of Edward prince of Wales, whom Richard himself had murdered; but this princess having born him but one son, who died about this time, he considered her as an invincible obstacle to the settlement of his fortune, and he was believed to have carried her off by poison; a crime for which the public could not be supposed to have any solid proof, but which the usual tenour of his conduct made it reasonable to suspect. He now thought it in his power to remove the chief perils which threatened his government. The earl of Richmond, he knew, could never be formidable but from his projected marriage with the princess Elizabeth, the true heir of the crown; and he therefore intended, by means of a papal dispensation, to espouse, himself, this princess, and thus to unite in his own family their contending titles. The queen-dowager, eager to recover her lost authority, neither scrupled this alliance, which was very unusual in England, and was regarded as incestuous; nor felt any horror at marrying her daughter to the murderer of her three sons and of her brother: she even joined so far her interests with those of the usurper, that she wrote to all her partizans, and among the rest, to her son the marquis of Dorset, desiring them to withdraw from the earl of Richmond; an injury which the earl could never afterwards forgive: the court of Rome was applied to for a dispensation: Richard thought that he could easily defend himself during the interval, till it arrived; and he had afterwards the agreeable prospect of a full and secure settlement. He flattered himself that the English nation, seeing all danger removed of a disputed succession, would then acquiesce under the dominion of a prince, who was of mature years, of great abilities, and of a genius qualified for government; and that they would forgive him all the crimes which he had committed, in paving his way to the throne.

But the crimes of Richard were so horrid and so shocking to humanity, that the natural sentiments of men, without any political or public views, were sufficient to render his government unstable; and every person of probity and honour was earnest to prevent the sceptre from being any longer polluted by that bloody and faithless hand which held it. All the exiles flocked to the earl of Richmond in Britanny, and exhorted him to hasten his attempt for a new invasion, and to prevent the marriage of the princess Elizabeth, which must prove fatal to all his hopes. The earl, sensible of the urgent necessity, but dreading the treachery of Peter Landais, who had entered into a negociation with Richard for betraying him, was obliged to attend only to his present safety; and he made his escape to the court of France. The ministers of Charles VIII. who had now succeeded to the throne after the death of his father Louis, gave him countenance and protection; and being desirous of raising disturbance to Richard, they secretly encouraged the earl in the levies which he made for the support of his enterprize upon England. John de Vere, the earl of Oxford, whom Richard's suspicions had thrown into confinement, having made his escape, here joined Henry; and inflamed his ardour for the attempt, by the favourable accounts which he brought of the dispositions of the English nation, and their universal hatred of Richard's crimes and usurpation.

The earl of Richmond set sail from Harfleur in Normandy, on the 1st of August, 1485, with a small army of about two thousand men; and after a navigation of six days, he arrived at Milford-haven in Wales, where he landed on the 7th, without opposition. He directed his course to that part of the kingdom, in hopes that the Welsh, who regarded him as their countryman, and who had been already prepossessed in favour of his cause by means of the duke of Buckingham, must join his standard, and enable him to make head against the established government. Richard, who knew not in what quarter he might expect the invader, had taken post at Nottingham, in the centre of the kingdom; and having given commissions to different persons in the several counties, as well in Wales as in England, whom he empowered to oppose his enemy, he purposed in person to fly on the first alarm to the place exposed to danger. Sir Rice ap-Thomas and Sir Walter Herbert were entrusted with his authority in Wales; but the former immediately deserted to Henry; the second made but feeble opposition to him: and the earl, advancing towards Shrewsbury, received every day some reinforcement from his partizans. Sir Gilbert Talbot joined him with all the vassals and retainers of the family of Shrewsbury: Sir Thomas Bouchier and Sir Walter Hungerford brought their friends to share his fortunes; and the appearance of men of distinction in his camp made already his cause wear a favourable aspect.

But the danger to which Richard was chiefly exposed, proceeded not so much from the zeal of his open enemies, as from the infidelity of his pretended friends. Scarcely any nobleman of distinction was sincerely attached to his cause, except the duke of Norfolk; and all those who feigned the most loyalty were only watching for an opportunity to betray and desert him. But the persons of whom he entertained the greatest suspicion, were lord Stanley and his brother Sir William; whose connexions with the family of Richmond, notwithstanding their professions of attachment to his person, were never entirely forgotten or overlooked by him. When he empowered lord Stanley to levy forces, he still retained his eldest son lord Strange, as a pledge for his fidelity; and that nobleman was, on this account, obliged to employ great caution and reserve in his proceedings. He raised a powerful body of his friends and retainers in Cheshire and Lancashire, but without openly declaring himself; and though Henry had received secret assurances of his friendly intentions, the armies on both sides knew not what to infer from his equivocal behaviour. The two rivals at last approached each other at Bosworth near Leicester, on the 22nd of August, 1485; Henry, at the head of six thousand men, Richard with an army of above double the number; and a decisive action was every hour expected between them. Stanley, who commanded above seven thousand men, took care to post himself at Atherstone, not far from the hostile camps; and he made such a disposition as enabled him on occasion to join either party. Richard had too much sagacity not to discover his intentions from those movements; but he kept the secret from his own men for fear of discouraging them: he took not immediate revenge on Stanley's son, as some of his courtiers advised him; because he hoped that so valuable a pledge would induce the father to prolong still farther his ambiguous conduct: and he hastened to decide by arms the quarrel with his competitor; being certain, that a victory over the earl of Richmond would enable him to take ample revenge on all his enemies, open and concealed.

The van of Richmond's army, consisting of archers, was commanded by the earl of Oxford: Sir Gilbert Talbot led the right wing; Sir John Savage the left: the earl of Richmond himself, accompanied by his uncle the earl of Pembroke, placed himself in the main body. Richard also took post in his main body, and entrusted the command of his van to the duke of Norfolk: as his wings were never engaged, we have not learned the names of the several commanders. Soon after the battle began, lord Stanley, whose conduct in this whole affair discovers great precaution and abilities, appeared in the field, and declared for the earl of Richmond. This measure, which was unexpected to the men, though not to their leaders, had a proportional effect on both armies: it inspired unusual courage into Henry's soldiers; it threw Richard's into dismay and confusion. The intrepid tyrant, sensible of his desperate situation, cast his eye around the field, and descrying his rival at no great distance, he drove against him with fury, in hopes that either Henry's death or his own would decide the victory between them. He killed with his own hands Sir William Brandon, standard-bearer to the earl: he dismounted Sir John Cheyney: he was now within reach of Richmond himself, who declined not the combat; when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, surrounded Richard, who, fighting bravely to the last moment, was overwhelmed by numbers, and perished by a fate too mild and honourable for his multiplied and detestable enormities. His men every where sought for safety by flight.

There fell in this battle about four thousand of the vanquished; and among these the duke of Norfolk, lord Ferrars of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, and Sir Robert Brackenbury. The loss was inconsiderable on the side of the victors. Sir William Catesby, a great instrument of Richard's crimes, was taken, and soon after beheaded, with some others, at Leicester. The body of Richard was found in the field covered with dead enemies, and all besmeared with blood: it was thrown carelessly across a horse, behind Blanc Sanglier, a pursuivant at arms; was carried to Leicester amidst the shouts of the insulting spectators; and was interred without ceremony in St. Mary's church, belonging to the Gray Friers of that place.

The historians who favour Richard (for even this tyrant has met with partizans among the later writers) maintain, that he was well qualified for government, had he legally obtained it; and that he committed no crimes but such as were necessary to procure him possession of the crown: but this is a poor apology, when it is confessed that he was ready to commit the most horrid crimes which appeared necessary for that purpose; and it is certain, that all his courage and capacity, qualities in which he really seems not to have been deficient, would never have made compensation to the people for the danger of the precedent, and for the contagious example of vice and murder, exalted upon the throne. This prince was of a small stature, hump-backed, and had a harsh disagreeable countenance; so that his body was in every particular no less deformed than his mind.

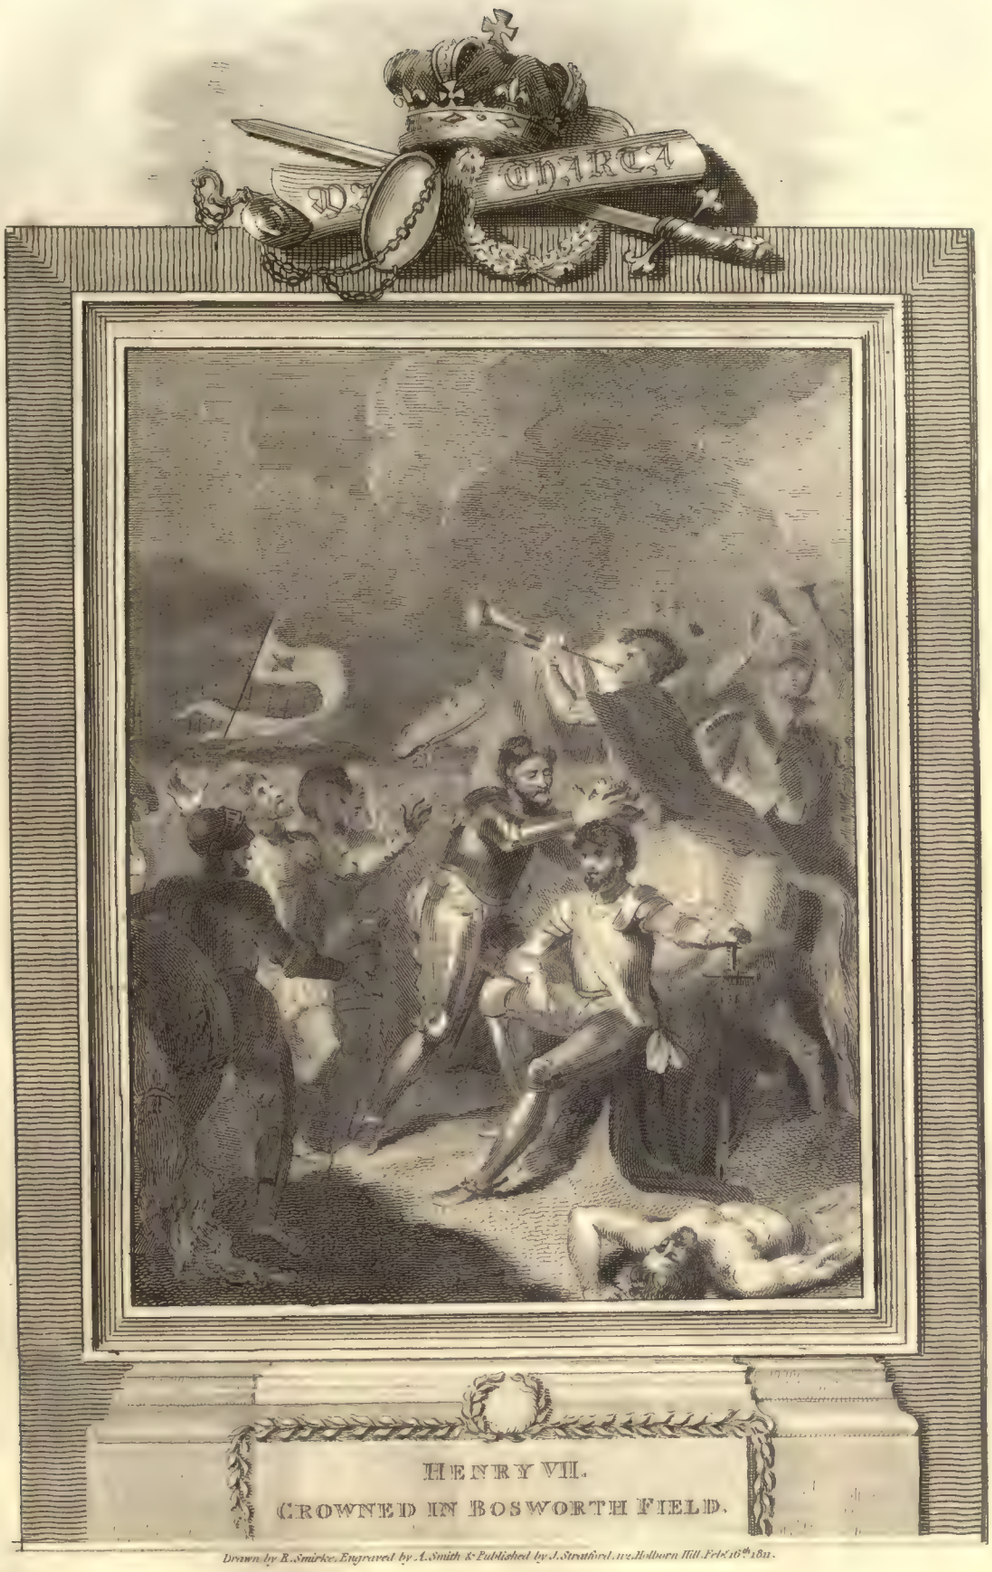
CHAP. IV.

A brief Recapitulation of the History of the Plantagenets.

HENRY II. the first king of the Anjevin race, who ascended the throne in 1154, was the greatest of all the English monarchs with respect to extent of dominion. Besides the kingdom of England, he possessed in France, the provinces of Guienne, Poictou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Limousin, Perigord, Angoumois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Normandy, to which he also joined Bretagne by the marriage of one of his sons with the heiress of that duchy; and, lastly, crowned all with the conquest of Ireland. But with all this grandeur he was constantly unhappy. His contest with Thomas à Becket, the vexatious persecutions from pope Alexander III. the rebellion of his queen and sons, and the unfortunate success of his last war with France, suffered him not to enjoy a moment's repose.

RICHARD I. who succeeded to the throne in 1189, rendered his name famous in the East, by the conquest of the Isle of Cyprus, by the taking of Acre, and by a great victory over the Saracens. But the fame he acquired in the crusades was a dear purchase to Christendom, and particularly to England, by the prodigious quantity of men and money, exported from thence, without the Christians of Palestine reaping any great advantages. Richard himself at his return into Europe underwent the rigours of a long and grievous imprisonment, from which he could not be freed without an exorbitant ransom which quite drained the kingdom of England. In short, after a struggle of several years with Philip Augustus to very little purpose, he unfortunately perished by an arrow at the siege of Chaluz, undertaken from his greedy and avaricious desires of money.

JOHN, who succeeded to the throne in 1199, enjoyed not a moment's happiness during his whole reign. Persecuted by the king of France, then by pope Innocent III. and, lastly, by his own subjects, his reign was nothing but a continual series of misfortunes. He lost first all the provinces possessed by his ancestors in France. After which pope Innocent III. deprived him of his crown, and restored it to him upon shameful and dishonourable conditions. In short, he had the great mortification to see his barons in arms against him, and to die at a time when all England was paying allegiance to a foreign prince, and that prince the pope of Rome.



HENRY III. a prince of a very mean spirit, succeeded to the crown in 1216, and lived in a continual state of subjection, though seated on a throne: at one time a slave to his favourites and ministers; and at another time subject to the imperious will of the popes. At length, stripped of all his authority by his own subjects, he remained some time captive to his greatest enemies. And he was entirely indebted to a victory fortunately gained by the prince his son, for his restoration, and the tranquillity he enjoyed for the two last years of his life.

EDWARD I. who succeeded to the throne in 1272, rendered his name famous by the conquest of Scotland: but, after shedding torrents of blood in that unjust quarrel, he had the mortification to lose that acquisition, and to die before he had recovered it, though he made use of every mean in his power to accomplish his object. His conquest of Wales was the most real advantage procured for the kingdom by any king of England.

The reign of EDWARD II. who ascended the throne in 1307, is remarkable only for that prince's ill conduct and misfortunes. He is the first instance of a king of England deposed by authority of parliament. Happy, if the fury of his enemies had stopped there! but, with an unparalleled barbarity, he was made to suffer the most cruel death that could possibly be devised, and which bore no proportion to the indiscretions he had been guilty of.

EDWARD III. who ascended the throne on the murder of his father in 1327, was one of the most illustrious kings of England, as well for his personal qualities as for his victories in France, and the famous treaty of Bretagne, which restored to him, with interest, the provinces king John had suffered to be lost. But his reign, though glorious, was not free from misfortunes. His minority was sullied by the tragical death of his father, Edward II. and of the earl of Kent, his uncle. To punish these horrid outrages he was forced to keep his own mother in prison as long as she lived. Towards the end of his days he had the mortification to see himself stripped of all he had reconquered from France, without hopes of recovery. In a word, he ruined his own reputation, and died at a time when his subjects began to lose their former esteem for him.

Thus far we may easily perceive that the race of the Plantagenets never enjoyed any great share of happiness: but their misfortunes, which were blended with some prosperities, were very inconsiderable in comparison of what that race afterwards underwent. Were a person to take a retrospective view of what happened to the posterity of Edward III. he would perceive nothing but disasters, tragical or untimely deaths, hatred, animosity, revenge, civil wars, unheard of cruelties; and all these among princes sprung from the same stock. The English nation had never beheld so terrible a destruction of her inhabitants, nor had the scaffold been ever dyed with so much noble and royal blood as during the hundred years between the death of Edward the Third and Richard the Third. We shall just mention the several branches of Edward the Third's family, to enumerate their calamities.

EDWARD the Black Prince, one of the most accomplished princes ever born, died in the forty-sixth year of his age, having first buried his eldest son Edward, who was no more than seven years of age.

RICHARD II. his other son, who mounted the throne on the death of his grandfather, in 1377, was deposed, imprisoned, and barbarously murdered.

LIONEL, duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. died in a foreign country in the flower of his age. He left only one daughter, whose marriage into the house of March was the occasion of all the calamities England was afflicted with for thirty years together.

The posterity of JOHN OF GAUNT, Edward's fourth son, were far from being happy. HENRY IV. the successor of Richard II. ascended the throne in 1399: he passed his whole reign under continual apprehensions of losing a crown which he had acquired by extraordinary and wicked methods, and preserved by the violent death of Richard II. whom he caused to be murdered in prison.

HENRY V. one of the most renowned kings of England, after having made so great a progress in France, as to be declared regent and heir of that kingdom, enjoyed that considerable advantage only two years, or rather, had only a foretaste of what he had so eagerly desired. He died in the flower of his age, leaving a son, nine months old, who afterwards proved very unfit to complete the work his illustrious father had so gloriously begun.

The dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Gloucester, died all three without issue: Gloucester was long exposed to the fury of his enemies, and, at last, sacrificed to their vengeance.

HENRY VI. son of Henry V. who ascended the throne in 1422, lost all that the king his father had acquired in France. After which he was stripped of his royalty, imprisoned, restored for a short space, and at last murdered by a prince sprung from the same stock with himself.

EDWARD his son, prince of Wales, died after the same manner, and by the same hand.

In surveying the other branches of the House of Lancaster, namely, that of Beaufort-Somerset, we shall scarcely find a single prince who did not lose his life in battle, or on the scaffold.

The House of York, of whom Edmund de Langley, fifth son of Edward III. was head, was still less favoured. Some unfortunate stars seemed to be continually shedding their malignant influences upon that devoted family.

EDWARD duke of York, his eldest son, was slain at the battle of Azincour.

RICHARD earl of Cambridge, lost his head on a scaffold.

RICHARD, third duke of York, and his son Edmund earl of Rutland, perished in the battle of Wakefield.

GEORGE duke of Clarence, was afterwards condemned to die by his brother Edward the Fourth, and was therefore murdered in the Tower.

EDWARD the Fourth, who ascended the throne in 1461, died indeed a natural death, in the forty-second year of his age; but his reign was replete with the most dreadful disorders, occasioned by the civil war between the contending families of York and Lancaster.

His two sons, EDWARD the Fifth, (only eleven years of age,) and his brother RICHARD duke of York, (only nine years of age,) were smothered in their bed, by order of their unnatural uncle.

RICHARD duke of Gloucester, who ascended the throne by the title of Richard the Third, in 1483, and met a better fate than he deserved by being slain at the battle of Bosworth in Leicestershire.

At length, EDWARD earl of Warwick, son of the unfortunate duke of Clarence, and the only surviving male of the House of York, ended his days on the scaffold by the hands of the executioner.

Nothing more remains to complete the account of the disasters which happened to the posterity of Edward the Third, but to take notice, that Thomas of Woodstock, earl of Gloucester, seventh son of that monarch, died a violent death, in prison, at Calais.

With Richard the Third ended the Anjevin race of kings of England, sirnamed Plantagenet; who, since the commencement of the reign of Henry II. the first monarch of that race, in 1154, till the death of Richard the Third in Bosworth Field, in 1485, swayed the English sceptre during the space of three hundred and thirty years. The civil wars between the two contending families of York and Lancaster, for the possession of the diadem, lasted thirty years, and was terminated by the battle of Bosworth, after destroying one hundred thousand Englishmen, and a great number of princes of the contending houses.

Mons. Rapin asks, Were not all the misfortunes which fell on Edward the Third's posterity the effects of the Divine vengeance extended to the fourth generation, for the barbarous murder committed on the person of Edward the Second? At least, says he, it is not difficult to see, in these events, the tragical death of Edward the Second, revenged upon Richard the Second; that of Richard upon Henry the Sixth; that of Henry upon Edward the Fifth; and that of Edward upon Richard the Third.

CHAP. V.

Observations on the Progress of the English towards Civilization.

THUS have we pursued the history of England through a series of many barbarous ages; till we have at last reached the dawn of civility and science, and have the prospect both of greater certainty in our historical narrations, and of being able to present to the reader a spectacle more worthy of his attention. The want of certainty, however, and of circumstances, is not alike to be complained of throughout every period of this long narration: this island possesses many ancient historians of good credit, as well as many historical monuments; and it is rare, that the annals of so uncultivated a people, as were the English as well as the other European nations, after the decline of Roman learning, have been transmitted to posterity so complete, and with so little mixture of falsehood and of fable. This advantage we owe entirely to the clergy of the church of Rome; who, founding their authority on their superior knowledge, preserved the precious literature of antiquity from a total extinction; and under shelter of their numerous privileges and immunities, acquired a security by means of the superstition, which they would in vain have claimed from the justice and humanity of those turbulent and licentious ages. Nor is the spectacle altogether unentertaining and uninstructive which the history of those times presents to us. The view of human manners, in all their variety of appearances, is both profitable and agreeable; and if the aspect in some periods seem horrid and deformed, we may thence learn to cherish with the greater anxiety that science and civility which has so close a connexion with virtue and humanity, and which, as it is a sovereign antidote against superstition, is also the most effectual remedy against vice and disorders of every kind.

The rise, progress, perfection, and decline of art and science, are curious objects of contemplation, and intimately connected with a narration of civil transactions. The events of no particular period can be fully accounted for, but by considering the degrees of advancement which men have reached in those particulars.

Those who cast their eye on the general revolutions of society will find, that, as almost all improvements of the human mind had reached nearly to their state of perfection about the age of Augustus, there was a sensible decline from that point or period; and men thenceforth relapsed gradually into ignorance and barbarism. The unlimited extent of the Roman empire, and the consequent despotism of its monarchs, extinguished all emulation, debased the generous spirits of men, and depressed that noble flame by which all the refined arts must be cherished and enlivened. The military government which soon succeeded, rendered even the lives and properties of men insecure and precarious; and proved destructive to those vulgar and more necessary arts of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; and, in the end, to the military art and genius itself, by which alone the immense fabric of the empire could be supported. The irruption of the barbarous nations which soon followed, overwhelmed all human knowledge, which was already far in its decline: and men sunk every age deeper into ignorance, stupidity, and superstition; till the light of ancient science and history had very nearly suffered a total extinction in all the European nations.

But there is a point of depression, as well as of exaltation, from which human affairs naturally return in a contrary trary direction, and beyond which they seldom pass either in their advancement or decline. The period in which the people of Christendom were the lowest sunk in ignorance, and consequently in disorders of every kind, may justly be fixed at the eleventh century, about the age of William the Conqueror: and from that æra, the sun of science beginning to re-ascend, threw out many gleams of light, which preceded the full morning when letters were revived in the fifteenth century. The Danes, and other northern people, who had so long infested all the coasts, and even the inland parts of Europe, by their depredations, having now learned the arts of tillage and agriculture, found a certain subsistence at home, and were no longer tempted to desert their industry, in order to seek a precarious livelihood by rapine and by the plunder of their neighbours. The feudal governments also among the more southern nations were reduced to a kind of system; and though that strange species of civil polity was ill fitted to ensure either liberty or tranquillity, it was preferable to the universal licence and disorder which had every where preceded it. But perhaps there was no event which tended farther to the improvements of the age, than one which has not been much remarked, the accidental finding of a copy of Justinian's Pandects, about the year 1130, in the town of Amalfi in Italy.

The ecclesiastics, who had leisure, and some inclination to study, immediately adopted with zeal this excellent system of jurisprudence, and spread the knowledge of it throughout every part of Europe. Besides the intrinsic merit of the performance, it was recommended to them by its original connexion with the imperial city of Rome, which being the seat of their religion seemed to acquire a new lustre and authority by the diffusion of its laws over the western world. In less than ten years after the discovery of the Pandects, Vacarius, under the protection of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, read public lectures of civil law in the university of Oxford; and the clergy every where, by their example as well as exhortation, were the means of diffusing the highest esteem for this new science. That order of men having large possessions to defend, was in a manner necessitated to turn their studies towards the law; and their properties being often endangered by the violence of the princes and barons, it became their interest to enforce the observance of general and equitable rules, from which alone they could receive protection. As they possessed all the knowledge of the age, and were alone acquainted with the habits of thinking, the practice as well as science of the law fell mostly into their hands: and though the close connexion, which, without any necessity, they formed between the canon and civil law, begat a jealousy in the laity of England, and prevented the Roman jurisprudence from becoming the municipal law of the country, as was the case in many states of Europe, a great part of it was secretly transferred into the practice of the courts of justice, and the imitation of their neighbours made the English gradually endeavour to raise their own law from its original state of rudeness and imperfection.

It is easy to see what advantages Europe must have reaped by its inheriting at once from the ancients so complete an art, which was also so necessary for giving security to all other arts, and which, by refining, and still more by bestowing solidity on the judgement, served as a model to farther improvements. The sensible utility of the Roman law, both to public and private interest, recommended the study of it, at a time when the more exalted and speculative sciences carried no charms with them; and thus the last branch of ancient literature which remained uncorrupted, was happily the first transmitted to the modern world: for it is remarkable, that in the decline of Roman learning, when the philosophers were universally infected with superstition and sophistry, and the poets and historians with barbarism, the lawyers, who in other counties are seldom models of science or politeness, were yet able, by the constant study and close imitation of their predecessors, to maintain the same good sense in their decisions and reasonings, and the same purity in their language and expression.

What bestowed an additional merit on the civil law, was the extreme imperfection of that jurisprudence which preceded it among all the European nations, especially among the Saxons or ancient English. The absurdities which prevailed at that time in the administration of justice, may be conceived from authentic monuments which remain of the ancient Saxon laws; where a pecuniary commutation was received for every crime, where stated prices were fixed for men's lives and members, where private revenges were authorized for all injuries, where the use of the ordeal, corsnet, and afterwards of the duel, was the received method of proof, and where the judges were rustic freeholders, assembled of a sudden, and deciding a cause from one debate or altercation of the parties. Such a state of society was very little advanced beyond the rude state of nature: violence universally prevailed, instead of general and equitable maxims: the pretended liberty of the times was only an incapacity of submitting to government: and men, not protected by law in their lives and properties, sought shelter by their personal servitude and attachments under some powerful chieftain, or by voluntary combinations.

The gradual progress of improvement raised the Europeans somewhat above this uncultivated state; and affairs, in this island particularly, took early a turn which was more favourable to justice and to liberty. Civil employments and occupations soon became honourable among the English: the situation of that people rendered not the perpetual attention to wars so necessary as among their neighbours, and all regard was not confined to the military profession: the gentry, and even the nobility, began to deem an acquaintance with the law a necessary part of education: they were less diverted than afterwards from studies of this kind by other sciences; and in the age of Henry VI. as we are told by Fortescue, there were in the inns of court about two thousand students, most of them men of honourable birth, who gave application to this branch of civil knowledge: a circumstance which proves that a considerable progress was already made in the science of government, and which prognosticated a still greater.

One chief advantage which resulted from the introduction and progress of the arts, was the introduction and progress of freedom; and this consequence affected men both in their personal and civil capacities.

If we consider the ancient state of Europe, we shall find that the far greater part of the society were every where bereaved of their personal liberty, and lived entirely at the will of their masters. Every one that was not noble was a slave: the peasants were sold along with the land: the few inhabitants of cities were not in a better condition: even the gentry themselves were subjected to a long train of subordination under the greater barons or chief vassals of the crown; who, though seemingly placed in a high state of splendour, yet, having but a slender protection from law, were exposed to every tempest of the state, and, by the precarious condition in which they lived, paid dearly for the power of oppressing and tyrannizing over their inferiors. The first incident which broke in upon this violent system of government, was the practice begun in Italy, and imitated in France, of erecting communities and corporations, endowed with privileges and a separate municipal government, which gave them protection against the tyranny of the barons, and which the prince himself deemed it prudent to respect (s). The relaxation of the feudal tenures, and an execution somewhat stricter, of the public law, bestowed an independence on vassals which was unknown to their forefathers. And even the peasants themselves, though later than other orders of the state, made their escape from those bonds of villenage or slavery in which they had formerly been retained.

It may appear strange, that the progress of the arts, which seems, among the Greeks and Romans, to have daily increased the number of slaves, should, in later times, have proved so general a source of liberty; but this difference in the events proceeded from a great difference in the circumstances which attended those institutions. The ancient barons, obliged to maintain themselves continually in a military posture, and little emulous of elegance or splendor, employed not their villans as domestic servants, much less as manufacturers; but composed their

(s) There appear early symptoms of the jealousy entertained by the baron against the progress of the arts, as destructive of their licentious power. A law was enacted, 7 Henry IV. chap. 17. prohibiting any one who did not possess twenty shillings a year in land, from binding his sons apprentices to any trade. They found already that the cities began to drain the country of the labourers and husbandmen; and did not foresee how much the increase of commerce would increase the value of their estates. See farther, Cotton, p. 179. The kings, to encourage the boroughs, granted them this privilege, that any villan who had lived a twelvemonth in any corporation, and had been of the guild, should be thenceforth regarded as free.

retinue of freemen, whose military spirit rendered the chieftain formidable to his neighbours, and who were ready to attend him in every warlike enterprize. The villans were entirely occupied in the cultivation of their master's land, and paid their rents either in corn and cattle and other produce of the farm, or in servile offices, which they performed about the baron's family, and upon the farms which he retained in his own possession. In proportion as agriculture improved and money increased, it was found that these services, though extremely burdensome to the villan, were of little advantage to the master; and that the produce of a large estate could be much more conveniently disposed of by the peasants themselves who raised it, than by the landlord or his bailiff, who were formerly accustomed to receive it. A commutation was therefore made of rents for services, and of money-rents for those in kind; and as men in a subsequent age discovered that farms were better cultivated where the farmer enjoyed a security in his possession, the practice of granting leases to the peasant began to prevail, which entirely broke the bonds of servitude, already much relaxed from the former practices. After this manner villenage went gradually into disuse throughout the more civilized parts of Europe: the interest of the master as well as that of the slave concurred in this alteration. The latest laws which we find in England for enforcing or regulating this species of servitude were enacted in the reign of Henry VII. And though the ancient statutes on this subject remain still unrepealed by parliament, it appears that, before the end of Elizabeth, the distinction of villan and freeman was totally, though insensibly, abolished, and that no person remained in the state to whom the former laws could be applied.

Thus personal freedom became almost general in Europe; an advantage which paved the way for the increase of political or civil liberty, and which, even where it was not attended with this salutary effect, served to give the members of the community some of the most considerable advantages of it.

The constitution of the English government, ever since the invasion of this island by the Saxons, may boast of this pre-eminence, that in no age the will of the monarch was ever entirely absolute and uncontrolled: but in other respects the balance of power has extremely shifted among the several orders of the state; and this fabric has experienced the same mutability that has attended all human institutions.

The ancient Saxons, like the other German nations, where each individual was enured to arms, and where the independence of men was secured by a great equality of possessions, seem to have admitted a considerable mixture of democracy into their form of government, and to have been one of the freest nations of which there remains any account in the records of history. After this tribe was settled in England, especially after the dissolution of the Heptarchy, the great extent of the kingdom produced a great inequality in property; and the balance seems to have inclined to the side of aristocracy. The Norman conquest threw more authority into the hands of the sovereign, which however admitted of great controul; though derived less from the general forms of the constitution, which were inaccurate and irregular, than from the independent power enjoyed by each baron in his particular district or province. The establishment of the great charter exalted still higher the aristocracy, imposed regular limits on royal power, and gradually introduced some mixture of democracy into the constitution. But even during this period, from the accession of Edward I. to the death of Richard III. the condition of the commons was nowise eligible; a kind of Polish aristocracy prevailed; and though the kings were limited, the people were as yet far from being free. It required the authority almost absolute of the sovereigns, which took place in the subsequent period, to pull down those disorderly and licentious tyrants, who were equally averse from peace and from freedom, and to establish that regular execution of the laws, which in a following age enabled the people to erect a regular and equitable plan of liberty.

In each of these successive alterations, the only rule of government which is intelligible, or carries any authority with it, is the established practice of the age, and the maxims of administration which are at that time prevalent and universally assented to. Those who, from a pretended respect to antiquity, appeal at every turn to an original plan of the constitution, only cover their turbulent spirit and their private ambition under the appearance of venerable forms; and whatever period they pitch on for their model, they may still be carried back to a more ancient period, where they will find the measures of power entirely different, and where every circumstance, by reason of the greater barbarity of the times, will appear still less worthy of imitation. Above all, a civilized nation, like the English, who have happily established the most perfect and most accurate system of liberty that was ever found compatible with government, ought to be cautious in appealing to the practice of their ancestors, or regarding the maxims of uncultivated ages as certain rules for their present conduct. An acquaintance with the ancient periods of their government is chiefly useful, by instructing them to cherish their present constitution, from a comparison or contrast with the condition of those distant times. And it is also curious, by shewing them the remote and commonly faint and disfigured originals of the most finished and most noble institutions, and by instructing them in the great mixture of accident which commonly concurs with a small ingredient of wisdom and foresight in erecting the complicated fabric of the most perfect government.

CHAP. VI.

Retrospective View of the Progress of Literature, Arts, and Sciences.

IN all countries the destructive tumults of war, and the desolating scenes of civil commotion, must ever prove unfavourable to the advancement of the arts, or the progress of science. When the attention of men is chiefly occupied by considerations of personal safety, the inventive faculties of the mind are necessarily damped, and little inclination is experienced to the pursuit of less important studies. Of this acknowledged truth England exhibits a striking example in the period we have been delineating. Though it immediately preceded the revival of learning, and the foundation of science had been previously laid, an universal darkness appears to have prevailed, almost equal to the obscurity of those early periods when the natives had recently emerged from a state of barbarism.

Independent of this primary cause, there were other material impediments to the progress of science. Fame and emolument constitute the principal motives to study; and at this period learning was held in such little estimation, that, far from leading its professors to the attainment of honours or rewards, it not only rendered them objects of neglect, but frequently of contempt and derision. Even in the church, where literary talents had seldom failed to experience encouragement, they were now unable to meet with preferment. This occasioned the universities of Oxford and Cambridge to make frequent complaints to parliament; in some of which they asserted, that all the most valuable benefices were bestowed, by virtue of papal provisions, on illiterate men and foreigners, by which private patrons were deprived of their rights, and the best scholars in the kingdom were left to pass their days in indigence and obscurity, and were even reduced to the necessity of begging their bread from door to door, with recommendations to the notice of the charitable from the chancellors of the universities in which they studied. Two of these learned mendicants, we are told by Wood, in his History of the University of Oxford, came to the castle of a certain nobleman; who, understanding from their credentials that they were endued with a poetical genius, commanded his servants to conduct them to a well; and, placing one of them in each of the buckets, let them down alternately into the water, till each should have made a couplet of verses on the bucket he occupied. When they had amused the baron and his company for some time with this curious discipline, they were liberated, having first fulfilled the conditions of their release.

The great scarcity, and consequent high price of books, formed another obstruction to the pursuit of learning. Libraries, however small, were, in this period, objects of such magnitude, as only to be procured by kings, princes, prelates, universities, and religious houses; and those of the most powerful potentates were greatly inferior to the modern libraries of private collectors. The royal library of France, collected by three different kings, Charles the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh, consisted only of nine hundred volumes, whereas those of many modern gentlemen consist of more than as many thousands. This French royal library was purchased by the duke of Bedford, in the year 1425, for twelve hundred livres, (i. e. 52*l.* 10*s.*) Even so late as the year 1471, when Louis the Eleventh borrowed the works of Rhasis, the Arabian physician, from the Faculty of Medicine at Paris, he not only deposited a considerable quantity of plate in pledge, but was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as surety in a deed, binding himself, under a great forfeiture, to restore it.

The royal libraries of England were still worse supplied than those of France. Henry the Fifth, who was fond of reading, was frequently reduced to the necessity of borrowing books, which were claimed by owners after his death. The countess of Westmoreland presented a petition to the privy council in 1424, representing, that the late king had borrowed a book from her, containing the Chronicles of Jerusalem, and the Expedition of Godfrey of Boulogne; and praying that an order might be issued, under the great seal, for the restoration of the said book: which order was accordingly granted with great formality. About the same time, John prior of Christ Church, Canterbury, presented a similar petition to the privy council, setting forth, that the late king had borrowed from his priory a volume containing the works of St. Gregory, which he never returned; but that, in his will, he had left directions to restore it; notwithstanding which, the prior of Sheen, in whose possession the book was, refused to give it up. The council, after mature deliberation, commanded a precept, under the privy seal, to be sent to the prior of Sheen, requiring him to restore the book, or to appear before the council, and give the reasons of his refusal (t). From these facts it is apparent that students must have been at a great loss for materials to enable them to pursue their studies with advantage.

In treating of the progress of literature in this age, the invention of the typographical art, which was introduced into England in the reign of Edward the Fourth, naturally occurs to our recollection. It is unnecessary to expatiate on the many advantages resulting from the art of printing, as they are obvious and undisputed. It was practised in China long before it appeared in Europe; but the Chinese mode of printing is performed by blocks, on which the letters or characters are carved; which was the mode adopted by the inventors of the art in Europe: but this method was greatly inferior to the practice which afterwards prevailed among the European nations; who soon after its rise got into the way of using moveable types of metal cast for the purpose, which are admirably adapted to the uses for which they were intended. As many individuals are generally inclined to claim the honour of an ingenious and useful invention, doubts have arisen with regard to the person who first discovered this art; but the majority of voices ascribe the merit to Lawrence Coster, keeper of the cathedral of Haerlem in Holland, who, between the years 1430 and 1440, printed several books with moveable wooden types. One of his workmen, it is said, afterwards substituted metal types; and, thus improved, the art was gradually conveyed to the different principal cities of Europe. The honour of communicating this art to the English nation is attributed, on good authority to William Caxton, a citizen of London, who resided many years on the continent as agent to the Mercers' company. He was also employed by Edward the Fourth in negociating a commercial treaty with Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy; and, after the marriage of Edward's sister Margaret to Charles, the duke's successor, he embarked in the occasional service of that princess. Having acquired a sufficient knowledge in the new art, he printed at Cologne, in 1471, a work which he himself had translated from the French, entitled "The Recuyel of the Historyes of Troye;" the first book printed in the English language. In the following year he returned to England, where he set up a printing press within the precincts of Westminster Abbey. In 1474 he gave to the world a book called "The Game of Chess," which is supposed to have been the first book printed in this island. He continued in the exercise of his new profession till his death, and printed many of his own translations, as well as those of earl Rivers. The propagation of this valuable art, though it did not at first greatly increase the number of books, in the course of a few years it diminished the exorbitant price which had before attended the purchase of them; and the diffusion of learning kept pace with the progress of typography.

The little study, however, which prevailed at the period we are now delineating was grossly perverted; for, instead of being directed to objects of utility, it was principally employed in the occult sciences of astrology and alchymy: the latter, which pretended to supply a remedy for all diseases, and to transubstantiate the baser metals into the purest gold and silver, received greater encouragement from government, during a part of the present period, than any art or science whatever. In the reign of Henry (t) Concerning the enormously high price of books in former times, we shall instance a few particulars, and the rather, because the circumstances attending the procuring of them are but little known at the present day.

Galen, in his Commentary on the Third Book of the Epidemics, and on the First Book of the Nature of Man, says, That Ptolomeus Philadelphus gave the Athenians fifteen talents, with exemption from all tribute, and a great convoy of provisions, for the autographs and originals of the tragedies of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

But there is no need to go so far back, since we can draw instances from the times about which we are treating in the present chapter. James Picolomini, cardinal of Pavia, having intreated Donatus Acciaiolus to buy him Josephus, had for an excuse, That it was too dear. See p. 114 of the old edition, apud Papiens. "Josephus de quo scribis, cariusculus meo judicio est, hoc præsertim anno quo non multum abundo, itaque ille valeat." That is, "Josephus, concerning which you wrote, is, in my opinion, too dear, especially this year, when money is scarce with me; therefore let that book alone." But that which Acciaiolus wrote back to him afterwards, concerning the great price of some other books, is yet more remarkable. See Papiens. as above. His words are "De tribus voluminibus Plutarchi, in quibus parallela viginti quatuor continentur, titulos sumpsit, ut mones, pretium LXXX aureis esse non potest; ex tractatibus Senecæ, jam epistolas invenimus, pro quibus XVI. aut saltem XV. petuntur aurei." That is, "He has taken out the titles, as you advise me, of the three volumes of Plutarch, in which are contained twenty-four parallels. The price of it cannot be less than eighty crowns of gold, [or rose-nobles, value one hundred and sixty-three shillings and eight-pence sterling apiece.] Of Seneca's Treatises, we have as yet found only the Epistles, for which they ask sixteen, or at least fifteen crowns of gold."

Even kings themselves have not disdained to be employed in negociations for the purchase of books; and the price of a house was scarcely equal to the value of one manuscript; as may be seen in an epistle of Antonius Bononia Becatellus, sirnamed Panorme, to Alphonsus king of Naples and Sicily; which says, "You wrote to me lately from Florence, that the works of Titus Livius are there to be sold, in very handsome books; and that the price of each book is one hundred and twenty crowns of gold. Therefore I intreat your majesty, that you cause to be bought for us Livius, whom we use to call The King of Books, and cause it to be sent hither to us. I shall in the mean time procure the money, which I am to give for the price of the book. One thing I want to know of your prudence, Whether I or Pogius have done best: he, that he might buy a country house near Florence, sold Livius, which he had written in a very fair hand; and I, that I might be able to purchase Livius, have exposed a piece of land to sale. Your goodness and modesty have encouraged me to ask these things with familiarity of you. Farewell and triumph."

Garguin informs us, that he sought out at Paris a book for one of his friends, and says, "I have not to this day found out a Concordance, save one that is very precious, which Paschasius, the bookseller, has told me is to be sold, but the owner of it is abroad; and it may be had for one hundred crowns of gold."

We find also that if a person presented a book, he was considered as having conferred the highest honour and most valuable donation possible. We read these words at the close of an old book composed by William de Guilleville, a monk of Choalis, and entitled, "Le Pelerinage de la Vie Humaine," which ought not to be omitted in this place, especially when we consider the smallness of the value of the book, and the great esteem in which it was held by the donor. "Le Lantimir, senior of Gisors, a native of St. Paingny, being here present, hath given this book to William Tulen, citizen of Gisors, procurator of the Hospital of Paris, there to abide and belong perpetually, without being transported elsewhere, by agreement and composition made with the same procurator, to gain the indulgence, which, by the aid and grace of God, is granted by our holy father the pope, to the hospital, called God's Palace, [Hotel de Dieu,] for a necessary sum contained in (the pope's) bulls, and with an intention through the mercy of God, that he, his wife and children, his father, mother, friends, benefactors, present, dead, and to come; and especially his godfather, the deceased Mr. Nicol Ducar, some time surgeon to king Charles, [of France,] whom God absolve, who left this book, may they communicate and partake of the good pardons, prayers, alms, indulgencies, and orations, made and to be made in the said hospital, and thereto belonging. Written at the said Gisors, anno 1447, on All Souls day in November. Tuleus Lantimir."

Finally, manuscripts, or rather books, were so rare in those days, that they were not sold but by contracts upon as good conditions and securities, as those of a house of twenty thousand livres value. As an instance, we may adduce that which is still kept in the college of Laon in this city (Paris,) cited by Brenil, and made in the presence of two notaries, which states, that "Jeffrey of St. Liger, one of the clergymen booksellers, and so qualified, acknowledges and confesses to have sold, ceded, quitted, and transported; and sells, cedes, quits, and transports upon mortgage of all and sundry his goods, and the custody of his own body, a book entitled "Speculum Historiale in Consuetudines Parisienses," divided and bound up in four volumes, covered with red leather, to a nobleman, Messire Girard of Montague, advocate to the king in parliament, for the sum of forty livres of Paris; whereof the said bookseller holds himself well content and paid."

the Sixth, many protections were given to the alchymists, as well to secure them from the penalty of an act of parliament passed in the year 1403, as to defend them from the fury of the people, who imagined that they were assisted in their operations by infernal spirits (u).

It will be easily conceived, when learning was so little attended to by persons of rank, and by those whose professions should have induced them to cultivate it, that the lower class of people were wholly illiterate. It was not, indeed, till the reign of Henry the Fourth, that villans, farmers, and mechanics, were permitted by law to send their children to school; nor, till long after that time, were they allowed to educate a son for the church without a special licence from their lord.

Nevertheless the discouragement of learning did not hinder the increase of scholastic seminaries: an addition of three colleges was made to each of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge during this period. At Oxford, Lincoln College was founded in 1430 by Richard Flemming, (made bishop of Lincoln in 1420,) for a rector and seven scholars; who were to make controversial divinity their particular study, that they might be enabled to defend the church against the attacks of the Lollards, as well by their writings as by their disputations. The bishop's death occurring soon after the foundation of the college, it was left in a very imperfect state; but the buildings were continued, and several fellowships added by successive benefactors; and at length the whole was completed, about the year 1475, by Thomas Scot, alias Rotherham, bishop of Lincoln.

In 1437, All Souls College was founded by Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, for a warden and forty fellows; who were ordered to offer up prayers for the souls of those who had fallen in the French wars, and for those of all the faithful departed, whence it was called Collegium Omnium Animarum---The College of All Souls. The primate expended four thousand five hundred and forty-five pounds on the fabric, and procured the settlement of considerable revenues upon it out of the lands of the alien priories, which had been recently dissolved.

The third college founded at Oxford was Magdalen College, so called from its dedication to St. Mary Magdalen. Its founder was William Patten, bishop of Winchester: its members consisted of a president, forty fellows, thirty scholars, four presbyters, eight singing clerks, sixteen choristers, with suitable officers and servants. The foundation was laid in 1458, and the structure was wholly completed in 1479. This college, by the bounty of its founder and other benefactors, soon became one of the richest in Europe.

The three colleges founded at Cambridge, were King's, Queen's, and Catharine Hall. The first, as we have before observed, was founded in the year 1443, by that unfortunate monarch, Henry the Sixth. The original plan of this college must have been truly magnificent, if we may judge from the structure of the chapel, which has been long held in admiration as one of the grandest efforts of the Gothic school. But the misfortunes of its founder prevented the execution of the plan.

The second was founded by Margaret of Anjou, in 1448; but the distressful situation of that princess threatened the destruction of the college in its very infancy: it was, however, preserved by the fostering care of Andrew Ducket, the first president, who enjoyed that station no less than forty years, and who was enabled to support it by numerous benefactions, the effects of his own unwearied solicitations.

Catharine Hall was founded in 1475, by Robert Woodlark, the third provost of King's College. It at first consisted only of one master and three fellows; but the number of its members speedily increased by the rapid augmentation of its revenues.

Public schools were also erected, during this period, in the two universities, for the accommodation of the professors of the different sciences, who had before been accustomed to read their lectures either in convents, or private houses hired for that particular purpose, and at an inconvenient distance from each other. Thomas Hokenorton, abbot of Osney, built a range of stone buildings at Oxford, in 1439, which he divided into schools for the following arts and sciences, viz. Metaphysics, Natural Philosophy, Moral Philosophy, Astronomy, Geometry, Music, Arithmetic, Logic, Rhetoric, and Grammar. These were denominated The New Schools, and were in use till long after the conclusion of the present period. The foundation of the magnificent Divinity School and Library, in the same university, was laid about 1427; but the structure experienced frequent interruptions through want of money. At length, by the liberal donations of several benefactors, particularly of Humphrey duke of Gloucester; cardinal Kemp, archbishop of York; and his nephew, Thomas Kemp, bishop of London; the building was completed in 1480. This fabric was an object of great admiration in those times; and the members of the university speak of it in the most lofty strains, in their letters to their great benefactor, the bishop of London, to be seen in the works of Anthony Wood, the ancient historian of Oxford. They call it "a work worthy of God; as much superior to all the great edifices around it, in magnitude and beauty, as divinity, to the study of which it is dedicated, is superior to all other sciences."

The public schools at Cambridge were commenced about the beginning of this period; but were not entirely completed till the year 1475.

The Arts were not more rapid in their progress than the Sciences during this turbulent period: even agriculture itself was neglected. The wretched rustics, employed in the cultivation of the ground, were not suffered to pursue their humble toils in peace, being continually subject to be called from the plough to the field of battle, either by a royal proclamation, or by the mandates of their own arbitrary lords. So many of the peasantry, that most useful order of men, perished during the destructive feuds between the rival families of York and Lancaster, that there were not sufficient hands remaining to perform the necessary operations of husbandry. To supply this defect, and to remedy, as far as possible, the inconveniences which resulted from it, many laws were enacted to reduce and fix the price of labour, and to compel men to apply themselves to husbandry, by restraining them from the pursuit of other occupations. One of the statutes passed for this purpose sets forth, that noblemen and others were greatly distressed for want of labourers and servants in husbandry; and therefore enacts, "That whoever had been employed at the plough, or cart, or any other husbandry

(u) As these royal protections contained the sentiments of the king and his ministers, we insert the following translation of one of them:

"Ancient sages and philosophers the most renowned have taught in their books and writings, under figures and emblems, that many salutary and most excellent medicines may be extracted from wine, precious stones, oils, vegetables, animals, metals, and semi-metals; and particularly a certain most precious medicine, which some philosophers have named the Mother and Queen of Medicines: some, the Inestimable Glory; others, the Quintessence; others, the Philosopher's Stone; and others, the Elizir of Life. The virtue of this medicine is so admirable and efficacious, that it cures all curable diseases with facility, prolongs human life to its utmost term, and miraculously preserves man in health and strength of body, and in the full possession of his memory, and of all the other powers and faculties of his mind. It heals all curable wounds without difficulty; is a sovereign antidote against all poisons; and is capable of procuring to us and our kingdom, other great advantages, such as the transmutation of other metals into real and fine gold and silver.

"We frequently revolve in our minds, by long and serious meditation, how delectable and profitable it would be to us and our dominions, if this precious medicine could be discovered, through God's blessing on the labours of learned men; and also how that few or none, in former times, have attained to the true method of making this most glorious medicine, partly owing to the difficulties attending the operation, but chiefly because the most learned men have been, and still continue to be, discouraged and deterred from the undertaking, by the fear of incurring the penalties of a certain law made in the reign of our grandfather, Henry the Fourth, against alchymists.

"Wherefore it appears right and expedient to us to provide, select, and appoint certain ingenious men, sufficiently skilled in the natural sciences, well inclined and disposed to attempt the discovery of the aforesaid medicine, who fear God, love truth, and hate all deceitful, fallacious, metallic tinctures: and, by our authority and royal prerogative, to make adequate provision for the quiet, safety, and indemnity of these men, that they may not be disturbed or injured in their persons or goods, either during the pursuit of this work, or after the completion of their labours.

"We, therefore, confiding in the fidelity, circumspection, deep learning, and extraordinary skill of these celebrated men, John Fauceby, and John Kirkeby, and John Rayney, elect, assign, nominate, and license, all and each of them, and of our certain knowledge, and by our authority and royal prerogative, we, by these presents, grant to all and each of them, liberty, warrant, power, and authority, to examine, investigate, commence, prosecute, and perfect, the aforesaid medicine, according to their own discretion, and the precepts of ancient sages: as also to transubstantiate other metals into true gold and silver; the above statute, or any other statute, to the contrary, notwithstanding. Farther, we hereby take the said John, John, and John, with all their servants and assistants, under our special tuition and protection."

This curious commission received the confirmation of the parliament on the 31st day of May, 1456.

bandry work, till he was twelve years of age, should be compelled to continue in that employment during life." It was also farther enacted, "That none who had not lands or rents to the value of twenty shillings a year"---equivalent to ten pounds of our present money---"should be permitted to put any of their sons apprentices to any other trade, but should bring them all up to husbandry." These laws, which so much infringed on natural liberty that nothing but the most urgent necessity could justify them, were enforced by very severe penalties.

But while the ravages of war continued to increase, husbandmen must necessarily have diminished; all laws, therefore, were inadequate to remedy the evil complained of, which at length arose to such a height as to produce a memorable revolution in the annals of agriculture. The prelates, barons, and other great territorial proprietors, were accustomed to keep in their own possession extensive tracts of land immediately contiguous to their castles, which were called their demesne lands, and which were cultivated by their villans, assisted by their hired servants, placed under the direction of their bailiffs. But these great landholders, having frequently led their followers to war, their numbers became gradually lessened, and no hired servants could be obtained but on the most exorbitant terms. This obliged the proprietors to enclose their lands, and convert them into pasture grounds. This practice of enclosing was very generally adopted about the middle of this period, and gave rise to prodigious clamours in those who mistook the effect of depopulation for its cause; for, when we consider that the barons and gentlemen of those times derived greater power, honour, and security, from the number of their followers, than the extent of their possessions, we cannot suppose it possible that they should all have consented, at the same time, to expel their followers from their demesne lands, in order to make room for defenceless flocks and herds, unless they had been urged to it by some irresistible motive. It is evident, from the testimony of various acts of parliament, that the depopulation of the country, and the consequent scarcity of labourers, alone gave birth to this remarkable revolution.

The system of inclosure, however, though founded on necessity, was greatly reprobated. Among the numerous declaimers against it was John Rous, of Warwick, who scarcely deserves to be mentioned as an historian. This eccentric writer calls all such as inclose their lands---Depopulators, destroyers of villages, robbers, tyrants, and basilisks, enemies to God and man; and assures them, that they will incur inevitable damnation. In one of his curious declamations against proprietors of land, he informs us, that one of that description had been actually seen in hell by a certain priest, who was carried thither on the back of a devil, with whom he was intimate. The priest, he observes, was at first rather averse to trust himself on the back of his infernal friend, till the devil gave him his word of honour he would bring him back in safety; which he faithfully performed!

One of the evil consequences of this imperfect state of agriculture was the frequency of dearths which occurred during this period. Grain frequently rose to triple or quadruple its usual price; which, as may be supposed, involved the people in the greatest distress. The common price of a quarter of wheat, at this time, appears to have been from four shillings to four shillings and six pence; which was equivalent to about forty shillings of our present money. But we are told by the Chronicler of Croyland, that in the years 1437 and 1438, wheat rose, in many places, to one pound six shillings and eight pence a quarter, equivalent to thirteen pounds six shillings and eight pence of our present money; and all kinds of grain rose in proportion. In this extremity, the common people were reduced to the necessity of living on the roots of herbs, dried and formed into a kind of bread.

But the great decrease in the value of land affords the strongest proof of the decline of agriculture in this period. In the reign of Edward the Third there are some examples of land having been sold at the rate of twenty-five years' purchase; which, probably, was little more than the average price. But, from the proclamation issued in the reign of Edward the Fourth, offering a reward of either one thousand pounds in money, or one hundred a year in land, it is evident that it had fallen in its value at that time, to ten years purchase. And there is reason to suppose that land was sold even at a lower rate. Sir John Fortescue, advising Edward the Fourth to reward his servants with money rather than with land, says, "It is supposd that to sum of them is givyn one hundred pounds worth land yerely, that would have hold him content with two hundred pounds in money, if they might have had it in hand."

The neglect of agriculture was, however, attended with one advantage: by encreasing the pastures, it augmented the growth of wool, the grand staple commodity of the kingdom; and the English had by this time discovered the superior emolument to be derived from the manufacture of their own wool, both as an article of export and of home consumption. Hence the woollen manufacture commanded a degree of attention that scarcely any other art could obtain: no less than twelve acts of parliament were made, in the short reign of Henry the Fourth, for its regulation and encouragement.

The only new arts that were introduced into England during this period were, besides the art of printing, the arts of spinning, throwing, and weaving silk. Of the art of printing we have spoken in a former part of this chapter. The latter was introduced and practised by a company of women in London, called Silk Women. In consequence of a petition from this female company to parliament in 1455, representing that the Lombards, and other Italians, imported such quantities of silk thread, ribbands, &c. that they were in danger of being reduced to great poverty; an act was passed for prohibiting the importation of any of the articles manufactured by them, which consisted only of laces, ribbands, and such narrow fabrics.

It is a curious and well attested fact, that the art of discharging red-hot balls from cannon was known and practised on the continent in an early part of the fifteenth century, though it does not appear to have been yet adopted in England. Thomas de Elmham, the biographer of Henry the Fifth, a writer of undoubted credit, tells us, that when an English army, under the command of the duke of Gloucester, laid siege to Cherbourg, in the year 1418, the besieged discharged red-hot balls of iron from their cannon into the English camp, in order to burn the huts in which the soldiers slept.

While some of the most useful and necessary arts were suffered to languish, either through necessity or from want of encouragement, it cannot be supposed that those which had the mere gratification of curiosity or pleasure for their object could be cultivated with any degree of ardour. It is, indeed, probable, that the pleasing arts of Sculpture and Painting would have been wholly neglected amidst the bustle of arms, but for a spirit of superstition and vanity, which they equally tended to gratify and promote. The worship of images having been violently condemned by the spirited followers of Wickliffe, the clergy were studious to inculcate its necessity, as well by example as by exhortation. The number of images was consequently increased; and, as they were meant to excite the admiration and devotion of the multitude, it cannot be doubted that the utmost skill was exerted in forming them.

Pictures too were employed in the embellishment of churches, with the same view. Hence sculptors and painters experienced a greater degree of encouragement than any other artists; which the vanity of the great also considerably augmented, by employing them in decorating the tombs of their relations, which were extremely costly and magnificent.

The taste for Poetry appears to have declined after the deaths of Chaucer and Gower, which happened at the commencement of this period; at least, if we may be allowed to judge by the extreme paucity of poetical works which have been deemed worthy of preservation. That there were numbers who amused themselves in the composition of verses in that, as there have been in every age since the art of rhyming was first known, cannot be doubted; but the only persons who have been placed in the lists of poets were, Thomas Occleve, and John Lydgate, a Benedictine monk of Bury. The character of the former is thus delineated by Mr. Warton: "He is a feeble writer, considered as a poet; and his chief merit seems to be, that his writings contributed to propagate and establish those improvements in our language which were now beginning to take place. His works indicate a coldness of genius; and, on the whole, promise no gratification to those who seek for invention and fancy." Lydgate was greatly superior to Occleve; but his merit appears rather to have consisted in the harmony of his numbers, and the beauty of his descriptions, than in strength of genius, or fertility of invention.

Music still continued to be cultivated with unremitting attention; attention; particularly by the clergy, who were fully conscious of its powers in attuning the soul to devotion. Those itinerant professors indeed, the Scalds and Minstrels, were not held in such high estimation as in the former period; but this declension of credit seems to have been the effect of their own folly, rather than any distaste to the art they professed. The consequence they had enjoyed had not only tended to increase their numbers, but rendered them so extremely proud, avaricious, and insolent, that their company became insupportable; which at length caused them to be regarded in a proper light, and their rewards proportioned to their deserts.

CHAP. VII.

Ecclesiastical History from the Accession of Edward the Fourth in 1461, till the Death of Richard the Third in 1485.

THE inclination of Henry the Sixth for the exercises of religion disposed him to treat the clergy with the most obsequious respect: and his successor, Edward the Fourth, soon after his accession to the throne, though from a different motive, was also attentive to their interests, that they might support him against the interests of the efforts of the house of Lancaster. He exerted his prerogative in their favour in a most unwarrantable and illegal manner; by granting them a charter, which rendered them almost independent of the civil government. This prince in the earlier part of his reign granted them a charter, in which, by a despotic assumption of authority, he dispensed with the statute of Præmunire, which no intreaties could ever persuade the parliament to repeal; and he prohibited all civil judges and magistrates from taking cognizance of any treasons, murders, rapes, robberies, thefts, or any other crimes committed by archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons, or any one in holy orders. Nay, if any person apprehended for a crime asserted that he was in orders, though his assertion were notoriously false, the civil magistrate was commanded to deliver him to the bishop, or his official, to determine whether he was, or was not, in orders, which opened a door to the most flagrant abuses (x). The consequence of this indiscriminate, illegal, and unprincipled exemption from civil jurisdiction, was such as might naturally have been expected. The primate, in a commission which he granted soon after to his commissary general for enforcing some points of reformation, observed, that many of the clergy, both secular and regular, were ignorant, illiterate blockheads, or rather absolute idiots; and that their profligacy equalled their ignorance; for they neglected their cures by strolling about the country with infamous women, spending the revenues of their benefices in feasting and drinking, in fornication and adultery.

In Edward's reign, an instance occurred of the unwillingness of the clergy to comply with the exorbitant demands of the pope. Pius the Second, having, in 1463, proposed a crusade against the Turks, (who had some years before reduced the city of Constantinople, and subverted the eastern empire,) conjured all the nations of Christendom to contribute their aid for the expulsion of those infidels from Europe. Having demanded of the English clergy a tax of one tenth, he found them indisposed to compliance; and Edward, though he professed himself a friend to the crusade, would not permit the publication of the pope's bull in his dominions. He desired the primate, however, to raise a contribution among the clergy; but they received the proposal with such reluctance, that Thomas Bourchier, the primate, could not, without great importunity, procure the small grant of six pence in the pound.

In the year 1466, Nevil, archbishop of York, summoned a convocation of the clergy of his province, at which several remarkable canons were enacted. By the first of these canons every parish priest is commanded either to preach himself, or cause another to preach for him, to his parishioners, four times a year, and to explain to them in English, without any fantastical subtleties, the Fourteen Articles of Faith—the Ten Precepts of the Decalogue—the Two Precepts of the Gospel—the Seven Works of Mercy---the Seven Mortal Sins---the Seven Principal Virtues---and the Seven Sacraments of Grace. To enable the clergy to perform this task, the convocation subjoined an explanation of the respective articles, which forms a curious system of the catholic theology of the fifteenth century, which may be seen in Wilkins's Councils. In the explanation of the Decalogue, the first commandment is said to be a prohibition of all enchantments, superstitious characters, and such figments. The second is entirely omitted; evidently from the impossibility of reconciling the prevailing custom of worshipping images, with the strong and pointed prohibition it contains against that species of superstitious veneration; and, to complete the number, the tenth is sagaciously divided into two. This, it must be confessed, was taking no trifling liberty with a system of laws which they acknowledged to be of divine authority.

During the reign of Edward, a violent altercation occurred between the secular clergy and the mendicant friers; the latter of whom maintained, that Jesus Christ had been a beggar; and that they, on that account, had the strongest claims to his favour, and were more particularly entitled to the regard and bounty of all true Christians. The seculars, as may be supposed, were extremely vehement, both in their declarations and in their writings, against a doctrine so hostile to their own principles and practice; and, as the pope himself was as much averse to mendicity as the clergy, he issued a bull against the mendicants in 1475, declaring their doctrine to be heretical.

The minds of men were too much occupied with the surprizing revolutions which occurred towards the conclusion of this period, to pay attention to ecclesiastical affairs. The clergy, however, always eager to promote the security or extension of their immunities, found means, by flattering the tyrant Richard the Third, to obtain from him letters patent, dated February the 23rd, 1484, confirming the charter granted by his brother Edward the Fourth, and emancipating them from the jurisdiction of the civil courts. But Richard did not treat the persons of the clergy with much respect, especially when they ventured to dispute his will, or when he suspected that they would be averse to his schemes. We have seen, that, when he was protector, he seized the archbishop of York and the bishop of Ely, for no other reason than because he did not expect that they would promote his designs upon the crown.

The fruitless attempts of Wickliffe and his followers to propagate a spirit of reformation during this dark period, only served to produce a multiplication of errors and superstitious rites. Transubstantiation was now fully established, and formed a principal article in the creed of every orthodox Catholic Christian. The sacramental cup was taken from the laity, but with great caution, and by slow degrees. The clergy were first commanded carefully to instruct the people, "That both the body and blood of our Lord were given at once under the species of bread; nay, the entire living and true Christ: that the wine in the cup was not the sacrament, but mere wine, given them to make them swallow the bread with greater ease." Their next orders were, "To begin to withhold the cup in small obscure churches; and to exhort the people to swallow the bread without chewing, that none of it might stick in their teeth:" a very necessary precaution! So skilful were these unworthy ministers of the Gospel in rendering both the forms and substance of their religious tenets subservient to their own interest, ambition, or caprice! The churches at this time were crowded with images of different saints, to which greater homage is said to have been paid than to the Supreme Being. Processions, indulgences, auricular confessions, and priestly absolution, were now suffered to supersede the essential duties of religion; and frivolous discriminations of sin were adopted, in order to augment the authority of priests and prelates. Nevil, archbishop of York, enumerated thirty-seven kinds of sin, which he said none but the pope or a bishop could pardon. The first and most important of those was Heresy; the second, Crimen contra naturam, maxime cum brutis; the last, and, in the estimation of the church, the least of the thirty-seven, was the raising a sedition which endangered a city or state. In short, ignorance and superstition appear to have been generally prevalent in this period, though it immediately preceded the revival of learning, and the reformation of religion.

BOOK IX.

THE FAMILIES OF YORK AND LANCASTER UNITED.

COMPRIZING

THE REIGNS OF HENRY VII. HENRY VIII. EDWARD VI. QUEEN MARY, AND QUEEN ELIZABETH.

HENRY VII.

THE victory which Henry earl of Richmond gained at Bosworth Field was entirely decisive; being attended as well with the total rout and dispersion, on the 22nd of August, 1485, of the royal army of the Yorkists, as with the death of king Richard himself. Joy for this great success suddenly prompted the soldiers in the field of battle to bestow on their victorious general the appellation of King, which he had not hitherto assumed; and the acclamations of "Long live Henry the Seventh!" by a natural and unpremeditated movement, resounded from all quarters. To bestow some appearance of formality on this species of military election, Sir William Stanley brought a crown of ornament which Richard wore in battle, and which had been found among the spoils; and he put it on the head of the victor. Henry himself remained not in suspense; but immediately without hesitation accepted of the magnificent present which was tendered him. He was come to the crisis of his fortune; and being obliged suddenly to determine himself, amidst great difficulties which he must have frequently revolved in his mind, he chose that part which his ambition suggested to him, and to which he seemed to be invited by his present success.

There were many titles on which Henry could found his right to the crown; but no one of them free from great objections, if considered with respect either to justice or to policy.

During some years Henry had been regarded as heir to the house of Lancaster by the party attached to that family; but the title of the house of Lancaster itself was generally thought to be very ill founded. Henry IV. who had first raised it to royal dignity, had never clearly defined the foundation of his claim; and while he plainly invaded the order of succession, he had not acknowledged the election of the people. The parliament, it is true, had often recognized the title of the Lancastrian princes; but these votes had little authority, being considered as instances of complaisance towards a family in possession of present power; and they had accordingly been often reversed during the late prevalence of the house of York. Prudent men also, who had been willing, for the sake of peace, to submit to any established authority, desired not to see the claims of that family revived; claims which must produce many convulsions at present, and which disjointed for the future the whole system of hereditary right. Besides, allowing the title of the house of Lancaster to be legal, Henry himself was not the true heir of that family; and nothing but the obstinacy natural to faction, which never without reluctance will submit to an antagonist, could have engaged the Lancastrians to adopt the earl of Richmond as their head. His mother indeed, Margaret countess of Richmond, was sole daughter and heir of the duke of Somerset, sprung from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; but the descent of the Somerset line was itself illegitimate, and even adulterous. And though the duke of Lancaster had obtained the legitimation of his natural children by a patent from Richard II. confirmed in parliament, it might justly be doubted whether this deed could bestow any title to the crown; since in the patent itself all the privileges conferred by it are fully enumerated, and the succession to the kingdom is expressly excluded (y). In all settlements of the crown made during the reigns of the Lancastrian princes, the line of Somerset had been entirely overlooked; and it was not till the failure of the legitimate branch, that men had paid any attention to their claim. And, to add to the general dissatisfaction against Henry's title, his mother, from whom he derived all his right, was still alive; and evidently preceded him in the order of succession.

The title of the house of York, both from the plain reason of the case, and from the late popular government of Edward IV. had universally obtained the preference in the sentiments of the people; and Henry might ingraft his claim on the rights of that family, by his intended marriage with the princess Elizabeth, the heir of it; a marriage which he had solemnly promised to celebrate, and to the expectation of which he had chiefly owed all his past successes. But many reasons dissuaded Henry from adopting this expedient. Were he to receive the crown only in the right of his consort, his power he knew would be very limited; and he must expect rather to enjoy the bare title of king by a sort of courtesy, than possess the real authority which belongs to it. Should the princess die before him without issue, he must descend from the throne, and give place to the next in succession; and even if his bed should be blessed with offspring, it seemed dangerous to expect that filial piety in his children would prevail over the ambition of obtaining present possession of regal power. An act of parliament, indeed, might easily be procured to settle the crown on him during life; but Henry knew how much superior the claim of succession by blood was to the authority of an assembly (z), which had always been overborne by violence in the shock of contending titles, and which had ever been more governed by the conjunctures of the times, than by any consideration derived from reason or public interest.

There was yet a third foundation on which Henry might rest his claim, the right of conquest, by his victory over Richard, the present possessor of the crown. But besides that Richard himself was deemed no better than an usurper, the army which fought against him consisted chiefly of Englishmen; and a right of conquest over England could never be established by such a victory. Nothing also would give greater umbrage to the nation than a claim of this nature; which might be construed as an abolition of all their rights and privileges, and the establishment of absolute authority in the sovereign (a). William himself, the Norman, though at the head of a powerful and victorious army of foreigners, had at first declined the invidious title of conqueror; and it was not till the full establishment of his authority that he had ventured to advance so violent and destructive a pretension.

But Henry was sensible that there remained another foundation of power somewhat resembling the right of conquest, namely, present possession; and that this title, guarded by vigour and abilities, would be sufficient to secure perpetual possession of the throne. He had before him the example of Henry IV. who, supported by no better pretension, had subdued many insurrections, and had been able to transmit the crown peaceably to his posterity. He could perceive that this claim, which had been perpetuated through three generations of the family of Lancaster, might still have subsisted, notwithstanding the preferable title of the house of York, had not the sceptre devolved into the hands of Henry VI. which were too feeble to sustain it. Instructed by this recent experience, Henry was determined to put himself in possession of regal authority; and to show all opponents that nothing but force of arms, and a successful war, should be able to expel him. His claim as heir to the house of Lancaster he was resolved to advance; and never allowed to be discussed: and he hoped that this right, favoured by the partizans of that family, and seconded by present power, would secure him a perpetual and independent authority.

These views of Henry are not exposed to much blame; because founded on good policy, and even on a species of necessity: but there entered into all his measures and counsels another motive, which admits not of the same apology. The violent contentions which, during so long a period, had been maintained between the rival families, and the many sanguinary revenges which they had alternately taken on each other, had inflamed the opposite factions tions to a pitch of animosity. Henry himself, who had seen most of his near friends and relations perish in battle or by the hands of the executioner, and who had been exposed, in his own person, to many hardships and dangers; had therefore imbibed a violent antipathy to the York party, which neither time nor experience were ever able to efface. Instead of embracing the present opportunity of abolishing these fatal distinctions, of uniting his title with that of his consort, and of bestowing favour indiscriminately on the friends of both families; he carried to the throne all the partialities which belong to the head of a faction, and even the passions which are carefully guarded against by every true politician in that situation. To exalt the Lancastrian party, to depress the adherents of the house of York, were still the favourite objects of his pursuit; and through the whole course of his reign, he never forgot these early prepossessions. Incapable, from his natural temper, of a more enlarged and more benevolent system of policy, he exposed himself to many present inconveniencies, by too anxiously guarding against that future possible event, which might disjoin his title from that of the princess whom he espoused. And while he treated the Yorkists as enemies, he soon rendered them such, and taught them to discuss that right to the crown, which he so carefully kept separate; and to perceive its weakness and invalidity.

To these passions of Henry, as well as to his suspicious politics, we are to ascribe the measures which he embraced two days after the battle of Bosworth. Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, son of the duke of Clarence, was detained in a kind of confinement at Sherif Hutton in Yorkshire, by the jealousy of his uncle Richard; whose title to the throne was inferior to that of the young prince. Warwick had now reason to expect better treatment, as he was no obstacle to the succession either of Henry or Elizabeth; and from a youth of such tender years no danger could reasonably be apprehended. But Sir Robert Willoughby was dispatched by Henry, with orders to take him from Sherif Hutton, to convey him to the Tower, and to detain him in close custody (b). The same messenger carried directions that the princess Elizabeth, who had been confined to the same place, should be conducted to London, in order to meet Henry, and there celebrate her nuptials.

Henry himself set out for the capital, and advanced by slow journies. Not to rouse the jealousy of the people, he took care to avoid all appearance of military triumph; and so to restrain the insolence of victory, that every thing about him bore the appearance of an established monarch, making a peaceable progress through his dominions, rather than of a prince who had opened his way to the throne by force of arms. The acclamations of the people were every where loud, and no less sincere and hearty. Besides that a young and victorious prince, on his accession, was naturally the object of popularity, the nation promised themselves great felicity from the new scene which opened before them. During the course of nearly a whole century the kingdom had been laid waste by domestic wars and convulsions; and if at any time the noise of arms had ceased, the sound of faction and discontent still threatened new disorders. Henry, by his marriage with Elizabeth, seemed to ensure a union of the contending titles of the two families; and having prevailed over an universally despised tyrant, who had anew disjointed the succession even of the house of York, and had filled his own family with blood and murder, he was every where attended with the unfeigned favour of the people. Numerous and splendid troops of gentry and nobility attended his progress. The lord mayor and companies of London received him at Shoreditch as he approached the city: the crowds of people and citizens were zealous in their expressions of satisfaction: but Henry, amidst this general effusion of joy, discovered still the stateliness and reserve of his temper, which made him scorn to court popularity: he entered London in a close chariot, and would not gratify the people with a sight of their new sovereign.

The king, however, did not so much neglect the favour of the people as to delay giving them assurances of his marriage with the princess Elizabeth, which he knew the nation so passionately desired. On leaving Britanny, he had artfully dropped some hints, that if he should succeed in his enterprize, and obtain the crown of England, he would espouse Anne, the heir of that duchy; and the report of this engagement had already reached England, and had begotten anxiety in the people, and even in Elizabeth herself. Henry took care to dissipate these apprehensions, by solemnly renewing, before the council and principal nobility, the promise which he had previously given to celebrate his nuptials with the English princess. But though bound by honour, as well as by interest, to complete this alliance, he was resolved to postpone it till the ceremony of his own coronation should be finished, and till his title should be recognized by parliament. Still anxious to support his personal and hereditary right to the throne, he dreaded lest a preceding marriage with the princess should imply a participation of sovereignty in her, and raise doubts of his own title by the house of Lancaster.

In September and October, 1485, there raged in London and other parts of the kingdom, a species of malady unknown to any other age or nation, the sweating sickness, which occasioned the sudden death of great multitudes; though it seemed not to be propagated by any contagious infection, but arose from the general disposition of the air and of the human body. In less than twenty-four hours the patient commonly died or recovered; but when the pestilence had exerted its fury for a few weeks, it was observed, either from alterations in the air, or from a more proper regimen which had been discovered, to be considerably abated (c).

Preparations were then made for the ceremony of Henry's coronation. In order to heighten the splendour of that spectacle, he bestowed the rank of knight banneret on twelve persons; and he conferred peerages on three. Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, his uncle, was created duke of Bedford; Thomas lord Stanley, his father-in-law, earl of Derby; and Edward Courteney earl of Devonshire.

Previous to the coronation, it was requisite to create a lord high steward; but, as this office had for some time past been enjoyed only by a prince of the blood, and as there were then none in the kingdom, the king, to prevent the excitation of jealousy among the nobles, caused it to be executed by the following commissioners: the earls of Pembroke, Oxford, and Nottingham; the lords Stanley and Fitz-Walter; Robert Morton, master of the Rolls; Sir Thomas Brian, chief justice of the King's Bench; Sir Humphrey Starkey, chief baron of the Exchequer; and Sir Richard Croft, treasurer of the household.

At the coronation, on the 30th of October, likewise there appeared a new institution, which the king had established for security as well as pomp, a band of fifty archers, who were termed yeomen of the guard. But lest the people should take umbrage at this unusual symptom of jealousy in the prince, as if it implied a personal diffidence of his subjects, he declared the institution to be perpetual. The ceremony of coronation was performed by cardinal Bourchier archbishop of Canterbury.

On the 7th of November following a parliament was assembled at Westminster, and the majority immediately appeared to be the devoted partizans of Henry; all persons of another disposition either declining to stand in those dangerous times, or being obliged to dissemble their principles and inclinations. The Lancastrian party had in every place been successful in the elections; and many had been returned, who during the prevalence of the house of York had been exposed to the rigour of law, and had been condemned by sentence of attainder and outlawry. Their right to take seats in the house, however, being questioned, the case was referred to all the judges, who assembled in the exchequer chamber, in order to deliberate on so delicate a subject. The opinion delivered was prudent, and contained a just temperament between law and expediency (d). The judges determined, that the members attainted should forbear taking their seat till an act were passed for the reversal of their attainder. There was no difficulty in obtaining this act; and in it were comprehended a hundred and seven persons of the king's party (e). But a scruple was started of a nature still more important. The king himself had been attainted; and his right of succession to the crown might thence be exposed to some doubt; but, so many other glaring defects in his title having been already overlooked, it was not to be supposed that this could be suffered to operate as an impediment to his elevation. As the question was too delicate and dangerous to admit of discussion, the judges, instead of a sentence, advanced a maxim, viz. "That the crown takes away all defects and stops in blood; and that from the time the king assumed royal authority, the fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruptions of blood discharged (f)." Besides that the case, from its urgent necessity, admitted of no deliberation; the judges probably thought, that no sentence of a court of judicature had authority sufficient to bar the right of succession; that the heir of the crown was commonly exposed to such jealousy as might often occasion stretches of law and justice against him; and that a prince might even be engaged in unjustifiable measures during his predecessor's reign, without meriting on that account to be excluded from the throne, which was his birth-right.

With a parliament so obsequious, the king could not fail of obtaining whatever act of settlement he was pleased to require. He seems only to have entertained some doubt within himself on what claim he should found his pretensions. In his speech to the parliament he mentioned his just title by hereditary right: but lest that title should not be esteemed sufficient, he subjoined his claim by the judgement of God, who had given him victory over his enemies. And again, lest this pretension should be interpreted as assuming a right of conquest, he ensured to his subjects the full enjoyment of their former properties and possessions.

The entail of the crown was certainly drawn according to the sense of the king, and probably in words dictated by him. He made no mention in it of the princess Elizabeth, nor of any branch of her family; but in other respects the act was compiled with sufficient reserve and moderation. He did not insist that it should contain a declaration or recognition of his preceding right; as on the other hand he avoided the appearance of a new law or ordinance. As the state of affairs was at that time, he acted with prudence, and chose a middle course, which, as is generally anavoidable in such cases, was not entirely free from uncertainty and obscurity. It was voted, "That the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in the king (g);" but whether as rightful heir, or only as present possessor, was not determined. In like manner, Henry was contented that the succession should be secured to the heirs of his body; but he pretended not, in case of their failure, to exclude the house of York, or give the preference to that of Lancaster: he left that great point ambiguous for the present, and trusted that, if it should ever become requisite to determine it, future incidents would open the way for the decision of the matter.

But even after all these precautions the king seemed so little satisfied with his own title, that in the following year he applied to the pope for a confirmation of it; and as the court of Rome gladly embraced all opportunities which the imprudence, weakness, or necessities of princes afforded it to extend its influence, Innocent VIII. the reigning pontiff, readily granted a bull in whatever terms the king was pleased to desire. All Henry's titles, by succession, marriage, parliamentary choice, even conquest, are there enumerated; and to the whole the sanction of religion is added; excommunication is denounced against every one who should either disturb him in the present possession, or the heirs of his body in the future succession of the crown; and from this penalty no criminal, except in the article of death, could be absolved but by the pope himself, or his special commissioners. It is difficult to imagine that the security derived from this bull could be a compensation for the defect which it betrayed in Henry's title, and for the danger of thus inviting the pope to interpose in these concerns.

It was natural, and even laudable in Henry to reverse the attainders which had passed against the partizans of the house of Lancaster; in this he only acted agreeably to the dictates of gratitude and prudence. The revenges which he exercised against the adherents of the York family, to which he was so soon to be allied, cannot be considered in the same light. Yet the parliament, obsequious to his will, obeyed his commands without investigating the principles by which they were influenced. At his instigation, passed an act of attainder against the late king himself, by the title of the duke of Gloucester, against the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey, viscount Lovel, the lords Zouche, and Ferrars of Chartley, Sir Walter and Sir James Harrington, Sir William Berkeley, Sir Humphrey Stafford, Sir William Catesby, and about twenty other gentlemen, who had fought on Richard's side in the battle of Bosworth (h).

The king, having gained so many points of consequence from the parliament, thought it not expedient to demand any supply from them, which the profound peace enjoyed by the nation, and the late forfeiture of Richard's adherents, seemed to render somewhat superfluous. The parliament, however, on the 10th of December, conferred on him during life the duty of tonnage and poundage, which had been enjoyed in the same manner by some of his immediate predecessors; and they added, before they broke up, other money bills of a trifling amount. The king, on his part, made returns of grace and favour to his people. He published his royal proclamation, offering pardon to all such as had taken arms, or formed any attempts against him; provided they submitted themselves to mercy by a certain day, and took the usual oath of fealty and allegiance. Upon this proclamation many came out of their sanctuaries, and the minds of the people were every where much quieted. Henry chose to take wholly to himself the merit of an act of grace, so agreeable to the nation; rather than communicate it with the parliament (as was his first intention), by passing a bill to that purpose. But the earl of Surrey, though he had submitted, and delivered himself into the king's hands, was sent prisoner to the Tower and there confined.

During this parliament the king also bestowed favours and honours on some particular persons who were attached to him. Edward Stafford, eldest son of the duke of Buckingham, attainted in the late reign, was restored to the honours of his family, as well as to its fortune, which was very ample. This generosity, so unusual in Henry, was the effect of his gratitude to the memory of Buckingham, who had first concerted the plan of his elevation, and who by his own ruin had made way for that great event. Chandos of Britanny was created earl of Bath, Sir Giles Daubeny lord Daubeny, and Sir Robert Willoughby lord Broke. These were all the titles of nobility conferred by the king during this session of parliament (i).

But the ministers whom Henry most trusted and favoured were not chosen from among the nobility, or even from among the laity. John Moreton and Richard Fox, two clergymen, persons of industry, vigilance, and capacity, were the men to whom he chiefly confided his affairs and secret counsels. They had shared with him all his former dangers and distresses; and he now took care that they should participate in his good fortune. They were both called to the privy council; Moreton was restored to the bishopric of Ely, Fox was created bishop of Exeter. The former soon after, upon the death of Bourchier, was raised to the see of Canterbury. The latter was made privy seal; and successively bishop of Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester. For Henry, as lord Bacon observes, loved to employ and advance prelates; because, having rich bishoprics to bestow, it was easy for him to reward their services: and it was his maxim to raise them by slow steps, and make them first pass through the inferior sees (k). He probably expected, that as they were naturally more dependant on him than the nobility, who during that age enjoyed possessions and jurisdictions dangerous to royal authority; so the prospect of farther elevation would render them still more active in his service, and more obsequious to his commands.

In presenting the bill of tonnage and poundage, on the 18th of January, 1486, the parliament, anxious to preserve the legal undisputed succession to the crown, had petitioned Henry, with demonstrations of the greatest zeal, to espouse the princess Elizabeth; but they covered their true reason under the pretence of their desire to have heirs of his body. He now thought in earnest of satisfying the minds of his people in that particular. His marriage was celebrated at London, and that with greater appearance of universal joy than either his first entry or his coronation. Henry remarked with much displeasure this (h) How men could be guilty of treason, by supporting the king in possession against the earl of Richmond, who assumed not the title of king, it is not easy to conceive; and nothing but a servile complaisance in the parliament could have engaged them to make this stretch of justice. Nor was it a small mortification to the people in general, to find that the king, prompted either by avarice or resentment, could in the very beginning of his reign so far violate the cordial union which had previously been concerted between the parties, and to the expectation of which he had plainly owed his succession to the throne.

general favour borne to the house of York. The suspicions which arose from it not only disturbed his tranquillity during his whole reign; but bred disgust towards his consort herself, and poisoned all his domestic enjoyments. Though virtuous, amiable, and obsequious to the last degree, she never met with a proper return of affection, or even of complaisance from her husband; and the malignant ideas of faction still, in his sullen mind, prevailed over all the sentiments of conjugal tenderness.

The king had been carried along with such a tide of success ever since his arrival in England, that he thought nothing could withstand the fortune and authority which attended him. He now resolved to make a progress into the North, where the friends of the house of York, and even the partizans of Richard, were numerous; in hopes of curing, by his presence and conversation, the prejudices of the malcontents. When he arrived at Nottingham he heard that viscount Lovel, with Sir Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas his brother, had secretly withdrawn themselves from their sanctuary at Colchester: but this news appeared not to him of such importance as to stop his journey; and he proceeded forward to York. He there heard that the Staffords had levied an army, and were marching to besiege the city of Worcester: and that Lovel, at the head of three or four thousand men, was approaching to attack him in York. Henry was not dismayed with this intelligence. His active courage, full of resources, immediately prompted him to find the proper remedy. Though surrounded with enemies in these disaffected counties, he assembled a small body of troops in whom he could confide; and he put them under the command of the duke of Bedford. He joined to them all his own attendants; but he found that this hasty armament was more formidable by their spirit and their zealous attachment to him, than by the arms or military stores with which they were provided. He therefore gave Bedford orders not to approach the enemy; but previously to try every proper expedient to promote their dispersion. Bedford published a general promise of pardon to the rebels; which had a greater effect on their leader than on his followers. Lovel, who had undertaken an enterprize that exceeded his courage and capacity, was so terrified with the fear of desertion among his troops, that he suddenly withdrew himself; and after lurking some time in Lancashire, he made his escape into Flanders, where he was protected by the duchess of Burgundy. His army submitted to the king's clemency; and the other rebels, hearing of this success, raised the siege of Worcester, and dispersed themselves. The Staffords took sanctuary in the church of Colnham, a village near Abingdon; but as it was found that this church had not the privilege of giving protection to rebels, they were taken thence: the elder was executed at Tyburn; the younger, pleading that he had been misled by his brother, obtained a pardon (l).

Henry's joy for this success was followed, some time after, by the birth of a prince, (on the 20th of September,) to whom he gave the name of Arthur, in memory of the famous British king of that name, from whom it was pretended the family of Tudor derived its descent.

Though Henry had been able to defeat this hasty rebellion, raised by the relics of Richard's partizans, his government was become in general unpopular: the source of public discontent arose chiefly from his prejudices against the house of York, which was generally beloved by the nation, and which for that reason became every day more the object of his hatred and jealousy. Not only a preference on all occasions, it was observed, was given to the Lancastrians; but many of the opposite party had been exposed to great severity, and had been bereaved of their estates by acts of attainder. A general resumption likewise had passed of all grants made by the princes of the house of York; and though this rigour had been covered under the pretence that the revenue was become insufficient to support the dignity of the crown, and though the grants, during the later years of Henry VI. were resumed by the same law, yet the York party, as they were the principal sufferers by the resumption, thought it chiefly levelled against them. The severity exercised against the earl of Warwick begat compassion for youth and innocence exposed to such oppression; and his confinement in the Tower, the very place where Edward's children had been murdered by their uncle, made the public expect a like catastrophe for him, and led them to make a comparison between Henry and that detested tyrant. And when it was remarked that the queen herself met with harsh treatment, and even after the birth of a son was not admitted to the honour of a public coronation, Henry's prepossessions were then concluded to be fixed and implacable, and men became equally obstinate in their disgust to his government. Nor was the manner and address of the king calculated to cure these prejudices contracted against his administration; but had in every thing a tendency to promote fear, or at best reverence, rather than good-will and affection (m). While the high idea entertained of his policy and vigour, retained the nobility and men of character in obedience, the effects of his unpopular government soon appeared, by incidents of an extraordinary nature.

There lived in Oxford one Richard Simon, a priest, who possessed some subtlety, and still more enterprize and temerity. This man had entertained the design of disturbing Henry's government, by raising a pretender to his crown; and for that purpose he cast his eyes on Lambert Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age, who was the son of a baker, and who, being endowed with understanding above his years, and address above his condition, seemed well fitted to personate a prince of royal extraction. A report had been spread among the people, and received with great avidity, that Richard duke of York, second son of Edward IV. had, by a secret escape, saved himself from the cruelty of his uncle, and lay somewhere concealed in England. Simon, taking advantage of this rumour, had at first instructed his pupil to assume that name, which he found to be so fondly cherished by the public; but hearing afterwards a new report, that Warwick had made his escape from the Tower, and observing that this news was attended with no less general satisfaction, he changed the plan of his imposture, and made Simnel personate that unfortunate prince (n). Though the youth was qualified by nature for the part he was instructed to act; yet was it remarked, that he was better informed in circumstances relating to the royal family, particularly in the adventures of the earl of Warwick, than he could be supposed to have learned from one of Simon's condition; and it was thence conjectured, that persons of higher rank, partizans of the house of York, had laid the plan of this conspiracy, and had conveyed proper instructions to the actors. The queen-dowager herself was exposed to suspicion; and it was indeed the general opinion, however unlikely it might seem, that she had secretly given her consent to the imposture: this woman was of a very restless disposition. Finding that, instead of receiving the reward of her services in contributing to Henry's elevation, she herself was fallen into absolute insignificance, her daughter treated with severity, and all her friends brought under subjection, she had conceived the most violent animosity against him, and had resolved to make him feel the effects of her resentment. She knew that the impostor, however successful, might easily at last be set aside; and if a way could be found at his risque to subvert the government, she hoped that a scene might be opened which, though difficult at present exactly to foresee, would gratify her revenge, and be on the whole less irksome to her than that slavery and contempt to which she was now reduced (o).

But whatever care Simon might take to convey instruction to his pupil Simnel, he was sensible that the imposture would not bear a close inspection; and he was therefore determined to open the first public scene of it in Ireland. That island, which was zealously attached to the house of York, and bore an affectionate regard to the memory of Clarence, the earl of Warwick's father, who had been their lieutenant, was improvidently allowed by Henry to remain in the same condition in which he found it; and all the counsellors and officers who had been appointed by Richard still retained their authority. No sooner did Simnel present himself to Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, the deputy, and claim his protection as the unfortunate Warwick, than that credulous nobleman, not suspecting so bold an imposture, gave attention to him, and began to consult some persons of rank with regard to the proper mode of proceeding in this extraordinary emergency. These he found even more sanguine in their zeal and belief than himself; and in proportion as the story diffused itself among those of lower condition, it became the object of still greater passion and credulity, till the people in Dublin with one consent tendered their allegiance to Simnel, as to the true Plantagenet. Fond of a novelty, which flattered their natural propensity, they overlooked the daughters of Edward IV. who stood before Warwick in the order of succession; they paid the pretended prince attendance as their sovereign, lodged him in the castle of Dublin, crowned him with a diadem taken from a statue of the Virgin, and publicly proclaimed him king, by the appellation of Edward VI. The whole island followed the example of the capital; and not a sword was any where drawn in Henry's quarrel.

Intelligence of these transactions being conveyed to the king, it reduced him to some perplexity. Determined always to face his enemies in person, he yet scrupled at present to leave England, where he suspected the conspiracy was first framed, and where he knew many persons of condition, and the people in general, were much disposed to give it countenance. In order to discover the secret source of the contrivance, and take measures against this open revolt, he held frequent consultations with his ministers and counsellors, and laid plans for a vigorous defence of his authority, and the suppression of his enemies.

The first event which followed these deliberations gave surprize to the public: it was the seizure of the queen-dowager, the forfeiture of all her lands and revenue, and the close confinement of her person in the monastery of Bermondsey. This act of authority was covered with a very slender pretence. It was alledged that, notwithstanding the secret agreement to marry her daughter to Henry, she had yet yielded to the solicitations and menaces of Richard, and had delivered that princess and her sisters into the hands of the tyrant. This crime, which was now become obsolete, and might admit of alleviations, was therefore suspected not to be the real cause of the severity with which she was treated; and men believed that the king, unwilling to accuse so near a relation of a conspiracy against him, had cloaked his vengeance or persecution under colour of an offence known to the whole world (p). They were afterwards the more confirmed in this suspicion, when they found that the unfortunate queen, though she survived this disgrace several years, was never treated with any more lenity, but was suffered to pass the remainder of her days in poverty, solitude, and confinement.

The next measure of the king's was of a less exceptionable nature. He ordered that Warwick should be taken from the Tower, be led in procession through the streets of London, be conducted to St. Paul's, and there exposed to the view of the whole people. He even gave directions that some men of rank, attached to the house of York, and best acquainted with the person of this prince, should approach him, and converse with him; and he trusted that these, being convinced of the absurd imposture of Simnel, would put a stop to the credulity of the populace. The expedient had its effect in England; but in Ireland the people still persisted in their revolt, and zealously retorted on the king the reproach of propagating an imposture, and of having deceived the public by shewing a counterfeit Warwick.

Henry had soon reason to apprehend that the design against him was not laid on such slight foundations as the absurdity of the contrivance seemed to indicate. John earl of Lincoln, son of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and of Elizabeth, eldest sister to Edward IV. took part in the conspiracy. This nobleman, who possessed capacity and courage, had entertained very aspiring views; and the ambition of this nobleman was encouraged by the known intentions of his uncle Richard, who had formed a design, in case he himself should die without issue, of declaring Lincoln successor to the crown. The king's jealousy against all eminent persons of the York party, and his rigour towards Warwick, had farther struck Lincoln with apprehensions, and made him resolve to seek for safety in the more dangerous counsels. Having fixed a secret correspondence with sir Thomas Broughton, a man of great interest in Lancashire, he retired to Flanders, where Lovel had arrived a little before him; and he lived during some time in the court of his aunt the duchess of Burgundy, by whom he had been invited to that country.

Margaret, widow of Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, not having any children of her own, attached herself, with an entire friendship, to her daughter-in-law, married to Maximilian archduke of Austria: and after the death of that princess, she persevered in her affection to Philip and Margaret her children, and occupied herself in the care of their education and of their persons. By her virtuous conduct and demeanour she had acquired great authority among the Flemings; and lived with much dignity, as well as œconomy, upon that ample dowry which she inherited from her husband. The resentments of this princess were no less warm than her friendships; and that spirit of faction, which it is so difficult for a social and sanguine temper to guard against, had taken strong possession of her heart, and entrenched somewhat on the probity which shone forth in other parts of her character. Hearing of the malignant jealousy entertained by Henry against her family, and his oppression of all its partizans, she was moved with the highest indignation, and she determined to make him repent of that enmity to which so many of her friends, without any reason or necessity, had fallen victims. After consulting with the earl of Lincoln and lord Lovel, she hired a body of two thousand veteran Germans, under the command of Martin Swart, a brave and experienced officer (q); and sent them over, together with these two noblemen, to join Simnel in Ireland in the beginning of 1487. The countenance given by persons of such high rank, and the accession of this military force, much raised the courage of the Irish, and made them entertain the resolution of invading England, where they believed the spirit of disaffection as prevalent as it appeared to be in Ireland, and they fully expected to be joined by all the friends of the house of York. The poverty also under which they laboured made it impossible for them to support any longer their new court and army, and inspired them with a strong desire of enriching themselves by plunder and preferment in England.

The king, who was not ignorant of these intentions of his enemies, prepared himself for defence. He ordered troops to be levied in different parts of the kingdom, and put them under the command of the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford. He confined the marquis of Dorset in the Tower, who he suspected would resent the injuries suffered by his mother the queen dowager; and to gratify the people by an appearance of devotion, he made a pilgrimage to our lady of Walsingham, famous for miracles! and there offered up prayers for success, and for deliverance from the machinations of his enemies.

Being informed that Simnel landed in May at Foudrey in Lancashire, he drew together his forces, and advanced towards the enemy as far as Coventry. The rebels had entertained hopes that the disaffected counties in the North would rise in their favour; but the people in general, averse to join Irish and German invaders, convinced of Lambert's imposture, and kept in awe by the king's reputation for success and conduct, either remained in tranquillity, or gave assistance to the royal army. The earl of Lincoln, therefore, who commanded the rebels, finding no hopes but in victory, was determined to bring the matter to a speedy decision; and the king, supported by the native courage of his temper, and emboldened by a great accession of volunteers, who had joined him under the earl of Shrewsbury and lord Strange, declined not the combat. The hostile armies met at Stoke, in Nottinghamshire, on the 6th of June; a most obstinate battle was fought, and more valiantly disputed than could have been expected from the inequality of their force. All the leaders of the rebels were resolved to conquer or to perish; and they inspired their troops with a like resolution. The Germans also, being veteran and experienced soldiers, kept the event long doubtful; and even the Irish, though ill armed, and almost defenceless, showed themselves not defective in spirit and bravery. The king's victory was purchased with great loss, but was entirely decisive. Lincoln, Broughton, and Swart, perished in the field of battle, with four thousand of their followers. As Lovel was never heard of afterwards, he was believed to have undergone the same fate. Simnel, with his tutor Simon, was taken prisoner. Simon, being a priest, was not tried at law, and was only committed to close custody: Simnel being too contemptible to be an object either of apprehension or resentment to Henry, was pardoned, and made a scullion in the king's kitchen; whence he was afterwards advanced to the rank of a falconer (r), in which capacity he died.

Henry had now leisure to revenge himself on his enemies. He made a progress into the northern parts, where he gave many proofs of his rigorous disposition. A strict enquiry was made after those who had assisted or favoured the rebels. The punishments were not all sanguinary: the king made his revenge subservient to his avarice. Heavy fines were levied upon the delinquents. The proceedings of the courts, and even the courts themselves, were arbitrary. Either the criminals were tried by commissioners appointed for the purpose, or they suffered punishment by a sentence of a court-martial. And, as a rumour rumour had prevailed before the battle of Stoke, that the rebels had gained the victory, that the royal army was cut in pieces, and that the king himself had escaped by flight, Henry was resolved to interpret the belief or propagation of this report as a mark of disaffection; and he punished many for that pretended crime. But such in this age was the situation of the English government, that the royal prerogative, which was but imperfectly restrained during the most peaceable periods, was sure, in tumultuous or even suspicious times, which frequently recurred, to break all bounds of law, and to violate the liberty of the subject.

After the king had gratified his rigour by the punishment of his enemies, he determined to give contentment to the people in a point which, though a mere ceremony, was passionately desired by them. The queen had been married nearly two years, but had not yet been crowned; and this affectation of delay had given great discontent to the public, and had been one principal source of the disaffection which prevailed. The king, instructed by experience, now finished the ceremony of her coronation on the 25th of November; and, to shew a disposition still more gracious, he restored to liberty the marquis of Dorset, who had been able to clear himself of all the suspicions entertained against him by the king or his partizans.

The king acquired great reputation throughout Europe by the vigorous and prosperous conduct of his domestic affairs; but as some incidents about this time (1488) invited him to look abroad, and exert himself in behalf of his allies, it will be necessary, in order to give a just account of his foreign measures, to explain the situation of the neighbouring kingdoms; beginning with Scotland, which lies most contiguous.

The kingdom of Scotland had not yet attained that state which distinguishes a civilized monarchy, and which enables the government, by the force of its laws and institutions alone, without any extraordinary capacity in the sovereign, to maintain itself in order and tranquillity. James III. who now filled the Scottish throne, was a prince of little industry and of a very slender capacity, and was utterly incapable of any vigorous exertion; insomuch that he was obliged to resign the reins of government to his ministers; but, in the selection of his favourites, he had always been so unfortunate, as to incur the displeasure of his subjects, or to involve himself in difficulty or distress. When he bestowed his confidence on any of the principal nobility, he found that they exalted their own family to such a height as was dangerous to the prince, and gave umbrage to the state: when he conferred favour on any person of meaner birth, on whose submission he could more depend, the barons of his kingdom, enraged at the power of an upstart minion, proceeded to the utmost extremities against their sovereign. Had Henry entertained the ambition of conquests, a tempting opportunity now offered of reducing that kingdom to subjection; but as he was probably sensible that a warlike people, though they might be over-run by reason of their domestic divisions, could not be retained in obedience without a regular military force, which was then unknown in England, he rather intended the renewal of the peace with Scotland, and sent an embassy to James for that purpose. But the Scots, who never desired a durable peace with England, and who deemed their security to consist in constantly preserving themselves in a warlike posture, would not agree to more than a seven years truce, which was accordingly concluded (s).

The European states on the continent were then hastening fast to the situation in which they have remained, without any material alteration, for nearly three centuries; and began to unite themselves into one extensive system of policy, which comprehended the chief powers of Christendom. Spain, which had hitherto been almost entirely occupied within herself, now became formidable by the union of Arragon and Castile in the persons of Ferdinand and Isabella, who being princes of great capacity, employed their force in enterprizes the most advantageous to their combined monarchy. The conquest of Granada from the Moors was then undertaken, and brought near to a happy conclusion. And in that expedition the military genius of Spain was revived; honour and security were attained; and her princes, no longer kept in awe by a domestic enemy so dangerous, began to enter into all the transactions of Europe, and make a great figure in every war and negociation.

Maximilian king of the Romans, son of the emperor Frederic, had, by his marriage with the heiress of Burgundy, acquired an interest in the Netherlands; and though the death of his consort had weakened his connexions with that country, he still pretended to the government as tutor to his son Philip, and his authority had been acknowledged by Brabant, Holland, and several of the provinces. But as Flanders and Hainault still refused to submit to his regency, and even appointed other tutors to Philip, he had been engaged in long wars against that obstinate people, and never was able thoroughly to subdue their spirit. That he might free himself from the opposition of France, he had concluded a peace with Louis XI. and had given his daughter Margaret, then an infant, in marriage to the dauphin; together with Artois, Franche-Compté, and Charolois, as her dowry. But this alliance had not produced the desired effect. The dauphin succeeded to the crown of France by the appellation of Charles VIII.; but Maximilian still found the mutinies of the Flemings fomented by the intrigues of the court of France.

France, during the two preceding reigns had made a mighty increase in power and greatness; and had not other states of Europe at the same time received an accession of force, it had been impossible to have retained her within her ancient boundaries. Most of the great fiefs, Normandy, Champagne, Anjou, Dauphiny, Guienne, Provence, and Burgundy, had been united to the crown; the English had been expelled from all their conquests; the authority of the prince had been raised to such a height as enabled him to maintain law and order; a considerable military force was kept on foot, and the finances were able to support it. Louis XI. indeed, from whom many of these advantages were derived, was dead, and had left his son in early youth and ill educated, to sustain the weight of the monarchy; but having entrusted the government to his daughter Anne, lady of Beaujeu, a woman of spirit and capacity, the French power suffered no check or decline. On the contrary, this princess formed the great project, which at last she effected, of uniting to the crown Britanny, the last and most independent fief of the monarchy.

Francis II. duke of Britanny, conscious of his own incapacity for government, had resigned himself to the direction of Peter Landais, a man of mean birth, more remarkable for abilities than for virtue or integrity. The nobles of Britanny, displeased with the great advancement of this favourite, had even proceeded to disaffection against their sovereign; and after many tumults and disorders, they at last united among themselves, and in a violent manner seized, tried, and put to death the noxious minister. Dreading the resentment of the prince for this invasion of his authority, many of them retired to France; others, for protection and safety, maintained a secret correspondence with the French ministry, who, observing the great dissensions among the Bretons, thought the opportunity favourable for invading the duchy; and so much the rather, as they could cover their ambition under the specious pretence of providing for domestic security.

Louis duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, and presumptive heir of the monarchy, had disputed the administration with the lady of Beaujeu; and though his pretensions had been rejected by the states, he still maintained cabals with many of the grandees, and laid schemes for subverting the authority of that princess. Finding his conspiracies detected, he took to arms, and fortified himself in Beaugenci; but as his revolt was precipitate, before his confederates were ready to join him, he had been obliged to submit, and to receive such conditions as the French ministry were pleased to impose upon him. Actuated, however, by his ambition, and even by his fears, he soon retired out of France, and took shelter with the duke of Britanny, who was desirous of strengthening himself against the designs of the lady of Beaujeu, by the friendship and credit of the duke of Orleans. This latter prince also, perceiving the ascendant which he soon acquired over the duke of Britanny, had engaged many of his partizans to join him at that court, and had formed the design of aggrandizing himself by a marriage with Anne, the heiress of that opulent duchy.

The barons of Britanny, who saw all favour engrossed by the duke of Orleans and his train, renewed a stricter correspondence with France, and even invited the French king to make an invasion on their country. Desirous, however, of preserving its independency, they had regulated the number of succours which France was to send them, and had stipulated that no fortified place in Britanny should remain in the possession of that monarchy: a vain precaution, where revolted subjects treat with a power so much much superior! The French invaded Britanny with forces three times more numerous than those which they had promised to the barons; and advancing into the heart of the country, laid siege to Ploermel. To oppose them, the duke raised a numerous but ill-disciplined army, which he put under the command of the duke of Orleans, the count of Dunois, and others of the French nobility. The army, discontented with his choice, and jealous of their confederates, soon disbanded, and left their prince with too small a force to keep the field against his invaders. He retired to Vannes; but being hotly pursued by the French, who had now made themselves masters of Ploermel, he escaped to Nantz; and the enemy, having previously taken and garrisoned Vannes, Dinant, and other places, laid close siege to that city. The barons of Britanny, finding their country menaced with total subjection, began gradually to withdraw from the French army, and to make peace with their sovereign.

The desertion, however, of the Bretons did not discourage the court of France from pursuing her favourite project of reducing Britanny to subjection. The situation of Europe appeared favourable to the execution of this design. Maximilian was indeed engaged in close alliance with the duke of Britanny, and had even opened a treaty for marrying his daughter; but he was on all occasions so indigent, and at that time so disquieted by the mutinies of the Flemings, that little effectual assistance could be expected from him. Ferdinand was entirely occupied in the conquest of Grenada; and it was also known, that if France would resign to him Rousillon and Cerdagne, to which he had pretensions, she should at any time engage him to abandon the interest of Britanny. England alone was enabled by her power, as well as engaged by her interests, to support the independency of that duchy; and the most dangerous opposition was therefore, by Anne of Beaujeu, expected from that quarter. In order to cover her real designs, no sooner was she informed of Henry's success against Simnel and his partizans, than she dispatched ambassadors to the court of London, and made professions of the greatest trust and confidence in the sovereign of England.

The ambassadors, after congratulating Henry on his late victory, and communicating to him, in the most cordial manner, as to an intimate friend, some successes of their master against Maximilian, came in the progress of their discourse to mention the late transactions in Britanny. They told him, that the duke having given protection to French fugitives and rebels, the king had been necessitated, contrary to his intention and inclination, to carry war into that duchy: that the honour of the crown was interested not to suffer a vassal so far to forget his duty to his liege lord; nor was the security of the government less concerned to prevent the consequences of this dangerous temerity: that the fugitives were no mean or obscure persons; but, among others, the duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, who, finding himself obnoxious to justice for treasonable practices in France, had fled into Britanny; where he still persevered in laying schemes of rebellion against his sovereign: that the war being thus, on the part of the French monarch, entirely defensive, it would immediately cease, when the duke of Britanny, by returning to his duty, should remove the causes of it: that their master was sensible of the obligations which the duke in very critical times had conferred on Henry; but it was known also, that in times still more critical, he or his mercenary counsellors had deserted him, and put his life in the utmost hazard: that his sole refuge in these desperate extremities had been the court of France, which not only protected his person, but supplied him with men and money, with which, aided by his own valour and conduct, he had been enabled to mount the throne of England: that France in this transaction had, from friendship to Henry, acted contrary to what in a narrow view might be esteemed her own interest; since, instead of an odious tyrant, she had contributed to establish on a rival throne a prince endowed with such virtue and abilities: and that as both the justice of the cause, and the obligations conferred on Henry, thus preponderated on the side of France, she reasonably expected that, if the situation of his affairs did not permit him to give her assistance, he would at least preserve a neutrality between the contending parties (t).

This discourse of the French ambassadors was plausible; and to give it greater weight, they communicated to Henry, as in confidence, their master's intention, after he should have settled the differences with Britanny, to lead an army into Italy, and make good his pretensions to the kingdom of Naples: a project which they knew would give no umbrage to the court of England. But all these artifices were in vain employed against the penetration of the king. He clearly saw that France had entertained the view of subduing Britanny; but he also perceived, that she would meet with great, and, as he thought, insuperable difficulties in the execution of her project. The native force of that duchy, he knew, had always been considerable, and had often, without any foreign assistance, resisted the power of France; the natural temper of the French nation, he imagined, would make them easily abandon any enterprize which required perseverance; and as the heir of the crown was confederated with the duke of Britanny, the ministers would be still more remiss in prosecuting a scheme which must draw on them his resentment and displeasure. Should even these internal obstructions be removed, Maximilian, whose enmity to France was well known, and who now paid his addresses to the heiress of Britanny, would be able to make a diversion on the side of Flanders; nor could it be expected that France, if she prosecuted such ambitious projects, would be allowed to remain in tranquillity by Ferdinand and Isabella. Above all, he thought the French court could never expect that England, so deeply interested to preserve the independency of Britanny, so able by her power and situation to give effectual and prompt assistance, would permit such an accession of force to her rival. He imagined, therefore, that the ministers of France, convinced of the impracticability of their scheme, would at last embrace pacific views, and would abandon an enterprize so disgustful to all the potentates of Europe.

This reasoning of Henry was solid, and might justly engage him in dilatory and cautious measures: but there entered into his conduct another motive, which was apt to draw him beyond the just bounds, because founded on a ruling passion. His frugality, which by degrees degenerated into avarice, made him averse to all warlike enterprizes and distant expeditions, and engaged him previously to try the expedient of negociation. He dispatched Urswic his almoner, a man of address and abilities, to make offer of his mediation to the contending parties: an offer which he thought, if accepted by France, would soon lead to a composure of all differences; if refused or eluded, would at least discover the perseverance of that court in her ambitious projects. Urswic found the lady of Beaujeu, now duchess of Burgundy, engaged in the siege of Nantz, and had the satisfaction to find that his master's offer of mediation was readily embraced, with many expressions of confidence and moderation. That able princess concluded, that the duke of Orleans, who governed the duke of Britanny, foreseeing that every accommodation must be made at his expence, would use all his interest to have Henry's proposal rejected; and would by that means make an apology for the French measures, and draw on the Bretons the reproach of obstinacy and injustice. The event justified her prudence. When the English ambassador made the same offer to the duke of Britanny, he received for answer, in the name of that prince, that having so long acted the part of protector and guardian to Henry during his youth and adverse fortune, he had expected from a monarch of such virtue, more effectual assistance in his present distresses, than a barren offer of mediation, which suspended not the progress of the French arms: that if Henry's gratitude were not sufficient to engage him in such a measure, his prudence, as king of England, should discover to him the pernicious consequences attending the conquest of Britanny, and its being annexed to the crown of France: that that kingdom, already too powerful, would be enabled, by so great an accession of force, to display, to the ruin of England, that hostile disposition which had always subsisted between those rival nations: that Britanny, so useful an ally, which, by its situation, gave the English an entrance into the heart of France, being joined to that kingdom, would be equally enabled, from its situation, to disturb, either by piracies or naval armaments, the commerce and peace of England: and that, if the duke rejected Henry's mediation, it proceeded neither from an inclination to a war, which he experienced to be ruinous to him, nor from a confidence in his own force, which he knew to be much inferior to that of the enemy; but, on the contrary, from a sense of his present necessities, which must engage the king to act the part of his confederate, rather than that of a mediator.

When

(t) Bacon, p. 589.

When this answer was reported to the king, he abandoned not the plan which he had formed: he only concluded, that more time was requisite to quell the obstinacy of the Bretons, and make them submit to reason. And when he learned that the people of Britanny, anxious for the duke's safety, had formed a tumultuary army of sixty thousand men, and had obliged the French to raise the siege of Nantz, he fortified himself the more in his opinion, that the court of France would at last be reduced, by multiplied obstacles and difficulties, to abandon the project of reducing Britanny to subjection. He continued therefore his scheme of negociation, and by that means exposed himself to be deceived by the artifices of the French ministry; who, still pretending pacific intentions, sent lord Bernard Daubigny, a Scotchman of quality, to London, and pressed Henry not to be discouraged in offering his mediation to the court of Britanny. The king, on his part, dispatched another embassy, consisting of Urswic, the abbot of Abingdon, and sir Richard Tonstal, who carried new proposals for an amicable treaty. No effectual succours, meanwhile, were provided for the distressed Bretons. Lord Woodwille, brother to the queen dowager, having asked leave to raise underhand a body of volunteers, and to transport them into Britanny, met with a refusal from the king, who was desirous of preserving the appearance of a strict neutrality. That nobleman, however, still persisted in his purpose. He went over to the Isle of Wight, of which he was governor; levied a body of four hundred men; and having at last obtained, as is supposed, the secret permission of Henry, sailed with them to Britanny. This enterprize proved fatal to the leader, and brought small relief to the unhappy duke. The Bretons rashly engaged in a general action with the French at St. Aubin, on the 28th of July, 1488, and met with a total defeat. Woodwille and all the English were put to the sword; together with a body of Bretons, who had been accoutred in the garb of Englishmen, in order to strike a greater terror into the French (u). The duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, and many other persons of rank, were taken prisoners; and the military force of Britanny was totally broken. The death of the duke Francis II. which happened on the 9th of September following, threw affairs into still greater confusion, and seemed to threaten the state with a final subjection to the crown of France.

Though the king did not prepare against these events, so hurtful to the interests of England, with sufficient vigour and precaution, he had not altogether overlooked them. Determined to maintain a pacific conduct, so far as the situation of affairs would permit, he yet knew the warlike temper of his subjects, and observed, that their ancient and inveterate animosity to France was now revived by the prospect of this great accession to her power and grandeur. He resolved therefore to make advantage of this disposition, and draw some supplies from the people, on pretence of giving assistance to the duke of Britanny. He had accordingly summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster, on the 9th of November; which he soon persuaded to grant him a considerable subsidy (v). But this supply, though voted by parliament, involved the king in unexpected difficulties. The counties of Durham and York, always discontented with Henry's government, and farther provoked by the late oppressions, under which they had laboured, after the suppression of Simnel's rebellion, resisted the commissioners who were appointed to levy the tax. The commissioners, terrified with this appearance of sedition, made application to the earl of Northumberland, and desired of him advice and assistance in the execution of their office. That nobleman thought the matter of importance enough to consult the king; who, unwilling to yield to the humours of a discontented populace, and foreseeing the pernicious consequence of such a precedent, renewed his orders for strictly levying the imposition. Northumberland summoned together the justices and chief freeholders, and delivered the king's commands in the most imperious terms, which, he thought, would enforce obedience, but which tended only to provoke the people, and make them believe him the adviser of those orders which he delivered to them (w). They betook themselves to arms, attacked Northumberland in his house, and put him to death. Having incurred such deep guilt, their mutinous humour then prompted them to declare against the king himself; and being instigated by John à Chamber, a seditious fellow of low birth, they chose sir John Egremont their leader, and prepared themselves for a vigorous resistance. Henry not dismayed with this insurrection which was so precipitate and ill-supported, immediately levied a force, which he put under the command of the earl of Surrey, whom he had freed from confinement, and received into favour. His intention was to send down these troops, in order to check the progress of the rebels; while he himself should follow with a greater body, which would absolutely insure success. But Surrey thought himself strong enough to encounter alone a raw and unarmed multitude; and he succeeded in the attempt. The rebels were dissipated; John à Chamber was taken prisoner, and afterwards executed with some of his accomplices; sir John Egremont fled to the duchess of Burgundy, who gave him protection; and the greater number of the rebels received a pardon.

Henry had probably expected, when he obtained this grant from parliament, that he should be able to terminate the affair of Britanny by negociation, and that he might thereby fill his coffers with the money levied by the imposition. But as the distresses of the Bretons still multiplied, and became every day more urgent; he found himself under the necessity of taking more vigorous measures, in order to support them. On the death of the duke, the French revived some antiquated claims to the dominion of the duchy; and as the duke of Orleans was now captive in France, their former pretence for hostilities could no longer serve as a cover to their ambition. The king resolved, therefore, to engage as auxiliary to Britanny; and to consult the interests as well as desires of his people, by opposing himself to the progress of the Frence power. Besides entering into a league with Maximilian, and another with Ferdinand, which were distant resources, he levied a body of six thousand troops, with an intention of transporting them into Britanny. Still anxious, however, for the repayment of his expences, he concluded a treaty with the young duchess, by which she engaged to deliver into his hands two sea-port towns, there to remain till she should entirely refund the charges of the armament (x). Though he engaged for the service of these troops during the space of ten months only, yet was the duchess obliged, by the necessity of her affairs, to submit to such rigid conditions, imposed by an ally so much concerned in interest to protect her. The forces arrived under the command of lord Willoughby de Broke; and made the Bretons, during some time, masters of the field. The French retired into their garrisons; and expected, by dilatory measures, to waste the fire of the English, and disgust them with the enterprize. The scheme was well laid, and met with success. Lord Broke found such discord and confusion in the counsels of Britanny, that no measures could be concerted for any undertaking; no supply obtained; no provisions, carriages, artillery, or military stores procured. The whole court was rent into factions: no one minister had acquired the ascendant; and whatever project was formed by one, was sure to be traversed by another. The English, disconcerted in every enterprize by these animosities and uncertain counsels, returned home after having been in Britanny ten months, the time stipulated for their stay in that country; leaving only a small garrison in those towns which had been consigned to Henry. During their stay in Britanny, they had only contributed still farther to waste the country; and by their departure, they left it entirely at the mercy of the enemy. So feeble was the succour which Henry, in this important conjuncture, afforded his ally, whom the invasion of a foreign enemy, concurring with domestic dissensions, had reduced to the utmost distress.

The great object of the domestic dissensions in Britanny was the disposal of the young duchess in marriage. The mareschal Rieux, favoured by Henry, seconded the suit of the lord d'Albert, who led some forces to her assistance. The chancellor Montauban, observing the aversion of the duchess to this suitor, insisted that a petty prince, such as d'Albert, was unable to support Anne in her present extremities; and he recommended some more powerful alliance, particularly that of Maximilian king of the Romans. This party at last prevailed; the marriage with Maximilian was celebrated by proxy, in 1490; and the duchess thenceforth assumed the title of Queen of the Romans. But this magnificent appellation was all she gained by her marriage. Maximilian, destitute of troops and money, and embarrassed with the continual revolts of the Flemings, could send no succour to his distressed consort; while d'Albert, enraged at the preference given to his rival, deserted her cause, and received the French into Nantz, the most important place in the duchy, both for strength and opulence.

(u) Argentré Hist. de Bretagne, lib. xii. (v) Polydore Virgil, p. 579, says, that this imposition was a capitation tax; the other historians say it was a tax of two shillings in the pound. (w) Bacon, p. 595. (x) Du Tillet, Recueil des Traités.

The French court now began to change their scheme with regard to the subjection of Britanny. Charles had formerly been affianced to Margaret daughter of Maximilian; who, though too young for the consummation of her marriage, had been sent to Paris to be educated, and at this time bore the title of Queen of France. Besides the rich dowry which she brought the king, she was, after her brother Philip, then in early youth, heir to all the dominions of the house of Burgundy; and seemed, in many respects, the most proper match that could be chosen for the young monarch. These circumstances had so blinded both Maximilian and Henry, that they never suspected any other intentions in the French court; nor were they able to discover that engagements, seemingly so advantageous, and so solemnly entered into, could be infringed and set aside. But Charles began to perceive that the conquest of Britanny, in opposition to the natives, and to all the great powers of Christendom, would prove a difficult enterprize: and that even if he should over-run the country, and make himself master of the fortresses, it would be impossible for him long to retain possession of them. The marriage alone of the duchess could fully re-annex that fief to the crown; and the present and certain enjoyment of so considerable a territory seemed preferable to the prospect of inheriting the dominions of the house of Burgundy; a prospect which became every day more distant and precarious. Above all, the marriage of Maximilian and Anne appeared destructive to the grandeur, and even security, of the French monarch; while that prince, possessing Flanders on the one hand, and Britanny on the other, might thus, from both quarters, make inroads into the heart of the country. The only remedy for these evils therefore appeared to be the dissolution of the two marriages, which had been celebrated, but not consummated; and the espousal of the duchess of Britanny by the king of France.

It was necessary that this expedient, which had not been foreseen by any court in Europe, and which they were all so much interested to oppose, should be kept a profound secret, and should be discovered to the world only by the full execution of it. The measures of the French ministry in the conduct of this delicate enterprize were wise and political. While they pressed Britanny with all the rigours of war, they secretly gained the count of Dunois, who possessed great authority with the Bretons; and having also engaged in their interests the prince of Orange, cousin-german to the duchess, they gave him his liberty, and sent him into Britanny. These partizans, supported by other emissaries of France, prepared the minds of men for the great revolution projected, and displayed, though still with many precautions, all the advantages of a union with the French monarchy. They represented to the barons of Britanny, that their country, harrassed during so many years with perpetual war, had need of some repose, and of a solid and lasting peace with the only power that was formidable to them: that their alliance with Maximilian was not able to afford them even present protection; and, by closely uniting them to a power which was rival to the greatness of France, fixed them in perpetual enmity with that potent monarchy: that their vicinity exposed them first to the inroads of the enemy; and the happiest event which, in such a situation, could befal them, would be to attain a peace, though by a final subjection to France, and by the loss of that liberty transmitted to them from their ancestors; and that any other expedient, compatible with the honour of the state, and their duty to their sovereign, was preferable to a scene of such disorder, devastation and bloodshed.

These suggestions had influence with the Bretons: but the chief difficulty lay in surmounting the prejudices of the young duchess herself. That princess had imbibed a strong prepossession against the French nation, particularly against Charles, the author of all the calamities which, from her earliest infancy, had befallen her family. She had also fixed her affections on Maximilian; and as she now deemed him her husband, she could not, she thought, without incurring the greatest guilt, and violating the most solemn engagements, contract a marriage with any other person. In order, therefore, to overcome her obstinacy, Charles liberated the duke of Orleans, in 1491, who, though formerly a suitor to the duchess, was now contented to ingratiate himself with the king, by employing in his favour all the interest which he still possessed in Britanny. Mareschal Rieux and chancellor Montauban were reconciled by his mediation; and these rival ministers now concurred with the prince of Orange and the count of Dunois, in pressing the conclusion of a marriage with Charles. By their suggestion, Charles advanced with a powerful army, and invested Rennes, at that time the residence of the duchess; who, assailed on all hands, and finding none to support her in her inflexibility, at last opened the gates of the city, and agreed to espouse the king of France. She was married at Langey in Touraine; conducted to St. Dennis, where she was crowned; thence made her entry into Paris, amidst the joyful acclamations of the people, who regarded this marriage as the most prosperous event that could have befallen the monarchy.

The triumph and success of Charles was the most sensible mortification to the king of the Romans. He had lost a considerable territory, which he thought he had acquired, and an accomplished princess, whom he had espoused; he was affronted in the person of his daughter Margaret, who was sent back to him after she had been treated, during some years, as queen of France; he had reason to reproach himself with his own supine security, in neglecting the consummation of his marriage, which was easily practicable for him, and which would have rendered the tye indissoluble: these considerations threw him into the most violent rage, which he vented in very indecent expressions; and he threatened France with an invasion from the united arms of Austria, Spain, and England.

The king of England had also just reason to reproach himself with misconduct in this important transaction; and though the affair had terminated in a manner which he could not precisely foresee, his negligence in leaving his most useful ally so long exposed to the invasion of superior power, could not but appear, on reflexion, the result of timid caution and narrow politics. As he valued himself on his extensive foresight and profound judgement, the ascendant acquired over him by a raw youth such as Charles, could not but give him the highest displeasure, and prompt him to seek vengeance, after all remedy for his miscarriage was become absolutely impracticable. But he was farther actuated by avarice, a motive still more predominant with him than either pride or revenge; and he sought, even from his present disappointments, the gratification of this ruling passion. On pretence of a French war, he issued a commission, on the 7th of July, for levying a benevolence on his people (u); a species of taxation which had been abolished by a recent law of Richard III. This violence (for such it really was) fell chiefly on the commercial part of the nation, who were possessed of the ready money. London alone contributed near ten thousand pounds. Archbishop Morton, the chancellor, instructed the commissioners to employ a dilemma, in which every one might be compreliended: if the persons applied to lived frugally, they were told that their parsimony must necessarily have enriched them: if their method of living were splendid and hospitable, they were concluded to be opulent on account of their expences. This device was by some called chancellor Morton's fork, by others his crutch.

So little apprehensive was the king of a parliament on account of his levying this arbitrary imposition, that he soon after summoned that assembly to meet at Westminster, on the 27th of October, and he even expected to enrich himself farther by working on their passions and prejudices. He knew the displeasure which the English had conceived against France on account of the acquisition of Britanny; and he took care to insist on that topic, in the speech which he himself pronounced to the parliament. He told them that France, elated with her late successes, had even proceeded to a contempt of England, and had refused to pay the tribute which Louis XI. had stipulated to Edward IV.: that it became so warlike a nation as the English to be roused by this indignity, and not to limit their pretensions merely to repelling the present injury: that, for his part, he was determined to lay claim to the crown itself of France, and to maintain by force of arms so just a title, transmitted to him by his gallant ancestors: that Crecy, Poictiers, and Agincourt, were sufficient to instruct them in their superiority over the enemy; nor did he despair of adding new names to the glorious catalogue: that a king of France had been a prisoner in London, and a king of England had been crowned at Paris; events which should animate them to an emulation of like glory with that which had been enjoyed by their forefathers: that the domestic dissensions of England had been the sole cause of her losing these foreign dominions; and her present internal union would be the effectual means of recovering recovering them: that where such lasting honour was in view, and such an important acquisition, it became not brave men to repine at the advance of a little treasure; and that, for his part, he was determined to make the war maintain itself; and hoped, by the invasion of so opulent a kingdom as France, to increase, rather than diminish, the riches of the nation (x).

Notwithstanding these magnificent vaunts of the king, all men of penetration concluded, from the personal character of the man, and still more from the situation of affairs, that he had no serious intention of pushing the war to such extremities as he pretended. France was not now in the same condition as when such successful inroads had been made upon her by former kings of England. The great fiefs were united to the crown; the princes of the blood were desirous of tranquillity; the nation abounded with able captains and veteran soldiers; and the general aspect of her affairs seemed rather to threaten her neighbours, than to promise them any considerable advantages against her. The levity and vain-glory of Maximilian were supported by his pompous titles; but were ill seconded by military power, and still less by any revenue proportioned to them. The politic Ferdinand, while he made a show of war, was actually negociating for peace; and, rather than expose himself to any hazard, would accept of very moderate concessions from France. Even England was not free from domestic discontents; and in Scotland, the death of Henry's friend and ally James III. who had been murdered by his rebellious subjects, had made way for the succession of his son James IV. who was devoted to the French interest, and would surely be alarmed at any important progress of the English arms. But all these obvious considerations had no influence on the parliament. Inflamed by the ideas of subduing France, and of enriching themselves by the spoils of that kingdom, they gave into the snare prepared for them, and voted the supply which the king demanded. Two fifteenths were granted him; and the better to enable his vassals and nobility to attend him, an act was passed, empowering them to sell their estates, without paying any fines for alienation.

The nobility were universally seized with a desire of military glory; and having credulously swallowed all the boasts of the king, they dreamed of no less than carrying their triumphant banners to the gates of Paris, and putting the crown of France on the head of their sovereign. Many of them borrowed large sums, or sold off manors, that they might appear in the field with greater splendour, and lead out their followers in more complete order. The king crossed the sea, and arrived at Calais on the 6th of October, 1492, with an army of twenty-five thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, which he put under the command of the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford; but as some inferred, from his opening the campaign in so late a season, that peace would soon be concluded between the crowns, he was desirous of suggesting a contrary inference. "He had come over," he said, "to make an entire conquest of France, which was not the work of one summer. It was therefore of no consequence at what season he began the invasion; especially as he had Calais ready for winter-quarters." As if he had seriously intended to put his boasted threat into execution, he instantly marched into the enemy's country, and laid siege to Bologne; but notwithstanding this appearance of hostility, there had been secret advances made towards peace above three months before; and commissioners had been appointed to treat of the terms. The better to reconcile the minds of men to this unexpected measure, the king's ambassadors arrived in the camp from the Low Countries, and informed him that Maximilian was in no readiness to join him; nor was any assistance to be expected from that quarter. Soon after messengers came from Spain, and brought news of a peace concluded between that kingdom and France, in which Charles had made a cession of the counties of Rousillon and Cerdagne to Ferdinand. Though these articles of intelligence were carefully dispersed throughout the army, the king was still apprehensive lest a sudden peace, after such magnificent promises and high expectations, might expose him to reproach. In order the more effectually to cover the intended measures, he secretly engaged the marquis of Dorset, together with twenty-three other persons of distinction, to present him a petition for agreeing to a treaty with France. The pretence was founded on the late season of the year, the difficulty of supplying the army at Calais during winter, the obstacles which arose in the siege of Bologne, the desertion of those allies whose assistance had been most relied on: events which might, all of them, have been foreseen before the embarkation of the forces.

These preparatory steps being taken, the bishop of Exeter and lord Daubeny, governor of Calais, were sent to confer at Estaples with the mareschal de Cordes, and to put the last hand to the treaty. A few days sufficed for that purpose: the demands of Henry were wholly pecuniary; and the king of France, who deemed the peaceable possession of Britanny an equivalent for any sum, and who was all on fire for his projected expedition into Italy, readily agreed to the proposals made him. He engaged, on the 3rd of November, 1492, to pay Henry seven hundred and forty-five thousand crowns, near four hundred thousand pounds sterling of our present money; partly as a reimbursement of the sums advanced to Britanny, partly as arrears of the pension due to Edward IV. And he farther stipulated a yearly pension to Henry and his heirs of twenty-five thousand crowns. Thus the king as remarked by his historian, "made profit upon his subjects for the war; and upon his enemies for the peace (y)." In other words, he defrauded his people of their property, and bartered the honour of the nation for gold. And the people agreed that he had fulfilled his promise, when he said to the parliament that he would make the war maintain itself. Maximilian was, if he pleased, comprehended in Henry's treaty; but he disdained to be in any respect beholden to an ally of whom he thought he had reason to complain: he made a separate peace with France, and obtained restitution of Artois, Franchecompté, and Charolois, which had been ceded as the dowry of his daughter when she was affianced to the king of France.

The peace concluded between England and France was the more likely to continue, because Charles, full of ambition and youthful hopes, bent all his attention to the side of Italy, and soon after undertook the conquest of Naples; an enterprize which Henry regarded with the greater indifference, as Naples lay remote from him, and France had never in any age been successful in that quarter. The king's authority was fully established at home; and every rebellion which had been attempted against him had hitherto tended only to confound his enemies, and consolidate his own power and influence. His reputation for policy and conduct was daily augmenting; his treasures had increased even from the most unfavourable events; the hopes of all pretenders to his throne were cut off, as well by his marriage as by the issue which it had brought him. In this prosperous situation the king had reason to flatter himself with the prospect of durable peace and tranquillity; but his inveterate and indefatigable enemies, whom he had wantonly provoked, raised him an adversary, who long kept him in inquietude, and sometimes even brought him into danger.

The situation of affairs now seemed to promise peace and tranquillity to England: but the duchess of Burgundy, full of resentment for the depression of her family and its partizans, rather irritated than discouraged by the ill success of her past enterprizes, was determined, at least, to disturb that government which she found it so difficult to subvert. By means of her emissaries she propagated a report that her nephew Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, had escaped from the Tower when his elder brother was murdered, and that he still lay somewhere concealed: and finding this rumour, however improbable, to be well received by the people, she had been looking out for some young man proper to personate that unfortunate prince.

There was one Osbec, or Warbec, a renegado Jew of Tournay, who had been carried by some business to London in the reign of Edward IV. and had there a son born to him. Having had opportunities of being known to the king, and obtaining his favour, he prevailed with that prince, whose manners were very affable, to stand godfather to his son, to whom he gave the name of Peter, corrupted, after the Flemish manner, into Peterkin, or Perkin. It was by some believed that Edward, among his amorous adventures, had a secret commerce with Warbec's wife; and people thence accounted for that resemblance which was afterwards remarked between young Perkin and that monarch (z). Some years after the birth of this child Warbec returned to Tournay; where Perkin his son did not long remain, but by different accidents was carried from place to place, and his birth and fortunes became thereby unknown, and difficult to be traced by the enquiries of the most diligent scrutinizers. The variety of his adventures had happily favoured the natural versatility and and sagacity of his genius; and he seemed to be a youth perfectly fitted to act any part, or assume any character. In this light he had been represented to the duchess of Burgundy, who, struck with the concurrence of so many circumstances suited to her purpose, desired to be made acquainted with the man on whom she already began to ground her hopes of success. She found him to exceed her most sanguine expectations; so comely did he appear in his person, so graceful in his air, so courtly in his address, so full of docility and good sense in his behaviour and conversation. The lessons necessary to be taught him, in order to his personating the duke of York, were soon learned by a youth of such quick apprehension; but as the season seemed not then favourable for his enterprize, Margaret, in order the better to conceal him, sent him, under the care of lady Brampton, into Portugal, where he remained a year, in a manner sequestered from the prying eyes of European courtiers.

The war, which was then on the point of breaking out between France and England, seemed to afford a proper opportunity for the discovery of this new phænomenon; and Ireland, which still retained its attachments to the house of York, was chosen as the proper place for his first appearance (a). He landed at Corke; and assuming the name of Richard Plantagenet, drew to him partizans among that credulous people. He wrote letters to the earls of Desmond and Kildare, inviting them to join his party: he dispersed every where the strange intelligence of his escape from the cruelty of his uncle Richard: and the people, fond of every thing new and wonderful, began to make him the general subject of their discourse, and even the object of their favour. From Ireland the news was speedily conveyed to France; and Charles, prompted by the secret solicitations of the duchess of Burgundy, and the intrigues of one Frion, a secretary of Henry's, who had deserted his service, sent Perkin an invitation to repair to him at Paris. He received him with all the marks of regard due to the duke of York; settled on him a handsome pension, assigned him magnificent lodgings, and in order to provide at once for his dignity and security, gave him a guard for his person, of which lord Congresal accepted the office of captain. The French courtiers readily embraced a fiction which their sovereign thought it his interest to adopt: Perkin, both by his deportment and personal qualities, supported the prepossession which was spread abroad of his royal pedigree; and the whole kingdom was full of the accomplishments, as well as the singular adventures and misfortunes, of the young Plantagenet. Wonders of this nature are commonly augmented at a distance. From France the admiration and credulity diffused themselves into England: Sir George Nevil, Sir John Taylor, and above a hundred other gentlemen, went to Paris, to offer their services to the supposed duke of York, and to share his fortunes; and the impostor had now the appearance of a court attending him, and began to entertain hopes of final success in his undertakings.

Some time after, when peace was concluded between France and England at Estaples, Henry applied to have Perkin put into his hands; but Charles, resolute not to betray a young man, of whatever birth, whom he had invited into his kingdom, would only agree to dismiss him. The pretended Richard then retired to the duchess of Burgundy, and craving her protection and assistance, offered to lay before her all the proofs of that birth to which he laid claim. The princess affected ignorance of his pretensions; even put on the appearance of distrust; and having, as she said, been already deceived by Simnel, she was determined never again to be seduced by any impostor. She desired before all the world to be instructed in his reasons for assuming the name which he bore; seemed to examine every circumstance with the most scrupulous nicety; put many particular questions to him; affected astonishment at his answers; and at last, after long and severe scrutiny, burst out into joy and admiration at his wonderful deliverance, embraced him as her nephew, the true image of Edward, the sole heir of the Plantagenets, and the legitimate successor to the throne of England. In the beginning of 1493, she assigned him an equipage suited to his pretended birth; appointed him a guard of thirty halberdiers; engaged every one to pay court to him; and on all occasions honoured him with the appellation of the "White Rose of England." The Flemings, moved by the authority which Margaret, both from her rank and personal character, enjoyed among them, readily adopted the fiction of Perkin's royal descent. No surmise of his true birth was as yet heard of: little contradiction was made to the prevailing opinion; and the English, from their great communication with the Low Countries, were every day more and more prepossessed in favour of Perkin.

It was not the populace alone of England that gave credit to Perkin's pretensions. Men of the highest birth and quality, disgusted at Henry's government, by which they found the nobility depressed, began to turn their eyes towards the new claimant; and some of them even entered into a correspondence with him. Lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, betrayed their inclination towards him: Sir William Stanley himself, lord chamberlain, who had been so active in raising Henry to the throne, moved either by blind credulity or a restless ambition, entertained the project of a revolt in favour of his enemy (b). Sir Robert Clifford and William Barley were still more open in their measures: they went over to Flanders, were introduced by the duchess of Burgundy to the acquaintance of Perkin, and made him a tender of their services. Clifford wrote back to England, that he knew perfectly the person of Richard duke of York, that this young man was undoubtedly that prince himself, and that no circumstance of his story was exposed to the least difficulty. Such positive intelligence, conveyed by a person of rank and character, was sufficient, with many, to put the matter beyond question, and excited the attention and wonder even of the most indifferent. The whole nation was held in suspense; a regular conspiracy was formed against the king's authority; and a correspondence settled between the malcontents in Flanders and those in England.

The king being informed of all these particulars, agreeably to his character, which was both cautious and resolute, proceeded deliberately, though steadily, in counter-working the projects of his enemies. His first object was to ascertain the death of the real duke of York, and to confirm the opinion that had always prevailed with regard to that event. Five persons had been employed by Richard in the murder of his nephews, or could give evidence with regard to it; Sir James Tyrrel, to whom he had committed the government of the Tower for that purpose for one night only, and who had seen the dead princes; Forrest, Dighton, and Slater, who perpetrated the crime; and the priest who buried the bodies. Tyrrel and Dighton alone were alive, and they agreed in the same story; but as the priest was dead, and as the bodies were supposed to have been removed by Richard's orders, from the place where they were first interred, and could not now be found, it was not in Henry's power to put the fact, so much as he wished, beyond all doubt and controversy. The depositions of these wretches were however published.

He met at first with more difficulty, but was in the end more successful in detecting who this wonderful person was that thus boldly advanced pretensions to his crown. He dispersed his spies all over Flanders and England; he engaged many to pretend that they had embraced Perkin's party; he directed them to insinuate themselves into the confidence of the young man's friends; in proportion as they conveyed intelligence of any conspirator, he bribed his retainers, his domestic servants, nay, sometimes his confessor, and by these means traced up some other confederate; Clifford himself he engaged, by the hope of rewards and pardon, to betray the secrets committed to him; the more trust he gave to any of his spies, the higher resentment did he feign against them; some of them he even caused to be publicly anathematized, in order the better to procure them the confidence of his enemies; and in the issue, the whole plan of the conspiracy was clearly laid before him; and the pedigree, adventures, life, and conversation of the pretended duke of York. This latter part of the story was immediately published for the satisfaction of the nation; but the conspirators he reserved for a slower and surer vengeance."

He remonstrated, in the mean time, with the archduke Philip, on account of the countenance and protection which was afforded in his dominions to so infamous an impostor; contrary to treaties subsisting between the sovereigns, and to the mutual amity which had so long been maintained by the subjects of both states. Margaret had interest enough to get his application rejected; on pretence that Philip had no authority over the demesnes of the duchess dowager. And the king, in resentment of this injury, cut off all commerce with the Low Countries, banished the Flemings, and recalled his own subjects from those provinces. Philip retaliated by like edicts; but Henry

Henry knew, that so mutinous a people as the Flemings would not long bear, in compliance with the humours of their prince, to be deprived of the beneficial branch of commerce which they carried on with England.

Henry, however, had it in his power to inflict more effectual punishment on his domestic enemies; and when his projects were sufficiently matured, he failed not to make them feel the effects of his resentment. Almost in the same instant he arrested lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montfort, and Sir Thomas Thwaites, together with William Daubeney, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Cressenor, and Thomas Atwood. All these were arraigned, convicted, and condemned for high treason, in adhering and promising aid to Perkin. Montfort, Ratcliff, and Daubeney, were immediately executed: Fitzwalter was sent over to Calais, and detained in custody; but being detected in practising on his keeper for an escape, he soon after underwent the same fate. The rest were pardoned, together with William Worseley, dean of St. Paul's, and some others, who had been accused and examined, but not brought to public trial (c).

Greater and more solemn preparations were deemed requisite for the trial of Stanley, lord chamberlain, whose authority in the nation, whose domestic connexions with the king, as well as his former services, seemed to secure him against any accusation or punishment. Sir Robert Clifford was now, 1494, directed to come over privately to England, and to throw himself at the king's feet while he sat in council; craving pardon for past offences, and offering to atone for them by any services which should be required of him. Henry then told him, that the best proof he could give of penitence, and the only service he could now render him, was the full confession of his guilt, and the discovery of all his accomplices, however distinguished by rank or character. Encouraged by this exhortation, Clifford accused Sir William Stanley, then present, as his chief abettor; and offered to lay before the council the full proof of his guilt. Stanley himself could not discover more surprize than was affected by Henry on the occasion. He received the intelligence as absolutely false and incredible; that a man, to whom he was in a great measure beholden for his crown, and even for his life; a man to whom by every honour and favour he had endeavoured to express his gratitude; whose brother, the earl of Derby, was his own father-in-law; to whom he had even committed the trust of his person, by creating him lord chamberlain: that this man, enjoying his full confidence and affection, not actuated by any motive of discontent or apprehension, should engage in a conspiracy against him. Clifford was therefore exhorted to weigh well the consequences of his accusation; but as he persisted in the same positive asseverations, Stanley was committed to custody, and was soon after examined before the council (d). He denied not the guilt imputed to him by Clifford; he did not even endeavour to extenuate it; whether he thought that a frank and open confession would serve as an atonement, or trusted to his present connexions and his former services for pardon and security. But princes are apt to regard great services as a ground of jealousy, especially if accompanied with a craving and restless disposition in the person who has performed them. The general discontent also, and mutinous humour of the people, seemed to require some great example of severity. And as Stanley was one of the most opulent subjects in the kingdom, being possessed of above three thousand pounds a-year in land, and forty thousand marks in plate and money, besides other property of great value, the prospect of so rich a forfeiture was deemed no small motive for Henry's proceeding to extremities against him. After six weeks delay, which was interposed in order to shew that the king was restrained by doubts and scruples; the prisoner was brought to his trial, condemned, and beheaded on the 15th of February, 1495. Historians are not agreed with regard to the crime which was proved against him. The general report is, that he should have said in confidence to Clifford, that if he were sure the young man who appeared in Flanders was really son to king Edward, he never would bear arms against him. The sentiment might disgust Henry, as implying a preference of the house of York to that of Lancaster; but could scarcely be the ground, even in those arbitrary times, of a sentence of high treason against Stanley. It is more probable, therefore, as is asserted by some historians, that he had expressly engaged to assist Perkin, and had actually sent him some supply of money.

The fate of Stanley made great impression on the kingdom, and struck all the partizans of Perkin with the deepest dismay. From Clifford's desertion they found that all their secrets were betrayed; and as it appeared that Stanley, while he seemed to live in the greatest confidence with the king, had been continually surrounded by spies, who reported and registered every action in which he was engaged, nay, every word which fell from him, a general distrust took place, and all mutual confidence was destroyed, even among intimate friends and acquaintance. No one knew but that his actions and conversations were registered, and transmitted to the king's council. The jealous and severe temper of the king, together with his great reputation for sagacity and penetration, kept men in awe, and quelled not only the movements of sedition, but the very murmurs of faction. Libels, however, creeped out against Henry's person and administration; and being greedily propagated by every secret art, shewed that there still remained among the people a considerable root of discontent, which wanted only a proper opportunity to discover itself.

But Henry continued more intent on increasing the terrors of his people, than on gaining their affections. Trusting to the great success which attended him in all his enterprizes, he gave every day more and more a loose to his rapacious temper, and employed the arts of perverted law and justice, in order to exact fines and compositions from his people. Sir William Capel, alderman of London, was condemned on some penal statutes to pay the sum of two thousand seven hundred and forty-three pounds, and was obliged to compound for sixteen hundred and fifteen. This was the first noted case of the kind; but it became a precedent, which prepared the way for many others. The management, indeed, of these arts of chicanery, was the great secret of the king's administration. While he depressed the nobility, he exalted and honoured and caressed the lawyers; and by that means both bestowed authority on the laws, and was enabled, whenever he pleased, to pervert them to his own advantage. His government was oppressive; but it was so much the less burdensome, as by his extending royal authority, and curbing the nobles, he became in reality the sole oppressor in his kingdom.

In the summer of this year (1495) Henry, in order to convince the world that the infidelity of Stanley had not diminished his regard for his brother, the earl of Derby; nor his affection for his own mother, the wife of that nobleman; made an excursion to the earl's house at Latham, where he staid three days, and seemed perfectly satisfied with his entertainment. From thence he made a progress through the northern counties. As Perkin now found that the king's authority daily gained ground among the people, and that his own pretensions were becoming obsolete, therefore he resolved to attempt something which might revive the hopes and expectations of his partizans. Having collected a band of outlaws, pirates, robbers, and necessitous persons of all nations, to the number of six hundred men, he put to sea, with a resolution of making a descent in England, and of exciting the common people to arms, since all his correspondence with the nobility was cut off by Henry's vigilance and severity. Having received information that the king had made a progress to the north, he cast anchor on the coast of Kent, and sent some of his retainers ashore, who invited the country people to join him. The gentlemen of Kent assembled some troops to oppose him; but they purposed to do more essential service than by repelling the invasion: they carried the semblance of friendship to Perkin, and invited him to come himself ashore, in order to take the command over them. But the youth, always on his guard, observing that they had more order and regularity in their movements than could be supposed in new levied forces who had taken arms against established authority, refused to entrust himself into their hands; and the Kentish troops, despairing of success in their stratagem, fell upon such of his retainers as were already landed. Besides some whom they slew, they took a hundred and fifty prisoners. These were tried and condemned; and all of them executed by orders from the king, who was resolved to use no lenity towards men of such desperate fortunes (e).

This year a parliament was summoned in England, on the 13th of October, and another in Ireland; and some remarkable laws were passed in both countries. The English parliament enacted, that no person who should, by arms or otherwise, assist the king for the time being, should ever afterwards, either by course of law or act of parliament, be attainted for such an instance of obedience. This statute might be exposed to some censure, as favourable to usurpers; were there any precise rule which always, even during the most factious times, could determine the true successor, and render every one inexcusable who did not submit to him. But as the titles of princes are then the great subject of dispute, and each party pleads topics in its own favour, it seems but equitable to secure those who act in support of public tranquillity, an object at all times of undoubted benefit and importance. But Henry, conscious of his disputed title, promoted this law, in order to secure his partizans against all events; as he had himself observed a contrary practice with regard to Richard's adherents, he had reason to apprehend, that during the violence which usually ensues on public convulsions, his example rather than his law would, in case of a new revolution, be followed by his enemies. And the attempt to bind the legislature itself, by prescribing rules to future parliaments, was contradictory to the plainest principles of political government. This parliament also passed an act, empowering the king to levy, by course of law, all the sums which any person had agreed to pay by way of benevolence: a statute by which that arbitrary method of taxation was indirectly authorized and justified.

The king's authority appeared equally prevalent and uncontrolled in Ireland. Sir Edward Poynings had been sent over to that country, with an intention of quelling the partizans of the house of York, and of reducing the natives to subjection. He was not supported by forces sufficient for that enterprize: the Irish, by flying into their woods, morasses, and mountains, for some time eluded his efforts: but Poynings summoned a parliament at Dublin, where he was more successful. He passed that memorable statute, which still bears his name, and which establishes the authority of the English government in Ireland. By this statute all the former laws of England were made to be of force in Ireland; and no bill could be introduced into the Irish parliament, unless it previously receive the sanction of the council of England. This latter clause seems calculated for ensuring the dominion of the English; but was really granted at the desire of the Irish commons, who intended by that means to secure themselves from the tyranny of their lords, particularly of such lieutenants or deputies as were of Irish birth (f).

Towards the conclusion of this year (1495), the king created his son Henry, duke of York. The prince was at the same time made a knight of the Bath; and several noblemen and gentlemen were likewise admitted into that noble order.

While Henry's authority was thus established throughout his dominions, and general tranquillity prevailed, the whole continent was thrown into combustion by the French invasion of Italy, and by the rapid success which attended Charles in that rash and ill-concerted enterprize. The Italians, who had entirely lost the use of arms, and who, in the midst of continual wars, had become every day more unwarlike, were astonished to meet an enemy, that made the field of battle not a pompous tournament, but a scene of blood, and sought, at the hazard of their own lives, the death of their enemy. Their effeminate troops were dispersed every where on the approach of the French army: their best fortified cities opened their gates: kingdoms and states were in an instant overturned: and through the whole length of Italy, which the French penetrated without resistance, they seemed rather to be taking quarters in their own country than to be making conquests over an enemy. The maxims which the Italians during that age followed in negociations, were as ill calculated to support their states as the habits to which they were addicted in war: a treacherous, deceitful, and inconsistent system of politics prevailed; and even those small remains of fidelity and honour, which were preserved in the councils of the other European princes, were ridiculed in Italy as proofs of ignorance and rusticity. Ludovico duke of Milan, who invited the French to invade Naples, had never desired or expected their success; and was the first that felt terror from the prosperous issue of those projects which he himself had concerted. By his intrigues a league was formed among several potentates to oppose the progress of Charles's conquests, and secure their own independency. This league was composed of Ludovico himself, the pope, Maximilian king of the Romans, Ferdinand of Spain, and the republic of Venice. Henry too entered into the confederacy; but was not put to any expence or trouble in consequence of his engagements. The king of France, terrified by so powerful a combination, retired from Naples with the greater part of his army, and returned to France. The forces which he left in his new conquest were, partly by the revolt of the inhabitants, partly by the invasion of the Spaniards, soon after subdued; and the whole kingdom of Naples suddenly returned to its allegiance under Ferdinand, son to Alphonso, who had been suddenly expelled by the irruption of the French. Ferdinand died soon after; and left his uncle Frederic in full possession of the throne.

Perkin having been repulsed from the coast of Kent, retired into Flanders; but as he found it impossible to procure subsistence for himself and his followers, while he remained in tranquillity, he soon after made an attempt upon Ireland, which had always appeared forward to join every invader of Henry's authority. But Poynings had now put the affairs of that island in so good a posture, that Perkin met with little success; and being tired of the savage life which he was obliged to lead while wandering among the wild Irish, he bent his course towards Scotland, and presented himself to James IV. who then sat on the throne of that kingdom. He had been previously recommended to this prince by the king of France, who was disgusted at Henry for entering into the general league against him; and this recommendation was even seconded by Maximilian, who, though one of the confederates, was also displeased with the king on account of his prohibitiug in England all commerce with the Low Countries. The countenance given to Perkin by these princes procured him a favourable reception with the king of Scotland, who assured him, that whatever he were, he never should repent putting himself in his hands (g): the insinuating address and plausible behaviour of the youth himself seem to have gained him credit and authority. James, whom years had not yet taught distrust or caution, was seduced to believe the story of Perkin's birth and adventures; and he carried his confidence so far as to give him in marriage the lady Catharine Gordon, daughter of the earl of Huntley, and related to himself: a young lady eminent for her virtue as well as for her beauty and engaging manners.

There subsisted at that time a great jealousy between the courts of England and Scotland; and James was probably the more forward on that account to adopt any fiction which he thought might reduce his enemy to distress or difficulty. He suddenly resolved to make an inroad into England, which he did in the spring of 1496, attended by some of the borderers; and he carried Perkin along with him, in hopes that the appearance of the pretended prince might raise an insurrection in the northern counties. Perkin himself dispersed a manifesto, in which he set forth his own story, and craved the assistance of all his subjects in expelling the usurper, whose tyranny and mal-administration, whose depression of the nobility by the elevation of mean persons, whose oppression of the people by multiplied impositions and vexations, had justly, he said, rendered him odious to all men. But Perkin's pretensions, attended with repeated disappointments, were now become languid in the eyes even of the populace; and the hostile dispositions which subsisted between the kingdoms rendered a prince, supported by the Scots, but an unwelcome present to the English nation. The ravages also committed by the borderers, accustomed to licence and disorder, struck a terror into all men; and made the people prepare rather for repelling the invaders than for joining them. Perkin, that he might support his pretensions to royal birth, feigned great compassion for the misery of his plundered subjects; and publicly remonstrated with his ally against the depredations exercised by the Scottish army (h): but James told him, that he doubted his concern was employed only in behalf of an enemy, and that he was anxious to preserve what never should belong to him. That prince now began to perceive that his attempt would be fruitless; and hearing of an army which was on its march to attack him, he thought proper to retreat into his own country.

The king discovered little anxiety to procure reparation or to take vengeance for this insult committed on him by the Scottish nation: his chief concern was to draw advantage from it, by the pretence which it might afford him to levy impositions on his own subjects. Therefore on the 16th of January, 1497, he summoned a parliament, to whom he made bitter complaints against the irruption of the Scots, the absurd imposture countenanced by that nation, the cruel devastations committed in the northern counties, and the multiplied insults thus offered both to the king and kingdom of England. The parliament made the expected return to this discourse, by granting a subsidy sidy to the amount of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, together with two fifteenths. After making this grant, the only cause of their having been assembled, they were dismissed. The vote of parliament for imposing the tax was without much difficulty procured by the authority of Henry; but he found it not so easy to levy the money upon his subjects, as it was to obtain the grant from parliament. The people, who were acquainted with the immense treasures which he had amassed, could ill brook the new impositions raised on every slight occasion; and it is probable that the flaw, which was universally known to be in his title, made his reign the more subject to insurrections and rebellions. When the subsidy began to be levied in Cornwall, the inhabitants, numerous and poor, robust and courageous, murmured against a tax occasioned by a sudden inroad of the Scots, from which they esteemed themselves entirely secure, and which had usually been repelled by the force of the northern counties. Their discontent was farther inflamed by one Michael Joseph, a farrier of Bodmin, a notable prating fellow, who, by thrusting himself forward on every occasion, and being loudest in every complaint against the government, had acquired an authority among those rude people. Thomas Flammoc, a lawyer, who, from a pompous display of professional knowledge, had become the oracle of the neighbourhood, encouraged the sedition, by informing them that the tax, though imposed by parliament, was entirely illegal; that the northern nobility were bound by their tenures to defend the nation against the Scots; and that if these new impositions were tamely submitted to, the avarice of Henry and of his ministers would soon render the burden intolerable to the nation. The Cornish, he said must deliver to the king a petition, seconded by such a force as would give it authority; and, in order to procure the concurrence of the rest of the kingdom, care must be taken, by their orderly deportment, to shew that they had nothing in view but the public good, and the redress of all those grievances with which the nation had been so long burdened. Encouraged by the exhortations of these persons, the multitude flocked together, and armed themselves with axes, bills, bows, and such weapons as country people are usually possessed of. Flammoc and Joseph were chosen their leaders. They soon conducted the Cornishmen through the county of Devon, and reached that of Somerset. At Taunton the rebels killed, in their fury, an officious and eager commissioner of the subsidy, whom they called the provost of Perin. When they reached Wells, they were joined by lord Audley, a nobleman of an ancient family, popular in his deportment, but vain, ambitious, and restless in his temper. He had from the beginning maintained a secret correspondence with the first movers of the insurrection; and was now joyfully received by them as their leader. Proud of the countenance given them by so considerable a nobleman, they continued their march; breathing destruction to the king's ministers and favourites, particularly to Morton, now a cardinal, and sir Reginald Bray, who were deemed the most active instruments in all his oppressions. Notwithstanding their rage against the administration, they carefully followed the directions given them by their leaders; and as they met with no resistance, they committed, during their march, no violence or disorder.

The rebels had been told by Flammoc, that the inhabitants of Kent, as they had ever, during all ages, remained unsubdued, and had even maintained their independence during the Norman conquest, would surely embrace their party, and declare themselves for a cause which was no other than that of public good and general liberty. But the Kentish people had very lately distinguished themselves by repelling Perkin's invasion; and as they had received from the king many gracious acknowledgements for this service, their affections were, by that means, much conciliated to his government. It was easy therefore, for the earl of Kent, lord Abergavenny, and lord Cobham, who possessed great authority in those parts, to retain the people in obedience; and the Cornish rebels, though they pitched their camp near Eltham, at the very gates of London, and invited all the people to join them, got reinforcement from no quarter. There wanted not discontents every where, but no one would take part in so rash and ill-concerted an enterprize; and besides, the situation in which the king's affairs then stood, discouraged even the boldest and most daring.

Henry, in order to oppose the Scots, had already levied an army, which he put under the command of lord Daubeney, who had succeeded Stanley in the office of chamberlain; and as soon as he heard of the Cornish insurrection, he ordered it to march southwards, and suppress the rebels. Not to leave the northern parts defenceless, he dispatched thither the earl of Surrey, who assembled the forces on the borders, and made head against the enemy. Henry found here the concurrence of the three most fatal incidents that can befal a monarchy; a foreign enemy, a domestic rebellion, and a pretender to his crown; but he enjoyed great resources in his army and treasure, and still more in the intrepidity and courage of his own temper. He did not, however, immediately give full scope to his military spirit. On other occasions, he had always hastened to a decision; and it was a usual saying with him, "that he desired but to see his rebels:" but as the Cornish mutineers behaved in an inoffensive manner, and committed no spoil on the country; as they received no accession of force on their march or in their encampment; and as such hasty and popular tumults might be expected to diminish every moment by delay; he protracted the attack; and taking post in London, he assiduously prepared the means of ensuring victory.

Having collected his forces together, he divided them into three bodies, and marched out to assail the enemy. The first body, commanded by the earl of Oxford, and under him by the earls of Essex and Suffolk, were appointed to place themselves behind the hill on which the rebels were encamped: the second and most considerable, Henry put under the command of lord Daubeney, who was ordered to attack the enemy in front, and bring on the action. The third he kept as a body of reserve about his own person, and took post in St. George's Fields; where he secured the city, and could easily, as occasion served, either restore the fight, or finish the victory. To put the enemy off their guard, he spread a report that he was not to attack them till some days after; and the better to confirm them in this opinion, he began not the action till near the evening of the 22nd of June, 1497. Daubeney beat a detachment of the rebels from Deptford bridge; and before the main body could be in order to receive him, he had gained the ascent of the hill, and placed himself in array before them. The enemy were formidable from their numbers, being sixteen thousand strong, and nowise defective in valour; but being tumultuary troops, ill armed, and not provided with cavalry or artillery, they were but an unequal match for the king's forces. Daubeney began the attack with courage, and even with a contempt of the enemy, which had almost proved fatal to him. He rushed into the midst of them, and was taken prisoner; but soon after was released by his own troops. After some resistance the rebels were broken, and put to flight (i). Lord Audley, Flammoc, and Joseph, their leaders, were taken, and all three executed. The latter seemed even to exult in his end, and boasted with a preposterous ambition, that he should make a figure in history. The rebels, being surrounded on every side by the king's troops, were almost all made prisoners, and immediately dismissed without farther punishment: whether that Henry was satisfied with the victims who had fallen in the field, and who amounted to near two thousand, or that he pitied the ignorance and simplicity of the multitude, or favoured them on account of their inoffensive behaviour, or was pleased that they had never, during their insurrection, disputed his title, and had shewn no attachment to the house of York, the highest crime, of which, in his opinion, they could have been guilty.

The Scottish king remained not inactive during these commotions in England. He levied a considerable army, and sat down before the castle of Norham in Northumberland; but found that place, by the precaution of Fox bishop of Durham, so well provided both with men and ammunition, that he made little or no progress in the siege. Hearing that the earl of Surrey had collected some forces, and was advancing against him, he retreated into his own country, and left the frontiers exposed to the inroads of the English general, who besieged and took Aiton, a small town and castle lying a few miles beyond Berwick. These unsuccessful or frivolous attempts on both sides prognosticated a speedy end to the war; and Henry, notwithstanding his superior force, was no less desirous than James of terminating the differences between the nations. Not to depart, however, from his dignity, by making the first advances, he employed in this friendly office Peter Hialas, a man of address and learning, who had come to him as ambassador from Ferdinand and Isabella, and who was charged with a commission of negociating the marriage of the infanta Catharine their daughter, with Arthur prince of Wales (k).

Hialas

Hialas accordingly took a journey northwards, and offered his mediation between James and Henry, as minister of a prince who was in alliance with both potentates. Commissioners were soon appointed to meet, and confer on terms of accommodation. The first demand of the English was, that Perkin should be put into their hands: James replied, that he himself was no judge of the young man's pretensions, but having received him as a supplicant, and promised him protection, he was determined not to betray a man who had trusted to his good faith and his generosity. The next demand of the English met with no better reception: they required reparation for the ravages committed by the late inroads into England: the Scotch commissioners replied, that the spoils were like water spilt upon the ground, which could never be recovered, and that Henry's subjects were better able to bear the loss, than their masters to repair it. Henry's commissioners next proposed, that the two kings should have an interview at Newcastle, in order to adjust all differences; but James said, that he meant to treat of a peace, not to beg for it. Lest the conferences should break off altogether without effect, a truce was concluded for some months; and James, perceiving that, while Perkin remained in Scotland, he himself never should enjoy a solid peace with Henry, privately desired him to repair to some place of greater security. Hereupon Perkin would have retired to the Low Countries, his usual retreat in all his disappointments, but an insurmountable barrier was raised against him. The Flemish merchants, who severely felt the loss resulting from the interruption of commerce with England, had made such interest in the archduke's council, that commissioners were sent to London, in order to treat of an accommodation. The Flemish court agreed, that all English rebels should be excluded the Low Countries; and in this prohibition the demesnes of the duchess-dowager were expressly comprehended. When this principal article was agreed to, all the other terms were easily adjusted. A treaty of commerce was finished, which was favourable to the Flemings, and to which they long gave the appellation of Intercursus magnus, the great treaty. And when the English merchants returned to their usual abode at Antwerp, they were publicly received, as in procession, with joy and festivity.

Perkin was a Fleming by descent, though born in England; and it might therefore be doubted, whether he were included between the two nations: but as he must dismiss all his English retainers if he took shelter in the Low Countries, and as he was sure of a cold reception, if not bad usage, among people who were determined to keep on terms of friendship with the court of England; he thought fit rather to hide himself, during some time, in the wilds and fastnesses of Ireland. Impatient, however, of a retreat, which was both disagreeable and dangerous, he held consultations with his followers, Herne, Skelton, and Astley, three tradesmen who had failed in business: by their advice, he resolved to try the affections of the Cornish, whose mutinous disposition, notwithstanding the king's lenity, still subsisted, after the suppression of their rebellion. He accordingly embarked, with about seventy men, in four small vessels; and, having arrived at Whitsand Bay in the month of September, 1497, he proceeded from thence to Bodmin in Cornwal, where the populace, to the number of three thousand, flocked to his standard; and Perkin, elated with this appearance of success, took on him, for the first time, the appellation of Richard the Fourth, king of England, and published a proclamation, exhorting the people to rise, and effect the deposition of Henry Tudor, who, he said, had usurped the throne to the prejudice of the lawful heir. Not to suffer the expectations of his followers to languish, he presented himself before Exeter; and, by many fair promises, invited that city to join him. Finding that the inhabitants shut their gates against him, he laid siege to the place; but being unprovided with artillery, ammunition, and every thing requisite for the attempt, he made no progress in his undertaking. Messengers were sent to the king, informing him of this insurrection: the citizens of Exeter, meanwhile, were determined to hold out to the last extremity, in expectation of receiving succour from the well-known vigilance of Henry.

When that monarch was informed that Perkin was landed in England, he expressed great joy, and prepared himself with alacrity to attack him, in hopes of being able, at length, to put a period to his pretensions which had so long given him vexation and inquietude. All his courtiers, sensible that their activity on this occasion would be the most acceptable service which they could render the king, displayed their zeal for the enterprize, and forwarded his preparations. The lords Daubeney and Broke, with sir Rice ap Thomas, hastened forward with a small body of troops to the relief of Exeter. The earl of Devonshire, and the most considerable gentlemen in the county of that name, took arms of their own accord, and marched to join the king's generals. The duke of Buckingham put himself at the head of a troop, consisting of young nobility and gentry, who served as volunteers, and who longed for an opportunity of displaying their courage and their loyalty. The king himself prepared to follow with a considerable army; and thus all England seemed united against a pretender who had at first not only engaged their attention, but divided their affections.

Information respecting these preparations was conveyed to Perkin; who immediately raised the siege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton. Though his followers now amounted to the number of near seven thousand, and seemed still resolute to maintain his cause, he himself despaired of success, and secretly withdrew to the sanctuary of Beaulieu in the New Forest. The Cornish rebels submitted to the king's mercy, and found that it was not yet exhausted in their behalf. Except a few persons of desperate fortunes who were executed, and some others who were severely fined, all the rest were dismissed with impunity. Lady Catharine Gordon, wife to Perkin, fell into the hands of the victor, at St. Michael's Mount, and was treated with a generosity which does him honour. He soothed her mind with many marks of regard, placed her in a reputable station about the queen, and assigned her a pension, which she enjoyed even under his successor, till her death.

As Perkin had retired to a sanctuary, Henry was at a loss what course to take with respect to him. This required some consideration. Some counselled him to make the privileges of the church yield to the reasons of state, to take him by violence from the sanctuary, to inflict on him the punishment due to his temerity, and thus at once put an end to an imposture which had long disturbed the government, and which the credulity of the people, and the artifices of malcontents, were still capable of reviving. But the king deemed not the matter of such importance as to merit so violent a remedy. He employed some persons to deal with Perkin, and persuade him, under promise of pardon, to deliver himself into the king's hands (l); which being done, the king conducted him, in a species of mock triumph, to London. As Perkin passed along the road, and through the streets of the city, men of all ranks flocked about him, and the populace treated with the highest derision his fallen fortunes. They seemed desirous of revenging themselves, by their insults, for the shame which their former belief of his impostures had thrown upon them. Though the eyes of the nation were generally open with regard to Perkin's real parentage, Henry required of him a confession of his life and adventures; and he ordered the account of the whole to be dispersed, soon after, for the satisfaction of the public. But as his regard to decency made him entirely suppress the share which the duchess of Burgundy had had in contriving and conducting the imposture, the people, who knew that she had been the chief instrument in the whole affair, were inclined, on account of the silence on that head, to pay the less credit to the authenticity of the narrative.

But Perkin, though his life was granted him, was still detained in custody; and keepers were appointed to guard him. Impatient of confinement, he broke from his keepers, and flying to the sanctuary of Sheen, put himself into the hands of the prior of that monastery. The prior had obtained great credit by his character of sanctity; and he prevailed on the king again to grant a pardon to Perkin. But in order to reduce him to still greater contempt, he was set in the stocks at Westminster and Cheapside, and obliged in both places to read aloud to the people the confession which had formerly been published in his name. He was then confined to the Tower, where his habits of restless intrigue and enterprize followed him. He insinuated himself into the intimacy of four servants belonging to sir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower; and, by their means, opened a correspondence with the earl of Warwick, who was confined in the same prison. This unfortunate prince, who had from his earliest youth been shut up from the commerce of men, and who was ignorant even of the most common affairs of life, had fallen into into a simplicity which made him susceptible of any impression. The continued dread also of the more violent effects of Henry's tyranny, joined to the natural love of liberty, engaged him to embrace a project for his escape, by the murder of the lieutenant; and Perkin offered to conduct the whole enterprize. The conspiracy escaped not the king's vigilance: it was even very generally believed that the scheme had been laid by himself, in order to draw Warwick and Perkin into the snare: but the subsequent execution of two of Digby's servants for the contrivance, seems to clear the king of that imputation, which was indeed founded more on the general idea entertained of his character, than on any positive evidence that could be produced.

Perkin, by this new attempt, after so many enormities, had rendered himself totally unworthy of mercy; and he was accordingly arraigned, condemned, and soon after, on the 23rd of November, 1499, executed at Tyburn, persisting still in the confession of his imposture (m). John Walter, mayor of Cork, who had constantly adhered to Perkin's cause in all the vicissitudes of his fortune, was executed with him. It happened about that very time, that one Wilford, a cordwainer's son, encouraged by the surprizing credit given to other impostures, had undertaken to personate the earl of Warwick; and Patrick, an Augustine monk, had even ventured from the pulpit to recommend his cause to the people, who seemed still to retain a propensity to adopt it. This incident served Henry as a pretence for his severity towards that prince; who was accordingly brought to trial, and accused not of contriving his escape, (for as he was committed for no crime, the desire of liberty must have been regarded as natural and innocent,) but of forming designs to disturb the government, and raise an insurrection among the people. Warwick confessed the indictment, was condemned, and the sentence was executed upon him on the 28th of the same month.

This violent act of tyranny, the great blemish of Henry's reign, by which he destroyed the last remaining male of the line of Plantagenet, begat great discontent among the people, who saw an unhappy prince, that had long been denied all the privileges of his high birth, even been cut off from the common benefits of nature, now at last deprived of life itself, merely for attempting to shake off that oppression under which he laboured. In vain did Henry endeavour to alleviate the odium of this guilt, by sharing it with his ally Ferdinand of Arragon, who, he said, had scrupled to give his daughter Catherine in marriage to Arthur, while any male descendant of the house of York remained. Men, on the contrary, felt higher indignation at seeing a young prince sacrificed, not to law and justice, but to the jealous politics of two subtle and crafty tyrants.

But though these discontents festered in the minds of men, they were so checked by Henry's watchful policy and steady severity, that they seemed not to weaken his government; and foreign princes, deeming his throne now entirely secure, paid him rather the greater deference and attention. The archduke Philip, in particular, desired an interview with him; and Henry, who had passed over to Calais, agreed to meet him in St. Peter's church near that city. The archduke, on his approaching the king, made haste to alight, and offered to hold Henry's stirrup; a mark of condescension which that prince would not admit of. He called the king father, patron, protector; and, by his whole behaviour, expressed a strong desire of conciliating the friendship of England. The duke of Orleans had succeeded to the crown of France by the appellation of Louis XII. and having carried his arms into Italy, and subdued the duchy of Milan, his progress begat jealousy in Maximilian, Philip's father, as well as in Ferdinand, his father-in-law. By the counsel, therefore, of these monarchs, the young prince endeavoured by every art to acquire the amity of Henry, whom they regarded as the chief counterpoise to the greatness of France. No particular plan, however, of alliance seems to have been concerted between these two princes in their interview: all passed in general professions of affection and regard; at least, in remote projects of a closer union, by the future intermarriages of their children, who were then in a state of infancy.

The pope too, Alexander VI. neglected not the friendship of a monarch whose reputation was so generally spread over Europe. In the beginning of 1500, he sent a nuntio into England, who exhorted the king to take part in the great alliance projected for the recovery of the Holy Land, and to lead in person his forces against the infidels. The general frenzy for crusades was now entirely exhausted in Europe; but it was still thought a necessary piece of decency to pretend zeal for those pious enterprizes. Henry regretted to the nuntio the distance of his situation, which rendered it inconvenient for him to expose his person in defence of the Christian cause. He promised, however, his utmost assistance by aids and contributions; and rather than the pope should go alone to the holy wars, unaccompanied by any monarch, he even promised to overlook all other considerations, and to attend him in person. He only required as a necessary condition, that all differences should previously be adjusted among Christian princes, and that some sea-port towns in Italy should be consigned to him for his retreat and security. It was easy to conclude, that Henry had determined not to intermeddle in any war against the Turks: but as a great name, without any real assistance, is sometimes of service, the knights of Rhodes, who were at that time esteemed the bulwark of Christendom, chose the king protector of their order. As this was a chimerical project which Alexander had no intention to execute, he enjoyed the credit of his pious ardour, without subjecting himself to the smallest expence; and the other potentates of Europe, receiving the proposals of his holiness with indifference, the whole scheme was speedily abandoned.

But the prince whose alliance Henry valued the most, was Ferdinand of Arragon, whose vigorous and steady policy, always attended with success, had rendered him in many respects the most considerable monarch in Europe. There was also a remarkable similarity of character between these two princes: both were full of craft, intrigue, and design; and though a resemblance of this nature be a slender foundation for confidence and amity, where the interests of the parties in the least interfere; such was the situation of Henry and Ferdinand, that no jealousy ever on any occasion arose between them. The king had now the satisfaction of completing a marriage, which had been projected and negociated during the course of seven years, between Arthur prince of Wales, and the Infanta Catherine, fourth daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella: he near sixteen years of age, she eighteen. But this marriage, which was celebrated on the 12th of November, 1501, proved in the issue unprosperous. The young prince a few months after sickened and died, at Ludlow Castle, on the 2nd of April, 1502; and was much regretted by the nation. Henry, desirous to continue his alliance with Spain, and also unwilling to restore Catherine's dowry, which was two hundred thousand ducats, obliged his second son Henry, whom he created prince of Wales, to be contracted to the Infanta. The prince made all the opposition of which a youth of twelve years of age was capable; but as the king's avarice was too powerful to be overcome by argument, and too inveterate to submit to restraint, he persisted in his resolution, the espousals were at length, by means of the pope's dispensation, contracted between the parties: an event which was afterwards attended with the most important consequences.

In the course of the same year another marriage was celebrated, which was also in the next age productive of great events: the marriage of Margaret, the king's elder daughter, with James king of Scotland. This alliance had been negociated during three years, though interrupted by several broils; and Henry hoped, from the completion of it, to remove all source of discord with that neighbouring kingdom, by whose animosity England had so often been infested. When this marriage was deliberated on, in the English council, some objected that England might, by means of that alliance, fall under the dominion of Scotland. "No," replied Henry, "Scotland in that event will only become an accession to England." Amidst these prosperous incidents the king met with a domestic calamity, which made not such impression on him as it merited: his queen died in child-bed at the Tower, on the 11th of February, 1503; and the infant did not long survive her (n). This princess was deservedly a favourite of the nation; and the general affection for her increased, on account of the harsh treatment which it was thought she met with from her consort: and the people were the more confirmed in their opinion of his harsh behaviour, from the little impression which this domestic calamity made on his mind.

(m) Stowe, Baker, Speed, Biondi, Hollingshed, Bacon. Some late writers, particularly Mr. Carte, have expressed a doubt whether Perkin were an impostor, and have even asserted that he was the true Plantagenet, but it is abundantly evident that they were under a mistake.

The situation of the king's affairs, both at home and abroad, was now in every respect very fortunate. All the efforts of the European princes, both in war and negociation, were turned to the side of Italy; and the various events which there arose made Henry's alliance be courted by every party, yet interested him so little as never to touch him with concern or anxiety. His close connexions with Spain and Scotland ensured his tranquillity; and his continued successes over domestic enemies, owing to the prudence and vigour of his conduct, had reduced the people to entire submission and obedience. Uncontrolled, therefore, by apprehension or opposition of any kind, he gave full scope to his natural propensity; and avarice, which had ever been his ruling passion, being increased by age and encouraged by absolute authority, broke all restraints of shame or justice. He diligently sought out and found two ministers, (Empson and Dudley,) who were perfectly qualified to second his rapacious and tyrannical inclinations, and to prey upon his defenceless people. These instruments of oppression were both lawyers; the first was a person of mean birth, of brutal manners, of an unrelenting temper; the second had been better born, better educated, and better bred, but was equally unjust, severe, and inflexible. By their knowledge in law these men were qualified to pervert the forms of justice to the oppression of the innocent; and the formidable authority of the king supported them in all their iniquitous inclinations and practices.

It was the usual practice of these execrable wretches, at first to observe so far the appearance of law as to give indictments to those whom they intended to oppress: upon which the persons were committed to prison, but never brought to trial; and were at length obliged, in order to recover their liberty, to pay heavy fines and ransoms, which were called mitigations and compositions. By degrees the very appearance of law was neglected: the two ministers sent forth their precepts to attach men, and summon them before themselves and some others, at their private houses, in a court of commission, where, in a summary manner, without trial or jury, arbitrary decrees were issued, both in pleas of the crown, and controversies between private parties. Juries themselves, when summoned, proved but small security to the subject; being browbeaten by these oppressors; nay fined, imprisoned, and punished, if they gave sentence against the inclination of the ministers. The whole system of the feudal law, which still prevailed, was turned into a scheme of oppression. Even the king's wards, after they came of age, were not suffered to enter into possession of their lands without paying exorbitant fines. Men were also harassed with informations of intrusion upon scarcely colourable titles. When an outlawry in a personal action was issued against any man, he was not allowed to purchase his charter of pardon, except on the payment of a great sum; and if he refused the composition required of him, the strict law, which in such cases allows forfeiture of goods, was rigorously insisted on. Nay, without any colour of law, the half of men's lands and rents were seized during two years, as a penalty in case of outlawry. But the chief means of oppression employed by these ministers were the penal statutes, which, without consideration of rank, quality, or services, were rigidly put in execution against all men: spies, informers, and inquisitors, were rewarded and encouraged in every quarter of the kingdom; and no difference was made whether the statute were beneficial or hurtful, recent or obsolete, possible or impossible to be executed. The sole end of the king and his ministers was to amass money, and bring every one under the lash of their authority (o).

Through the prevalence of such an arbitrary and iniquitous administration, the English, it may safely be affirmed, were considerable losers by their ancient privileges, which secured them from all taxations, except such as were imposed by their own consent in parliament. Had the king been empowered to levy general taxes at pleasure, he would naturally have abstained from these oppressive expedients, which destroyed all security in private property, and begat an universal diffidence throughout the nation. In vain did the people look for protection from the parliament, which was pretty frequently summoned during this reign. That assembly was so overawed, that at this very time, during the greatest rage of Henry's oppressions, the commons chose Dudley for their speaker, in January, 1504, the very man who was the chief instrument of Henry's iniquities. And though the king was known to be immensely opulent, and had no pretence of wars or expensive enterprizes of any kind, they granted him the subsidy which he demanded. But so insatiable was his avarice, that next year, 1505, he levied a new benevolence, and renewed the arbitrary and oppressive method of taxation. By all these arts of accumulation, joined to a rigid frugality in his expences, he so filled his coffers, that he is said to have possessed in ready money the sum of one million eight hundred thousand pounds: a treasure almost incredible, if we consider the scarcity of money in those times (p).

But while Henry was enriching himself by the spoils of his oppressed people, an incident occurred on the continent which engaged his attention, and was even the object of his anxiety and concern. Isabella, queen of Castile, died in November, 1504; and it was foreseen, that by this incident the fortunes of Ferdinand her husband would be materially affected. The king was not only attentive to the fate of his ally, and watchful lest the general system of Europe should be affected by so important an event: he also considered the similarity of his own situation with that of Ferdinand, and regarded the issue of these transactions as a precedent for himself. Joan, the daughter of Ferdinand by Isabella, was married to the archduke Philip, and being in right of her mother heiress of Castile, seemed entitled to dispute with Ferdinand the present possession of that kingdom. Henry knew, that notwithstanding his own pretensions by the house of Lancaster, the greater part of the nation was convinced of the superiority of his wife's title; and he dreaded lest the prince of Wales, who was daily advancing towards manhood, might be tempted by ambition to lay immediate claim to the crown. By his perpetual attention to depress the partizans of the York family, he had more closely united them into one party, and increased their desire of shaking off that yoke under which they had so long laboured, and of taking every advantage which his oppressive government should give his enemies against him. And as he possessed no independent force like Ferdinand, and governed a kingdom more turbulent and unruly, which he himself by his narrow politics had confirmed in factious prejudices; he apprehended that his situation would prove in the issue still more precarious.

Nothing at first could turn out more contrary to the king's wishes than the transactions in Spain. Ferdinand, as well as Henry, had become very unpopular, and from a like cause, his former exactions and impositions; and the states of Castile discovered an evident resolution of preferring the title of Philip and Joan. In order to take advantage of these favourable dispositions, the archduke, now king of Castile, attended by his consort, embarked for Spain during the winter season, (in January 1506;) but meeting with a violent tempest in the channel, was obliged to take shelter in the harbour of Weymouth, on the coast of England. Sir John Trenchard, a gentleman of authority in the county of Dorset, hearing of a fleet upon the coast, had assembled some forces; and being joined by sir John Cary, who was also at the head of an armed body, he came to that town. Finding that Philip, in order to relieve his sickness and fatigue, was already come ashore, he invited him to his house; and immediately dispatched a messenger to inform the court of this important incident. The king sent in all haste the earl of Arundel to compliment Philip on his arrival in England, and to inform him that he intended to pay him a visit in person, and to give him a suitable reception in his dominions. Philip knew that he could not now depart without the king's consent; and therefore, for the sake of dispatch, he resolved to anticipate his visit, and to have an interview with him at Windsor. Henry received him with all the magnificence imaginable, and with all the seeming cordiality; but he resolved, notwithstanding, to draw some advantage from this involuntary visit paid him by his royal guest.

Edmund de la Pole earl of Suffolk, nephew to Ed-

(p) Silver was, during this reign, at thirty-seven shillings and sixpence a pound, which makes Henry's treasure near three millions of our present money. Besides, many commodities have become six times as dear by the increase of gold and silver in Europe. And what is a circumstance of still greater weight, all other states were then very poor in comparison of what they are at present: these circumstances make Henry's treasure appear very great; and may lead us to conceive the oppressions of his government.

ward IV. and brother to the earl of Lincoln, slain in the battle of Stoke, had some years before killed a man in a sudden fit of passion, and had been obliged to apply to the king for a remission of the crime. The king had granted his request; but being little indulgent to all persons connected with the house of York, he obliged him to appear openly in court and plead his pardon. Suffolk, more resenting the affront than grateful for the favour, had fled into Flanders, and taken shelter with his aunt, the duchess of Burgundy: but being promised forgiveness by the king, he returned to England, and obtained a new pardon. Actuated, however, by the natural inquietude of his temper, and uneasy from debts which he had contracted by his great expence at prince Arthur's wedding, he again made an elopement into Flanders. The king, well acquainted with the general discontent which prevailed against his administration, neglected not this incident, which might become of importance; and he employed his usual artifices to elude the efforts of his enemies. He directed sir Robert Curson, governor of the castle of Hammes, to desert his charge, and to insinuate himself into the confidence of Suffolk, by making him a tender of his services. Upon information secretly conveyed by Curson, the king seized William Courtney, eldest son to the earl of Devonshire, and married to the lady Catherine, sister of the queen; William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk; sir James Tyrrel, and sir James Windham, with some persons of inferior quality; and he committed them to custody. Lord Abergavenny and sir Thomas Green were also apprehended; but were soon after released from their confinement. William de la Pole was long detained in prison; Courtney was attainted, and though not executed, he recovered not his liberty during the king's lifetime. But Henry's chief severity fell upon sir James Windham and sir James Tyrrel, who were brought to their trial, condemned, and executed: the fate of the latter gave general satisfaction, on account of his participation in the murder of the young princes, sons of Edward IV. Notwithstanding these discoveries and executions, Curson was still able to maintain his credit with the earl of Suffolk: Henry, in order to remove all suspicion, had ordered him to be excommunicated, together with Suffolk himself, for his pretended rebellion. But after that traitor had performed all the services expected from him, he suddenly deserted the earl, and came over to England, where the king received him with unusual marks of favour and confidence. Suffolk, astonished at this instance of perfidy, finding that even the duchess of Burgundy, tired with so many fruitless attempts, had become indifferent to his cause, fled secretly into France, thence into Germany, and returned at last into the Low Countries; where he was protected, though not countenanced, by Philip, then in close alliance with the king.

Henry neglected not the present opportunity of complaining to Philip, his royal guest, of the reception which Suffolk had met with in his dominions. "I really thought," replied the king of Castile, "that your greatness and felicity had set you far above apprehensions from any person of so little consequence: but, to give you satisfaction, I shall banish him my state." "I expect that you will carry your complaisance farther," said the king; "I desire to have Suffolk put into my hands, where alone I can depend upon his submission and obedience." "That measure," said Philip, "will reflect dishonour upon you as well as myself. You will be thought to have treated me as a prisoner." "Then the matter is at an end," replied the king, "for I will take that dishonour upon me; and so your honour is saved (q)." The king of Castile, however, found himself under a necessity of complying; but not without having first obtained Henry's promise that he would spare Suffolk's life. That nobleman was invited over to England by Philip; as if the king would grant him a pardon, on the intercession of his friend and ally. Upon his appearance, in March, 1506, he was committed to the Tower; and the king of Castile, having fully satisfied Henry, as well by this concession as by signing a treaty of commerce between England and Castile, which was advantageous to the former kingdom (r), was at last permitted to depart, after having been detained three months. He landed in Spain, was joyfully received by the Castilians, and put in possession of the throne. He died in September, 1507; and Joan his widow, falling into deep melancholy, Ferdinand was again enabled to reinstate himself in authority, and to govern till the day of his death the whole Spanish monarchy.

Henry survived these transactions two years; but nothing memorable occurs in the remaining part of his reign, except his affiancing his second daughter, Mary, to the young archduke, Charles, son of Philip of Castile, in December, 1507. He entertained also some intentions of marriage for himself, first with the queen-dowager of Naples, relict of Ferdinand; afterwards with the duchess dowager of Savoy, daughter of Maximilian, and sister of Philip. But the decline of his health put an end to all such thoughts; and he began to cast his eye towards that future existence, which the iniquities and severities of his reign rendered a very dismal prospect to him. To allay the terrors under which he laboured, he endeavoured, by distributing alms, and founding religious houses (s), to make atonement for his crimes, and to purchase, by the sacrifice of part of his ill-gotten treasures, a reconciliation with his justly offended Maker. Remorse even seized him, at intervals, for the abuse of his authority by Empson and Dudley; but not sufficient to make him stop the rapacious hand of those oppressors, his avarice still being predominant. Sir William Capel was again fined two thousand pounds, under some frivolous pretence, and was committed to the Tower for daring to murmur against the iniquity. Harris, an alderman of London, was indicted, and died of vexation before his trial came to an issue. Sir Laurence Ailmer, who had been mayor, and his two sheriffs, were condemned in heavy fines, and sent to prison till they made payment. The king gave countenance to all these oppressions; till death, by its nearer approaches, impressed new terrors upon him; and he then ordered, by a general clause in his will, that restitution should be made to all those whom he had injured. He died of a consumption, at his favourite palace of Richmond, on the 22nd of April, 1509, after a reign of twenty-three years and eight months, and in the fifty-second year of his age.

The few virtues, or rather good qualities, possessed by Henry the Seventh, were chiefly constitutional: they consisted of personal courage, mental intrepidity, temperance, and chastity. But his numerous vices were the result of a depraved mind habituated to the constant indulgence of the worst of passions. As a monarch, vindictive and tyrannical; as a politician, deep, subtle, and intriguing; as a man, avaricious and unjust. His capacity, indeed, was excellent, but ever perverted, by the narrowness of his heart, to bad purposes. Continually influenced by motives of interest, he possessed the art of turning every thing to his own advantage; which is not difficult of attainment to a mind wholly unrestrained by any principles of honour or honesty. In conversation he was generally reserved, except when he had some favourite point to carry, and he then knew how to exert both insinuation and address. He is said to have been assiduous in the exercise of religious duties; but, as he daily violated the most essential precepts of religion, that assiduity must rather be considered as a subject for censure than as a theme of commendation. Fortunately, however, the interests of the nation were, in some instances, intimately blended with his own. Thus the dread he experienced of losing his crown from the defects of his title, induced him to repress the exorbitant power of the nobility; while his avarice prompted him to encourage industry and promote trade, that he might augment the national wealth, and create a more ample field for the exertion of his own rapaciousness (t).

By his queen, Elizabeth of York, eldest daughter of Edward the Fourth, Henry had four sons: 1. Arthur, born September 20, 1486; died April 2, 1502. 2. Henry, born June 28, 1491, who succeeded him. 3. Edmund, born February 21, 1498; died 1499. 4. Edward, born February, 1500; died young. He had also four daughters: 1. Margaret, born November 29, 1489; married to (s) He built the chapel at Westminster which bears his name, and is contiguous to the Abbey, at the expence of fourteen thousand pounds, money of that age. He also built three houses for Franciscans, called Observants, at Richmond, Greenwich, and Newark; and likewise three for conventicles, at Canterbury, Newcastle, and Southampton. He turned the Savoy into an hospital.

(t) As a proof of his attention to the smallest profits, we are told by lord Bacon, that he had seen a book of accounts kept by Empson, and subscribed, in almost every leaf, by the king's own hand. Among other articles was the following: "Item, Received of such a one, five marks for a pardon; which, if it do not pass, the money to be repaid, or the party otherwise satisfied." Opposite to the memorandum, the king had written, "Otherwise satisfied."

CHAP. II.

Miscellaneous Transactions and Laws of the Reign of Henry VII. Observations on the Manners of that Age, the Wages of Labourers, the Household Expences of the Nobility, and the Discovery of North America.

THE power of the kings of England had always been somewhat irregular or discretionary; but was scarcely ever so absolute during any former reign, at least after the establishment of Magna Charta, as during that of Henry the Seventh. Besides the advantages derived from the personal character of the man, full of vigour, industry, and severity, deliberate in all projects, steady in every purpose, and attended with caution as well as good fortune in every enterprize; he came to the throne after long and bloody civil wars, which had destroyed all the great nobility, who alone could resist the encroachments of his authority: the people were tired with discord and intestine convulsions, and willing to submit to usurpations, and even to injuries, rather than plunge themselves anew into like miseries: the fruitless efforts made against him served always, as is usual, to confirm his authority: as he ruled by a faction, and the lesser faction, all those on whom he conferred offices, sensible that they owed every thing to his protection, were willing to support his power, though at the expence of justice and national privileges. These seem the chief causes which at this time bestowed on the crown so considerable an addition of prerogative, and rendered his reign a kind of epoch in the English constitution.

This prince, though he exalted his prerogative above law, is celebrated by his historian for many good laws which he caused to be enacted for the government of his subjects. Several considerable regulations, indeed, are found among the statutes of this reign, both with regard to the police of the kingdom, and its commerce: but the former are generally contrived with much better judgement than the latter. The more simple ideas of order and equity are sufficient to guide a legislator in every thing that regards the internal administration of justice; but the principles of commerce are much more complicated, and require long experience and deep reflection to be well understood in any state. The real consequence of a law or practice is there often contrary to first appearances. No wonder that during the reign of Henry the Seventh these matters were frequently mistaken; and it may safely be affirmed, that even in the age of lord Bacon very imperfect and even erroneous ideas were formed on that subject.

The transactions of Henry the Seventh's reign sufficiently prove the justice of Sir William Blackstone's observation, that both the king and his ministers were more industrious in hunting out prosecutions upon old and forgotten penal laws, in order to extort money from the subject, than in framing any new regulations: for the distinguishing character of this reign was that of amassing treasure into the king's coffers by every means that could be devised; and almost every alteration of the laws, however salutary or prejudicial in their future consequences, had this, and this only, for their great and immediate object.

Early in Henry's reign the authority of the Star Chamber, which was before founded on common law and ancient practice, was in some cases confirmed by act of parliament (u): Lord Bacon extols the utility of this court; but men began, even during the age of that historian, to feel that so arbitrary a jurisdiction was incompatible with liberty; and in proportion as the spirit of independence still rose higher in the nation, the aversion to it increased, till it was entirely abolished by act of parliament in the reign of Charles I. a little before the commencement of the civil wars.

Laws were passed by Henry VII. ordaining the king's suit for murder to be carried on within a year and day (v). Formerly it did not usually commence till after; and as the friends of the person murdered often in the interval compounded matters with the criminal, the crime frequently passed unpunished. Suits were given to the poor in forma pauperis, as it is called: that is, without paying dues for the writs, or any fees to the council (w): a good law at all times, especially in that age, when the people laboured under the oppression of the great; but a law difficult to be carried into execution. A law was made against carrying off any woman by force (x). The benefit of clergy was abridged (y); and the criminal, on the first offence, was ordered to be burned in the hand with a letter, denoting his crime; after which he was punished capitally for any new offence. Sheriffs were no longer allowed to fine any person, without previously summoning him before their court (z). It is strange that such a practice should ever have prevailed. Attaint of juries was granted in cases which exceeded forty pounds value (a): a law which has an appearance of equity, but which was afterwards found inconvenient. Actions popular were not allowed to be eluded by fraud or covin. If any servant of the king conspired against the life of the steward, treasurer, or comptroller of the king's household, this design, though not followed by any overt act, was made liable to the punishment of felony (b). This statute was enacted for the security of archbishop Morton, who found himself exposed to the enmity of great numbers.

There scarcely passed any session during this reign without some statute against engaging retainers, and giving them badges or liveries (c); a practice by which they were in a manner inlisted under some great lord, and were kept in readiness to assist him in all wars, insurrections, riots, violences, and even in bearing evidence for him in courts of justice (d). This disorder, which had prevailed during many reigns, when the law could give little protection to the subject, was then deeply rooted in England; and it required all the vigilance and rigour of Henry to extirpate it. There is a story of Henry's severity against this abuse, which evidently shews, that he suffered no occasion to escape of making even the laws themselves subservient to his avarice and rapacity. The earl of Oxford, his favourite general, in whom he always placed great and deserved confidence, having splendidly entertained him at his castle of Heningham, was desirous of making a parade of his magnificence at the departure of his royal guest; and ordered all his retainers, with their liveries and badges, to be drawn up in two lines, that their appearance might be the more gallant and splendid. "My lord," said the king, "I have heard much of your hospitality; but the truth far exceeds the report. These handsome gentlemen and yeomen, whom I see on both sides of me, are no doubt your menial servants." The earl smiled, and confessed that his fortune was too narrow for such magnificence. "They are most of them," subjoined he, "my retainers, who are come to do me service at this time, when they know I am honoured with your majesty's presence." The king started a little, and said, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for your good cheer, but I must not allow my laws to be broken in my sight. My attorney must speak with you." Oxford is said to have paid no less than fifteen thousand marks, as a composition for his offence.

The increase of the arts, more effectually than all the severities of law, put an end to this pernicious practice. The nobility, instead of vying with each other in the number and boldness of their retainers, acquired by degrees a more civilized species of emulation, and endeavoured to excel in the splendour and elegance of their equipage, houses, and tables. The common people, no longer maintained in vicious idleness by their superiors, were obliged to learn some calling or industry, and became useful both to themselves and to others. And it must be acknowledged, in spite of those who declaim so violently against refinement in the arts, or what they are pleased to call luxury, that as much as an industrious tradesman is both a better man, and a better citizen than one of those idle retainers who formerly depended on the great families; so much is the life of a modern nobleman more laudable than that of an ancient baron.

The duke of Northumberland, some years ago, printed a household book of an old earl of that family who lived in the time of Henry the Seventh. Mr. Hume informs us, that he had been favoured with the perusal of it; and it contains many curious particulars, which mark the manners and way of living in that rude, not to say barbarous age; as well as the prices of commodities. I have, says he, extracted a few of them from that piece, which gives a true picture of ancient manners, and is one of the most singular monuments that English antiquity affords us: for we may be confident, however rude the strokes, that no baron's family was on a nobler or more splendid footing. The family consists of one hundred and sixty-six persons, masters and servants: fifty-seven strangers are reckoned upon every day: on the whole two hundred and twenty-three. Two-pence halfpenny are supposed to be the daily expence of each for meat, drink, and firing. This would make a groat of our present money: supposing provisions between three and four times cheaper, it would be equivalent to fourteen pence: no great sum for a nobleman's house-keeping; especially considering, that the chief expence of a family at that time consisted in meat and drink: for the sum allotted by the earl for his whole annual expence is one thousand one hundred and eighteen pounds seventeen shillings and eight pence; meat, drink, and firing cost seven hundred and ninety-six pounds eleven shillings and two pence, more than two-thirds of the whole: in a modern family it is not above a third, p. 157, 158, 159. The whole expence of the earl's family is managed with an exactness that is very rigid, and, if we make no allowance for ancient manners, such as may seem to border on an extreme; insomuch, that the number of pieces which must be cut out of every quarter of beef, mutton, pork, veal, nay stock-fish and salmon, are determined, and must be entered and accounted for by the different clerks appointed for that purpose: if a servant be absent a day, his mess is struck off: if he go on my lord's business, board wages is allowed him, eight pence a day for his journey in winter, five pence in summer: when he stays in any place, two pence a day are allowed him, beside the maintenance of his horse. Somewhat above a quarter of wheat is allowed for every month throughout the year; and the wheat is estimated at five shillings and eight pence a quarter. Two hundred and fifty quarters of malt are allowed, at four shillings a quarter: two hogsheads are to be made of a quarter; which amounts to about a bottle and a third of beer a day to each person, p. 4. and the beer will not be very strong. One hundred and nine fat beeves are to be bought at All-hallow-tide, at thirteen shillings and four pence a-piece: and twenty-four lean beeves to be bought at St. Helens at eight shillings a-piece: these are to be put into the pastures to feed; and are to serve from Midsummer to Michaelmas; which is consequently the only time that the family eats fresh beef: during all the rest of the year they live on salted meat, p. 5. One hundred and sixty gallons of mustard are allowed in a year; which seems indeed requisite for the salt beef, p. 18. Six hundred and forty-seven sheep are allowed, at twenty pence a-piece; and these seem also to be all eat salted, except between Lammas and Michaelmas, p. 5. Only twenty-five hogs are allowed at two shillings a-piece; twenty-eight veals at twenty pence; forty lambs at ten pence or a shilling, p. 7. These seem to be reserved for my lord's table, or that of the upper servants, called the knight's table. The other servants, as they eat salted meat almost through the whole year, and with few or no vegetables, had a very bad and unhealthy diet: so that there cannot be any thing more erroneous than the magnificent ideas formed of the Roast Beef of Old England. We must entertain as mean an idea of its cleanliness: only seventy ells of linen at eight pence an ell are annually allowed for this great family: no sheets were used: this linen was made into eight table-cloths for my lord's table; and one table-cloth for the knights, p. 16. This last, I suppose, was washed only once a month. Only forty shillings are allowed for washing throughout the whole year; and most of it seems expended on the linen belonging to the chapel. The drinking, however, was tolerable, namely, ten tuns and two hogsheads of Gascony wine, at the rate of four pounds thirteen shillings and four pence a tun, p. 6. Only ninety-one dozen of candles for the whole year, p. 14. The family rose at six in the morning, dined at ten, and supped at four in the afternoon: the gates were all shut at nine, and no farther ingress or egress permitted, p. 314. 318. My lord and lady have set on their table, for breakfast, at seven o'clock in the morning, a quart of beer; as much wine; two pieces of salt fish, six red-herrings, four white ones, or a dish of sprats. In flesh days half a chyne of mutton, or a chyne of beef boiled, p. 73. 75. Mass is ordered to be said at six o'clock, in order, says the household-book, that all my lord's servants may rise early, p. 170. Only twenty-four fires are allowed, beside the kitchen and hall, and most of these have only a peck of coals a day allowed them, p. 99. After Lady-day no fires permitted in the rooms, except half fires in my lord's and lady's, and lord Piercy's and the nursery, p. 101. It is to be observed that my lord kept house in Yorkshire, where there is certainly much cold weather after Lady-day. Eighty chalders of coals, at four shillings and two pence a chalder, suffices throughout the whole year; and because coal will not burn without wood, says the household book, sixty-four loads of great wood are also allowed, at twelve pence a load, p. 22. This is a proof that grates were not then used. Here is an article. "It is devised that from henceforth no capons to be bought but only for my lord's own mess, and that the said capons shall be bought for two pence a-piece lean, and fed in the poultry; and master chamberlain and the stewards be fed with capons, if there be strangers sitting with them," p. 102. Pigs are to be bought at three pence or a groat a-piece: geese at the same price: chickens at a halfpenny: hens at two pence, and only for the above-mentioned tables. Here is another article. "Item, it is thought good that no plovers be bought at no season but only in Christmas and principal feasts, and my lord to be served therewith, and his board-end, and none other, and to be bought for a penny a-piece, or a penny half-penny at most," p. 103. Woodcocks are to be bought at the same price. Partridges at two pence, p. 104, 105. Pheasants a shilling; peacocks the same, p. 106. My lord keeps only twenty-seven horses in his stable at his own charge: his upper servants have allowance for maintaining their own horses, p. 126. These horses are, six gentle horses as they are called, at hay and hard meat throughout the whole year, four palfreys, three hobbies and nags, three sumpter horses, six horses for those servants to whom my lord furnishes a horse, two sumpter horses more, and three mill horses, two for carrying the corn, and one for grinding it; whence we may infer, that mills, either water or wind mills, were then unknown; at least very rare: besides these, there are seven great trotting horses for the chariot or waggon. He allows a peck of oats a day, besides loaves made of beans, for his principal horses; the oats at twenty pence, the beans at two shillings a quarter. The load of hay is at two shillings and eight pence. When my lord is on a journey he carries thirty-six horsemen along with him; together with bed and other accommodation, p. 157. The inns, it seems, could afford nothing tolerable. My lord passes the year in three country-seats, all in Yorkshire, Wrysel, Leckenfield, and Topclyffe; but he has furniture only for one: he carries every thing along with him, beds, tables, chairs, kitchen utensils, all which we may conclude were so coarse, that they could not be spoiled by the carriage: yet seventeen carts and one waggon suffices for the whole, p. 391. One cart suffices for all his kitchen utensils, cooks, beds, &c. p. 388. One remarkable circumstance is, that he has eleven priests in his house, besides seventeen persons, chanters, musicians, &c. belonging to his chapel: yet he has only two cooks for a family of two hundred and twenty-three persons, p. 325 (e). Their meals were certainly dressed in the slovenly manner of a ship's company. It is amusing to observe the pompous and even royal style assumed by this Tartar chief: he does not give any orders, though only for the right making of mustard, but it is introduced with this preamble, It seemeth good to us and our council. If we consider the magnificent and elegant manner in which the Venetian and other Italian noblemen then lived, with the progress made by the Italians in literature and the fine arts, we shall not wonder that they considered the ultramountain nations as barbarous. The Flemish also seem to have much excelled the English and even the French. Yet the earl is sometimes not deficient in generosity: he pays, for instance, an annual pension of a groat a year to my lady of Walsingham, for her interest in Heaven; the same sum to the holy blood at Hales, p. 337. No mention is any where made of plate; but only of the hiring of pewter vessels. The servants seem all to have bought their own clothes from their wages.

The most important law in its consequences which was enacted during the reign of Henry, was that by which the nobility and gentry acquired a power of breaking the ancient entails, and of alienating their estates (f). By means of this law, joined to the beginning luxury and refinement of the age, the great fortunes of the barons were gradually dissipated, and the property of the commons increased in England. It is probable that Henry foresaw and intended this consequence; because the constant scheme of his policy consisted in depressing the great, and exalting churchmen, lawyers, and men of new families, who were more dependent on him.

This king's love of money naturally led him to encourage commerce, which increased his customs; but if we may judge by most of the laws enacted during his reign, trade and industry were rather hurt than promoted by the care and attention given to them. Severe laws were made against taking interest for money, which was then denominated usury (g). Even the profits of exchange were prohibited as savouring of usury (h), which the superstition of the age zealously proscribed. All evasive contracts, by which profits could be made from the loan of money, were also carefully guarded against (i). It is needless to observe how unreasonable and iniquitous these laws, how impossible to be executed, and how hurtful to trade, if they could take place. One thing, however, is deserving of commendation, namely, that sometimes, in order to promote commerce, Henry lent to merchants sums of money without interest, when he knew that their stock was not sufficient for those enterprizes which they had in view (k).

Laws were made against the exportation of money, plate, or bullion (l): a precaution which serves to no other purpose than to make more be exported. But so far was the anxiety on this head carried, that merchants alien, who imported commodities into the kingdom, were obliged to invest in English commodities all the money acquired by their sales, in order to prevent their conveying it away in a clandestine manner (m).

It was prohibited to export horses; as if that exportation did not encourage the breed, and render them more plentiful in the kingdom (n). In order to promote archery, no bows were to be sold at a higher price than six shillings and four pence (o), reducing money to the denomination of our time. The only effect of this regulation must be, either that the people would be supplied with bad bows, or none at all. Prices were also fixed to woollen cloth (p), to caps and hats (q): and the wages of labourers were regulated by law (r). It is evident that these matters ought always to be left free, and be entrusted to the common course of business and commerce. To some it may appear surprizing, that the price of a yard of scarlet cloth should be limited to six and twenty shillings, money of our age; that of a yard of coloured cloth to eighteen; higher prices than these commodities bore a few years ago, though in 1809, under various pretences, they were most astonishingly enhanced; and that the wages of a tradesman, such as a mason, bricklayer, tyler, &c. should be regulated at near ten pence a day; which is not much inferior to the present wages given in some parts of England. Labour and commodities have certainly risen since the discovery of the West Indies; but not so much in every particular as is generally imagined. The greater industry of the present times has increased the number of tradesmen and labourers, so as to keep wages nearer a par than could be expected from the great increase of gold and silver. And the additional art employed in the finer manufactures has even made some of these commodities fall below their former value. Not to mention that merchants and dealers, being contented with less profit than formerly, afford the goods cheaper to their customers. It appears by a statute of this reign (s), that goods bought for sixteen pence would sometimes be sold by the merchants for three shillings. The commodities whose price has chiefly risen, are bread, butchers meat, fowl, and fish (especially the latter), which cannot be much augmented in quantity by the increase of art and industry. The profession which then abounded most, and was sometimes embraced by persons of the lowest rank, was the church: by a clause of a statute all clerks or students of the university were forbidden to beg, without a permission from the vice-chancellor (t).

One great cause of the low state of industry during the reign of Henry the Seventh was the restraints put upon it; and the parliament, or rather the king (for he was the prime mover in every thing), enlarged a little some of these limitations, but not to the degree that was requisite. A law had been enacted during the reign of Henry IV. (u), that no man could bind his son or daughter to an apprenticeship, unless he were possessed of twenty shillings a-year in land; and Henry VII. because the decay of manufactures was complained of in Norwich from the want of hands, exempted that city from the penalties of the law (v). Afterwards the whole county of Norfolk obtained a like exemption with regard to some branches of the woollen manufacture (w). These absurd limitations proceeded from a desire of promoting husbandry, which, however, is never more effectually encouraged than by the increase of manufactures. For a like reason, the law enacted against enclosures, and for the keeping up of farm-houses (x), scarcely deserves the high praises bestowed on it by lord Bacon. If husbandmen understand agriculture, and have a ready vent for their commodities, we need not dread a diminution of the people employed in the country. All methods of supporting populousness, except by the interest of the proprietors, are violent and ineffectual. During a century and a half after this period, there was a frequent renewal of laws and edicts against depopulation; whence we may infer, that none of them were ever executed. The natural course of improvement at last provided a remedy.

One check to industry in England was the erecting of corporations; an abuse which is not yet entirely corrected. A law was enacted, that corporations should not pass any bye-laws without the consent of three of the chief officers of state (y). They were prohibited from imposing tolls at their gates (z). The cities of Gloucester and Worcester had even imposed tolls on the Severn, which were abolished (a).

There is a law of this reign (b), containing a preamble, by which it appears, that the company of merchant adventurers in London had, by their own authority, debarred all the other merchants of the kingdom from trading to the great marts in the Low Countries, unless each trader previously paid them the sum of nearly seventy pounds. It is surprizing that such a bye-law (if it deserve the name) could ever be carried into execution, and that the authority of parliament should be requisite to abrogate it.

It was during this king's reign, on the second of August, 1492, a little before sun-set, that Christopher Columbus, a Genoese, set out from Spain on his memorable voyage for the discovery of the western world; and a few years after Vasquez de Gama, a Portugnese, passed the Cape of Good Hope, and opened a new passage to the East Indies. These great events were attended with important consequences to all the nations of Europe, even to such as were not immediately concerned in those naval enterprizes. The enlargement of commerce and navigation increased industry and the arts every where: the nobles dissipated their fortunes in expensive pleasures: men of an inferior rank both acquired a share in the landed property, and created to themselves a considerable property of a new kind, in stock, commodities, art, credit, and correspondence. In some nations the privileges of the commons increased by this increase of property: in most nations the kings, finding arms to be dropped by the barons, who could no longer endure their former rude manner of life, established standing armies, and subdued the liberties of their kingdoms; but in all places the condition of the people, from the depression of the petty tyrants by whom they had formerly been oppressed rather than governed, received

The practice of breaking entails by means of a fine and recovery was introduced in the reign of Edward the IVth: but it was not, properly speaking, law till the statute of Henry the VIIth; which, by correcting some abuses that attended that practice, gave indirectly a sanction to it.

great improvement; and they acquired, if not entire liberty, at least the most considerable advantages of it. And as the general course of events thus tended to depress the nobles and exalt the people, Henry VII. who also embraced that system of policy, has acquired more praise than his institutions, strictly speaking, seem of themselves to deserve on account of any profound wisdom attending them.

It was by accident only that the king had not a considerable share in those great naval discoveries by which the present age was so much distinguished. Columbus, after meeting with many repulses from the courts of Portugal and Spain, sent his brother Bartholomew to London, in order to explain his projects to Henry, and crave his protection for the execution of them. The king invited him over to England; but his brother being taken by pirates, was detained in his voyage, and Columbus meanwhile having obtained the countenance of Isabella, was supplied with a small fleet, and happily executed his enterprize. Henry was not discouraged by this disappointment: he fitted out Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian, settled in Bristol; and sent him westward, in 1498, in search of new countries. Cabot discovered the main land of America towards the sixtieth degree of northern latitude: he sailed southward along the coast, and discovered Newfoundland, and other countries; but returned to England without making any conquest or settlement. Elliot, and other merchants in Bristol, made a like attempt in 1502 (c).

The king expended fourteen thousand pounds in building one ship, called the Great Harry (d). She was, properly speaking, the first ship in the English navy. Before this period, when the sovereign stood in need of a fleet, he had no other expedient than that of hiring or pressing ships from the merchants.

In the fifth year of Henry the Seventh's reign it was ordained, that the mayors of London should have conservation of the river Thames, from Staines Bridge to the waters of Yensdale and Medway. In the eighteenth year, Henry, being himself a brother of the Taylor's Company, like several of his predecessors, viz. Richard the Second and Third; Henry the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth; and Edward the Fourth; besides a great number of the nobility; he gave them the appellation of Merchant Taylors.

CHAP. III.

HENRY VIII.

THE death of Henry VII. had been attended with as open and visible a joy among the people as decency would permit; and the accession and coronation of his son Henry VIII. gave general satisfaction. Instead of a monarch jealous, severe, and avaricious, who, in proportion as he advanced in years, was sinking still deeper in those unpopular vices, a young prince of eighteen had succeeded to the throne, who even in the eyes of men of sense gave promising hopes of his future conduct, much more in those of the people, always enchanted with novelty, youth, and royal dignity. The vigour of his person, accompanied with dexterity in every manly exercise, was farther adorned with a blooming and ruddy countenance, with a lively air, with the appearance of spirit and activity in all his demeanour (e). His father, in order to remove him from the knowledge of public business, had hitherto occupied him entirely in the pursuits of literature; and the proficiency which he made gave no bad prognostic of his parts and capacity (f). Even the vices of vehemence, ardour, and impatience, to which he was subject, and which afterwards degenerated into tyranny, were considered only as faults incident to unguarded youth, which would be corrected when time had brought him to greater moderation and maturity. And, as the contending titles of York and Lancaster were now at last so fully united in his person, as to exclude the possibility of any farther dispute; men justly expected from a prince, noxious to no party, that impartiality of administration which had long been unknown in this country.

These favourable prepossessions of the public were encouraged by the measures which Henry embraced in the commencement of his reign. His grandmother, the countess of Richmond and Derby, was still alive; and as she was a woman of consummate prudence and virtue, he wisely shewed great deference to her opinion in the establishment of his new council. The members of which were, Warham, archbishop of Canterbury and chancellor; the earl of Shrewsbury, steward; lord Herbert, chamberlain; sir Thomas Lovel, master of the wards and constable of the Tower; sir Edward Poynings, comptroller; sir Henry Marney, afterwards lord Marney; sir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; and sir Henry Wyat (g). These men had long been accustomed to business under the late king, and were the least unpopular of all the ministers employed by that monarch.

But the chief competitors for favour and authority under the new king were the earl of Surrey, treasurer, and Fox bishop of Winchester, secretary and privy seal. This prelate, who enjoyed great credit during all the former reign, had acquired such habits of caution and frugality as he could not easily lay aside; and he still opposed, by his remonstrances, those schemes of dissipation and expence which the youth and passions of Henry rendered agreeable to him. But Surrey was a more dextrous courtier; and though few had borne a greater share in the frugal politics of the late king, he knew how to conform himself to the humour of his new master; and no one was so forward in promoting that liberality, pleasure, and magnificence, which began to prevail under the young monarch (h). By this policy he soon ingratiated himself with Henry; he made advantage, as well as the other courtiers, of the lavish disposition of his master; and he engaged him in such a course of play and idleness as rendered him negligent of affairs, and willing to entrust the government of the state entirely into the hands of his ministers. The great treasures amassed by the late king were gradually dissipated in the giddy expences of his son. One party of pleasure succeeded to another. tilts, tournaments, and carousals, were exhibited with all the magnificence of the age; and, as the present tranquillity of the public permitted the court to indulge itself in every amusement, serious business was but little attended to. Or if the king intermitted the course of his festivity, he chiefly employed himself in an application to music and literature, which were his favourite pursuits, and which were well adapted to his genius. He had made such proficiency in the former art, as even to compose some pieces of church-musid which were sung in his chapel (i). He was initiated in the elegant learning of the ancients; and, though he was so unfortunate as to be seduced into a study of the barren controversies of the schools, which were then fashionable, and had chosen Thomas Aquinas for his favourite author, he still discovered a capacity fitted for more useful and entertaining knowledge.

The frank and careless humour of the king, as it led him to dissipate the treasures amassed by his father, rendered him negligent in protecting the instruments whom that prince had employed in his extortions. A proclamation was issued soon after his accession to encourage complaints, and the rage of the people was let loose on all informers, who had so long exercised an unbounded tyranny over the nation (k): they were thrown into prison, condemned to the pillory, and most of them lost their lives by the violence of the populace. In consequence of this proclamation, an infinite number of petitions were immediately presented against Empson and Dudley, who were most exposed to public hatred; they were immediately summoned before the council, in order to answer for their conduct, which had rendered them so disagreeable in the eyes of the people. Empson made a shrewd apology for himself, as well as for his associate. He told the council, "that so far from his being justly exposed to censure for his past conduct, his enemies themselves grounded their clamour on actions which seemed rather to merit their reward and approbation: that a strict execution of law was the crime of which he and Dudley were accused; though that law had been established by general consent, and though they acted in obedience to the king, to whom the administration of justice was entrusted by the constitution: that it belonged not to them, who were instruments in the hands of supreme power, to determine what laws were recent or obsolete, expedient or hurtful; since they were all alike valid, so long as they remained unrepealed by the legislature:

lature: that it was natural for a licentious populace to murmur against the restraints of authority; but all wise states had ever made their glory consist in the just distribution of rewards and punishments, and had annexed the former to the observance and enforcement of the laws, the latter to their violation and infraction: and that a sudden overthrow of all government might be expected, where the judges were committed to the mercy of the criminals, the rulers to that of the subjects (l)." Notwithstanding this plausible defence, Empson and Dudley were sent to the Tower; and soon after brought to their trial. The strict execution of laws, however obsolete, could never be imputed to them as a crime in a court of judicature; and it is likely that, even where they had exercised arbitrary power, the king, as they had acted by the secret commands of his father, was not willing that their conduct should undergo too severe a scrutiny. In order, therefore, to gratify the people with the punishment of these despised ministers, crimes very improbable, or indeed absolutely impossible, were charged upon them; namely, that they had entered into a conspiracy against the sovereign, and had intended, on the death of the late king, to have seized by force the administration of the kingdom. The jury were so far moved by popular prejudices, joined to court influence, as to give a verdict against them; which was afterwards confirmed by a bill of attainder in parliament (m), and at the earnest desire of the people was executed by warrant from the king (n). Thus, in those arbitrary times, justice was equally violated, whether the king sought power and riches, or courted popularity from his subjects.

Henry, while he punished the instruments of past tyranny, had yet such deference to former engagements as to deliberate, immediately after his accession, concerning the celebration of his marriage with the infanta Catherine, to whom he had been affianced during his father's lifetime. Her former marriage with his brother Arthur, and the inequality of their years, were the chief objections urged against his espousing her: but on the other hand, the advantages of her known virtue, modesty, and sweetness of disposition, were insisted on; the affection which she bore to the king; the large dowry to which she was entitled as princess of Wales; the interest of cementing a close alliance with Spain; the necessity of finding some confederate to counterbalance the power of France; the expediency of fulfilling the engagements of the late king: when these considerations were weighed, they determined the council, though contrary to the opinion of the primate, to give Henry their advice for celebrating the marriage, which was accordingly done on the 3d of June. The countess of Richmond, who had concurred in the same sentiments with the council, died soon after the marriage of her grandson, on the 29th of the same month.

Henry's undisputed title, his extensive authority, the popularity of his government, his large treasures, and the tranquillity of his subjects, were circumstances which rendered his domestic administration easy and prosperous. The situation of foreign affairs was no less happy and desirable. Italy continued still, as during the late reign, to be the centre of all the wars and negociations of the European princes; and Henry's alliance was courted by all parties; at the same time that he was not engaged by any immediate interest or necessity to take part with any. Louis XII. of France, after his conquest of Milan, was the only great prince that possessed any territory in Italy; and could he have remained in tranquillity, he was enabled by his situation to prescribe laws to all the Italian princes and republics, and to hold the balance among them. But the desire of making a conquest of Naples, to which he had the same title or pretensions with his predecessor, still engaged him in new enterprizes; and as he foresaw opposition from Ferdinand, who was connected both by treaties and affinity with Frederic of Naples, he endeavoured by the offers of interest, to which the ears of that monarch were ever open, to engage him in an opposite confederacy. He settled with him a plan for the partition of the kingdom of Naples, and the expulsion of Frederic: a plan which the politicians of that age regarded as the most egregious imprudence in the French monarch, and the greatest perfidy in the Spanish. Frederic, supported only by subjects who were either discontented with his government, or indifferent about his fortunes, was unable to resist so powerful a confederacy, and was deprived of his dominions: but he had the satisfaction to see Naples immediately prove the source of contention among his enemies. Ferdinand gave secret orders to his general, Gonsalvo, whom the Spaniards honour with the appellation of the great captain, to attack the armies of France, and make himself master of all the dominions of Naples. Gonsalvo prevailed in every enterprize, defeated the French in two pitched battles, and ensured to his prince the entire possession of that kingdom. Louis, unable to procure redress by force of arms, was obliged to enter into a fruitless negociation with Ferdinand for the recovery of his share of the partition, and all Italy during some time was held in suspence between these two powerful monarchs.

There has scarcely been any period when the balance of power was better secured in Europe, and seemed more able to maintain itself without any anxious concern or attention of the princes. Several great monarchies were established; and no one so far surpassed the rest as to give any foundation or even pretence for jealousy. England was united in domestic peace, and by its situation happily secured from the invasion of foreigners. The coalition of the several kingdoms of Spain had formed one powerful monarchy, which Ferdinand administered with arts, fraudulent indeed and deceitful, but full of vigour and ability. Louis XII. a gallant and generous prince, had, by espousing Anne of Britanny, widow to his predecessor, preserved the union with that principality, on which the safety of his kingdom so much depended. Maximilian the emperor, besides the hereditary dominions of the Austrian family, maintained authority in the empire, and, notwithstanding the levity of his character, was able to unite the German princes in any great plan of interest, at least of defence. Charles prince of Castile, grandson to Maximilian and Ferdinand, had already succeeded to the rich dominions of the house of Burgundy; and being as yet in early youth, the government was entrusted to Margaret of Savoy, his aunt, a princess endowed with signal prudence and virtue. The internal force of these several powerful states, by balancing each other, might long have maintained general tranquillity, had not the active and enterprising genius of Julius II. an ambitious pontiff, first excited the flames of war and discord among them. By his intrigues, a league had been formed at Cambray in 1508, between himself, Maximilian, Louis, and Ferdinand; and the object of this great confederacy was to overwhelm, by their united arms, the commonwealth of Venice. Henry, without any motive from interest or passion, allowed his name to be inserted in the confederacy. This oppressive and iniquitous league was but too successful against the republic.

The great force and secure situation of the considerable monarchies prevented any one from aspiring to any conquest of moment; and though this consideration could not maintain general peace, or remedy the natural inquietude of men, it rendered the princes of this age more disposed to desert engagements, and change their alliances, in which they were retained by humour and caprice, rather than by any natural or durable interest. Julius had no sooner humbled the Venetian republic, than he was inspired with a nobler ambition, that of expelling all foreigners from Italy, or, to speak in the style affected by the Italians of that age, the freeing the country entirely from the dominion of barbarians (o). He was determined to make the tempest fall first upon Louis; and, in order to pave the way for this great enterprize, he at once sought for a ground of quarrel with the monarch, and courted the alliance of other princes. He declared war against the duke of Ferrara, the confederate of Louis. He solicited the favour of England, by sending Henry on the 10th of April, 1510, a sacred rose, perfumed with musk, and anointed with chrism (p). He engaged in his interests Bambridge archbishop of York, and Henry's ambassador at Rome, whom he created a cardinal on the 11th of March, 1511. He drew over Ferdinand to his party, though that monarch at first made no declaration of his intensions. And what he chiefly valued, he formed a treaty with the Swiss cantons, who, enraged by some neglects put upon them by Louis, accompanied with contumelious expressions, had quitted the alliance of France, and waited for an opportunity of revenging themselves on that nation.

(m) This parliament met on the 21st January, 1510. A law was there enacted, in order to prevent some abuses which had prevailed during the late reign. The forfeiture upon the penal statutes was reduced to the term of three years. Costs and damages were given against informers upon acquittal of the accused: more severe punishments were enacted against perjury: the false inquisitions procured by Empson and Dudley were declared null and invalid. Traverses were allowed; and the time of tendering them enlarged, 1 H. 8. c. 8. 10, 11, 12.

While the French monarch repelled the attacks of his enemies, he thought it also requisite to make an attempt on the pope himself, and to despoil him as much as possible, of that sacred character which chiefly rendered him formidable. He engaged some cardinals, disgusted with the violence of Julius, to desert him; and by their authority, he was determined, in conjunction with Maximilian, who still adhered to his alliance, to call a general council, which might reform the church, and check the exorbitancies of the Roman pontiff. A council was summoned at Pisa, which from the beginning bore a very inauspicious aspect, and promised little success to its adherents. Except a few French bishops, who unwillingly obeyed their king's commands in attending the council, all the other prelates kept aloof from an assembly which they regarded as the offspring of faction, intrigue, and worldly politics. Even Pisa, the place of their residence, showed them signs of contempt; which engaged them to transfer their session to Milan, a city under the dominion of the French monarch. Notwithstanding this advantage, they did not experience much more respectful treatment from the inhabitants of Milan; and found it necessary to make another remove to Lyons (q). Louis himself fortified these violent prejudices in favour of papal authority, by the symptoms which he discovered, of regard, deference, and submission to Julius, whom he always spared, even when fortune had thrown into his hands the most inviting opportunities of humbling him. And as it was known, that his consort, who had great influence over him, was extremely disquieted in mind on account of his dissensions with the holy father, all men prognosticated to Julius final success in this unequal contest.

The enterprising pontiff knew his advantages, and availed himself of them with the utmost temerity and insolence. So much had he neglected his sacerdotal character, that he acted in person at the siege of Mirandola, visited the trenches, saw some of his attendants killed by his side, and, like a young soldier, cheerfully bore all the rigours of winter and a severe season, in pursuit of military glory (r); yet was he still able to throw, even on his most moderate opponents, the charge of impiety and profaneness. He summoned a council at Lateran: he put Pisa under an interdict, and all the places which gave shelter to the schismatical council: he excommunicated the cardinals and prelates who attended it: he even pointed his spiritual thunder against the princes who adhered to it: he freed their subjects from all oaths of allegiance, and gave their dominions to every one who could take possession of them!

Ferdinand of Arragon, who had acquired the epithet of Catholic, justly regarded the cause of the pope and of religion only as a cover to his ambition and selfish politics: Henry, naturally sincere and sanguine in his temper, and the more so on account of his youth and inexperience, was moved with a hearty desire of protecting the pope from the oppression to which he believed him exposed from the ambitious enterprizes of Louis. Hopes had been given him by Julius, in 1512, that the title of Most Christian King, (which had hitherto been annexed to the crown of France, and which was regarded as its most precious ornament,) should, in reward of his services, be transferred to that of England (s). Impatient also of acquiring that distinction in Europe to which his power and opulence entitled him, he could not long remain neuter amidst the noise of arms; and the natural enmity of the English against France, as well as their ancient claims upon that kingdom, led Henry to join that alliance, which the pope, Spain, and Venice, had formed against the French monarch. A herald was sent to Paris, to exhort Louis not to wage impious war against the sovereign pontiff; and when he returned without success, another was sent to demand the ancient patrimonial provinces of Anjou, Maine, Guienne, and Normandy. This message was understood to be a declaration of war; and a parliament being summoned on the 14th of February, readily granted supplies for a purpose so much favoured by the English nation (t).

Buonaviso, an agent of the pope's at London, had been corrupted by the court of France, and had previously revealed to Louis all the measures which Henry was concerting against him. But this infidelity did the king inconsiderable prejudice, in comparison of the treachery which he experienced from the selfish purposes of the ally on whom he chiefly relied for assistance. Ferdinand, his father-in-law, had so long persevered in a course of crooked politics, that he began even to value himself on his dexterity in fraud and artifice; and he made a boast of those shameful successes. Being told one day, that Louis, a prince of a very different character, had complained of his having once cheated him: "He lies, the drunkard!" said he, "I have cheated him above twenty times." This prince considered his close connexions with Henry only as the means which enabled him the better to take advantage of his want of experience. He advised him not to invade France by the way of Calais, where he himself should not have it in his power to assist him: he exhorted him rather to send forces to Fontarabia, whence he could easily make a conquest of Guienne, a province in which it was imagined the English had still some adherents. Ferdinand promised to assist this conquest by the junction of a Spanish army; and so forward did he seem to promote the interests of his son-in-law, that he even sent vessels to England, in order to transport over the forces which Henry had levied for that purpose. The marquis of Dorset commanded this armament, which consisted of ten thousand men, chiefly infantry; lord Howard, son of the earl of Surrey, lord Broke, lord Ferrars, and many others of the young gentry and nobility, accompanied him in this service. All were on fire to distinguish themselves by military achievements, and to make a conquest of importance for their master. The secret purpose of Ferdinand in this appearance of unexampled generosity, was suspected by nobody; but the following short narrative will discover his deceit and treachery:

The small kingdom of Navarre lies on the frontiers between France and Spain; and as John d'Albert the sovereign was connected by friendship and alliance with Louis, the opportunity seemed favourable to Ferdinand, while the English forces were conjoined with his own, and while all adherents to the council of Pisa lay under the sentence of excommunication, to put himself in possession of these dominions. No sooner, therefore, was Dorset landed in Guipuscoa (u), than the Spanish monarch declared his readiness to join him with his forces, to make with united arms an invasion of France, and to form the siege of Bayonne, which opened the way into Guienne (v): but he remarked to the English general, how dangerous it might prove to leave behind them the kingdom of Navarre, which, being in close alliance with France, could easily give admittance to the enemy, and cut off all communication between Spain and the combined armies. To provide against so dangerous an event, he required, that John should stipulate a neutrality in the present war; and when that prince expressed his willingness to enter into any engagement for that purpose, he also required, that security should be given for the strict observance of it. John having likewise agreed to this condition, Ferdinand demanded, that he should deliver into his hands six of the most considerable places of his dominions, together with his eldest son as a hostage. These were not terms to be proposed to a sovereign; and as the Spanish monarch expected a refusal, he gave immediate orders to the duke of Alva, his general, to make an invasion on Navarre, and to reduce that kingdom. Alva soon made himself master of all the smaller towns; and being ready to form the siege of Pampeluna, the capital, he summoned the marquis of Dorset to join him with the English army, and concert together all their operations. Dorset now began to suspect, that the interests of his master were very little regarded in all these transactions; and having no orders to invade the kingdom of Navarre, or to make war any where but in France, he refused to take any part in the enterprize. He remained therefore in his quarters at Fontarabia; but so subtle was the contrivance of Ferdinand, that, even while the English army lay in that situation, it was almost equally serviceable to his purpose, as if it had acted in conjunction with his own. It kept the French army in awe, and prevented it from advancing to succour the kingdom of Navarre; so that Alva, having full leisure to conduct the siege, made himself master of Pampeluna, and obliged John to seek for shelter in France. The Spanish general applied again to Dorset, and proposed to conduct with united counsels the operations of the Holy League, for by that appellation it was called, against Louis; but he still declined forming the siege of Bayonne, and rather insisted on the invasion of the principality of Bearne, a part of the king of Navarre's dominions, which lies on the French side of the Pyrenees, Dorset, justly suspicious of his sinister intentions, represented, that, without new orders from his master, he could not concur in such an undertaking. In order to procure these commands, Ferdinand dispatched Martin de Ampios to London; and persuaded Henry, that, by the refractory and scrupulous humour of the English general, the most favourable opportunities were lost, and that it was necessary he should, on all occasions, act in concert with the Spanish commander, who was best acquainted with the situation of the country, and the reasons of every operation. But before orders to this purpose reached Spain, Dorset had become extremely impatient; and observing that his farther stay served not to promote the main undertaking, and that his army was daily perishing by want and sickness, he demanded shipping from Ferdinand to transport them back into England. Ferdinand, who was bound by treaty to furnish him with this supply, whenever demanded, was at length, after many delays, obliged to yield to his importunity; and Dorset, embarking his troops, prepared himself for the voyage. Meanwhile, the messenger arrived with orders from Henry, that the troops should remain in Spain; but the soldiers were so discontented with the treatment which they had met with, that they mutinied, and obliged their commanders to set sail for England. Henry was much displeased with the ill success of this enterprize; and it was with difficulty that Dorset, by explaining the fraudulent conduct of Ferdinand, was at last able to appease him.

There happened this summer an action at sea, which brought not any more decisive advantage to the English. Sir Thomas Knevet, master of the horse, was sent to the coast of Britanny with a fleet of forty-five sail; and he carried with him sir Charles Brandon, sir John Carew, and many other young courtiers, who longed for an opportunity of displaying their valour. After they had committed some depredations, a French fleet of thirty-nine sail issued from Brest, under the command of Primauget, and began an engagement with the English. Fire seized the ship of Primauget, who, finding his destruction inevitable, bore down upon the vessel of the English admiral, and grappling with her, resolved to make her share his fate. Both fleets stood some time in suspense, as spectators of this dreadful engagement; and all men saw with horror the flames which consumed both vessels, and heard the cries of fury and despair, which came from the miserable combatants. At last, the French vessel blew up; and at the same time destroyed the English (w). The rest of the French fleet made their escape into different harbours on the coast of France.

The hostilities which had been commenced by England against France, though it brought no advantage to the former kingdom, were of great prejudice to the latter; and by obliging Louis to withdraw his forces for the defence of his own dominions, lost him that superiority, which his arms, in the beginning of the campaign, had attained in Italy. Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, his nephew, a young hero, had been entrusted with the command of the French forces; and in a few months performed such feats of military art and prowess, says Guicciardini, to render illustrious the life of the oldest captain (x). His career finished with the great battle of Ravenna, which, after the most obstinate conflict, he gained over the Spanish and papal armies. He perished at the very moment his victory was complete; and with him perished the fortune of the French arms in Italy. The Swiss, who had rendered themselves extremely formidable by their bands of disciplined infantry, invaded the Milanese with a numerous army, and raised up that inconstant people to a revolt against the dominion of France. Genoa followed the example of the duchy of Milan; and thus Louis, in a few weeks, entirely lost his Italian conquests, except some garrisons; and Maximilian Sforza, the son of Ludovico, was reinstated in possession of the last mentioned duchy.

(y) He was, says Hume, "humane, beneficent, generous, affable; the patron of every art, and friend of every virtue; he had a soul no less capable of forming great designs than his predecessor, but was more gentle, pliant, and artful in employing means for the execution of them. The sole defect, indeed, of his character was too great finesse and artifice; a fault which, both as a priest and Italian, it was difficult for him to avoid."

Julius discovered extreme joy on the discomfiture of the French: and the more so, as he had been beholden for it to the Swiss, a people whose councils, he hoped, he should always be able to influence and govern. The pontiff survived this success a very little time; and in his place was chosen John de Medicis, on the 21st of February, 1513, who took the appellation of Leo X. and proved one of the most illustrious princes that ever sat on the papal throne (y). By the negociations of Leo, the emperor Maximilian was detached from the French interest; and Henry, notwithstanding his disappointments in the former campaign, was still encouraged to prosecute his warlike measures against the king of France.

Henry had summoned a new session of parliament on the 4th of November, 1512, and obtained a supply for his enterprize. It was a poll-tax, and imposed different sums, according to the station and riches of the person. A duke paid ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks; every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, four marks. An imposition was also granted of two fifteenths and four tenths (z). By these supplies, joined to the treasure which had been left by his father, and which was not yet entirely dissipated, he was enabled to levy a great army, and render himself formidable to his enemy. The English are said to have been much encouraged in this enterprize, by the arrival of a vessel in the Thames under the papal banner. It carried presents of wine and hams to the king, and the more eminent courtiers; and such fond devotion was at that time entertained towards the court of Rome, that these trivial presents were every where received with the greatest marks of respect and joy.

In order to prevent all disturbances from Scotland, while Henry's arms should be employed on the continent, Dr. West, dean of Windsor, was dispatched on an embassy to James, the king's brother-in-law; with instructions to accommodate all differences between the kingdoms, as well as to discover the intentions of the court of Scotland (a). Some complaints had already been made on both sides. One Barton, a Scotchman, having suffered injuries from the Portuguese, for which he could obtain no redress, had procured letters of marque against that nation; but he had no sooner put to sea, than he was guilty of the grossest abuses, committed depredations upon the English, and much infested the narrow seas (b). Lord Howard and sir Edward Howard, admirals, and sons of the earl of Surrey, sailing out against him, fought him in a desperate action, where the pirate was killed; and they brought his ships into the Thames. As Henry refused all satisfaction for this act of justice, some of the borderers, who wanted but a pretence for depredations, entered England under the command of lord Hume, warden of the marches, and committed great ravages on that kingdom. Notwithstanding these mutual grounds of dissatisfaction, matters might easily have been accommodated, had it not been for Henry's intended invasion of France, which roused the jealousy of the Scottish nation (c). The ancient league, which subsisted between France and Scotland, was conceived to be the strongest band of connexion; and the Scots universally believed, that were it not for the countenance which they received from this foreign alliance, they had never been able so long to maintain their independence against a people so much superior in arms and warlike atchievements. James was farther incited to take part in the quarrel by the invitations of Anne, queen of France, whose knight he had ever in all tournaments professed himself, and who summoned him, according to the ideas of romantic gallantry prevalent in that age, to take the field in her defence, and prove himself her true and valorous champion. The remonstrances of his consort and of his wisest counsellors were in vain opposed to the martial ardour of this prince. He first sent a squadron of ships to the assistance of France; the only fleet which Scotland seems ever to have possessed. And though he still made professions of maintaining a neutrality, the English ambassador easily perceived, that a war would in the end prove inevitable; and he gave warning of the danger to his master, who sent the earl of Surrey to put the northern parts of the kingdom in a posture of defence, and to resist the invasion which was expected from that quarter.

Henry, all on fire for military fame, was little discouraged by this appearance of a diversion from the north; and so much the less, as he flattered himself with the assistance of all the considerable potentates of Europe in his invasion of France. The pope still continued to thunder out his excommunications against Louis, and all the adherents of the schismatical council: the Swiss cantons made professions of violent animosity against France: the ambassadors of Ferdinand and Maximilian had signed with those of Henry a treaty of alliance against that power, and had stipulated the time and place of their intended invasion; and though Ferdinand disavowed his ambassador, and even signed a truce for a twelvemonth with the common enemy; Henry was not yet fully convinced of his selfish and sinister intentions, and still hoped for his concurrence after the expiration of that term. He had now got a minister who complied with all his inclinations, and flattered him in every scheme to which his sanguine and impetuous temper was inclined. This was Thomas Wolsey, dean of Lincoln, and almoner to the king. He surpassed in favour all Henry's ministers, and was fast advancing towards that unrivalled grandeur which he afterwards attained (d).

The branch of administration in which Henry most exerted himself, while he gave his entire confidence to Wolsey, was the military, which, as it suited the natural gallantry and bravery of his temper, as well as the ardour of his youth, was the principal object of his attention. Finding that Louis had made great preparations both by sea and land to resist him, he was no less careful to levy a formidable army, and equip a considerable fleet for the invasion of France. The command of the fleet was entrusted to sir Edward Howard; who, after scouring the Channel for some time, presented himself before Brest, where the French navy then lay; and he challenged them to combat. The French admiral, who expected from the Mediterranean a reinforcement of some gallies under the command of Prejeant de Bidoux, kept within the harbour, and saw with patience the English burn and destroy the country in the neighbourhood. At last Prejeant arrived with six gallies, and put into Conquet, a place within a few leagues of Brest; where he secured himself behind some batteries, which he had planted on rocks that lay on each side of him. Howard was, notwithstanding, determined to make an attack upon him; and as he had but two gallies, he took himself the command of one, and gave the other to lord Ferrars. He was followed by some row-barges and some crayers under the command of sir Thomas Cheyney, sir William Sidney, and other officers of distinction. He immediately fastened on Prejeant's ship, and leaped on board of her, attended by one Carroz, a Spanish cavalier, and seventeen Englishmen. The cable, meanwhile, which fastened his ship to that of the enemy, being cut, the admiral was thus left in the hands of the French; and as he still continued the combat with great gallantry, he was pushed overboard by their pikes (h). Lord Ferrars, seeing the admiral's galley fall off, followed with the other small vessels; and the whole fleet was so discouraged by the loss of their commander, that they retired from before Brest (i). This naval action was fought on the 25th of April, 1513. The French navy came out of harbour; and even ventured to invade the coast of Sussex. They were repulsed, and Prejeant, their commander, lost an eye by the shot of an arrow. Lord Howard, brother to the deceased admiral, succeeded to the command of the English fleet; and little memorable passed at sea during this summer.

Great preparations had been making at land, during the whole winter, for an invasion on France by the way of Calais; but the summer was well advanced before every thing was in sufficient readiness for the intended enterprize. The long peace which the kingdom had enjoyed, had somewhat unfitted the English for military expeditions; and the great change which had lately been introduced in the art of war, had rendered it still more difficult to enure them to the use of weapons now employed in action. The Swiss, and after them the Spaniards, had shown the advantage of a stable infantry, who fought with pike and sword, and were able to repulse even the heavy-armed cavalry, in which the great force of the armies formerly consisted. The practice of fire-arms was become common; though the caliver, which was the weapon now in use, was so inconvenient, and attended with so many disadvantages, that it had not entirely discredited the bow, a weapon in which the English excelled all European nations. A considerable part of the forces, which Henry levied for the invasion of France, consisted of archers; and as soon as affairs were in readiness, the vanguard of the army, amounting to eight thousand men, under the command of the earl of Shrewsbury, sailed over to Calais. Shrewsbury was accompanied by the earl of Derby, the lords Fitzwalter, Hastings, Cobham, and sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light horse. Another body of six thousand men soon after followed under the command of of lord Herbert the chamberlain, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, (d) This man, says Hume, was son of a butcher at Ipswich; but having got a learned education, and being endowed with an excellent capacity, he was admitted into the marquis of Dorset's family as tutor to that nobleman's children, and soon gained the friendship and countenance of his patron (e). He was recommended to be chaplain to Henry VII. and being employed by that monarch in a secret negociation, which regarded his intended marriage with Margaret of Savoy, Maximilian's daughter, he acquitted himself to the king's satisfaction, and obtained the praise both of diligence and dexterity in his conduct (f). That prince, having given him a commission to Maximilian, who at that time resided in Brussels, was surprized in less than three days after, to see Wolsey present himself before him; and supposing that he had protracted his departure, he began to reprove him for the dilatory execution of his orders. Wolsey informed him, that he had just returned from Brussels, and had successfully fulfilled all his majesty's commands. "But on second thoughts," said the king, "I found that somewhat was omitted in your orders; and have sent a messenger after you with fuller instructions." "I met the messenger," replied Wolsey, "on my return: but as I had reflected on that omission, I ventured of myself to execute what, I knew, must be your majesty's intentions." The death of Henry, soon after this incident, retarded the advancement of Wolsey, and prevented his reaping any advantage from the good opinion which that monarch had entertained of him: but thenceforwards he was looked on at court as a rising man; and Fox bishop of Winchester cast his eye upon him as one who might be serviceable to him in his present situation (g). This prelate, observing that the earl of Surrey had totally eclipsed him in favour, resolved to introduce Wolsey to the young prince's familiarity, and hoped that he might rival Surrey in his insinuating arts, and yet be contented to act in the cabinet a part subordinate to Fox himself, who had promoted him. In a little time Wolsey gained so much on the king, that he supplanted both Surrey in his favour, and Fox in his trust and confidence. Being admitted to Henry's parties of pleasure, he took the lead in every jovial conversation, and promoted all that frolic and entertainment which he found suitable to the age and inclination of the young monarch. Neither his own years, which were near forty, nor his character of a clergyman, were any restraint upon him, or engaged him to check, by any useless severity, the gaiety, in which Henry, who had small propension to debauchery, passed his careless hours. During the intervals of amusement he introduced business, and insinuated those maxims of conduct which he was desirous his master should adopt. He observed to him, that, while he entrusted his affairs into the hands of his father's counsellors, he had the advantage indeed of employing men of wisdom and experience, but men who owed not their promotion to his favour, and who scarcely thought themselves accountable to him for the exercise of their authority: that by the factions, and cabals, and jealousies, which had long prevailed among them, they more obstructed the advancement of his affairs, than they promoted it by the knowledge which age and practice had conferred upon them: that while he thought proper to pass his time in those pleasures, to which his age and royal fortune invited him, and in those studies, which would in time enable him to sway the sceptre with absolute authority, his best system of government would be to entrust his authority into the hands of some one person, who was the creature of his will, and who would entertain no view but that of promoting his service: and that if this minister had also the same relish for pleasure with himself, and the same taste for science, he could more easily, at intervals, account to him for his whole conduct, and introduce his master gradually into the knowledge of public business; and thus, without tedious constraint or application, initiate him in the science of government. Henry entered into all the views of Wolsey; and finding no one so capable of executing this plan of administration as the person who proposed it, he soon advanced his favourite, from being the companion of his pleasures, to be a member of his council; and from being a member of his council, to be his sole and absolute minister. By this rapid advancement and uncontrolled authority, the character and genius of Wolsey had full opportunity to display itself. Insatiable in his acquisitions, but still more magnificent in his expence: of extensive capacity, but still more unbounded enterprize: ambitious of power, but still more desirous of glory: insinuating, engaging, persuasive; and, by turns, lofty, elevated, commanding: haughty to his equals, but affable to his dependants; oppressive to the people, but liberal to his friends; more generous than grateful; less moved by injuries than by contempt; he was framed to take the ascendant in every intercourse with others, but exerted this superiority of nature with such ostentation as exposed him to envy, and made every one willing to recal the original inferiority, or rather meanness of his fortune. As the different transactions of Wolsey's life will be interspersed in the following pages of this reign, we shall not anticipate the reader's pleasure by inserting in this place what must of necessity be introduced in other parts.

(h) It was a maxim of Howard's, that no admiral was good for any thing, that was not even brave to a degree of madness. As the sea-service requires much less plan and contrivance and capacity than the land, this maxim has great plausibility and appearance of truth: though the fate of Howard himself may serve as a proof, that even there courage ought to be tempered with discretion.

together with Carew, Curson, and other gentlemen. The king himself prepared to follow with the main body and rear of the army; and he appointed the queen regent of the kingdom during his absence. That he might secure her administration from all disturbance, he ordered Edmund de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, to be beheaded in the Tower, on the 30th of April, the nobleman who had been attainted and imprisoned during the late reign. Henry was led to commit this act of violence by the dying commands, as is imagined, of his father, who told him, that he never would be free from danger, while a man of so turbulent a disposition as Suffolk was alive. And as Richard de la Pole, brother of Suffolk, had accepted of a command in the French service, and foolishly attempted to revive the York faction, and to instigate them against the present government, he probably, by that means, drew more suddenly the king's vengeance on this unhappy nobleman. This act of cruelty, which suited the sanguinary policy of his father, was far beneath Henry VIII. and merits reprobation.

At length Henry, attended by the duke of Buckingham, and many others of the nobility, arrived at Calais, on the 30th of June, and entered upon his French expedition, from which he fondly expected so much success and glory (k). Of all those allies who had promised to assist the operations of Henry, the Swiss alone fully performed their engagements. Being put in motion by a sum of money sent them by Henry, and incited by their victories obtained in Italy, and by their animosity against France, they were preparing to enter that kingdom with an army of twenty-five thousand men; and no equal force could be opposed to their incursion. Maximilian had received an advance of one hundred and twenty thousand crowns from Henry, and had promised to reinforce the Swiss with eight thousand men; but failed in his engagements. That he might make atonement to the king, he himself appeared in the Low Countries, and joined the English army with some German and Flemish soldiers, who were useful in giving an example of discipline to Henry's new levied forces. Observing the disposition of the English monarch to be more bent on glory than on interest, he inlisted himself in his service, wore the cross of St. George, and received pay, (a hundred crowns a-day,) as one of his subjects and captains. But while he exhibited this extraordinary spectacle, of an emperor of Germany serving under a king of England, he was treated with the highest respect by Henry, and really directed all the operations of the English army.

Some time before the arrival of Henry and Maximilian in the English camp, the earl of Shrewsbury and lord Herbert had formed the siege of Teroüane, a town situated on the frontiers of Picardy; and they began to attack the place with vigour. Teligni and Crequi commanded in the town, and had a garrison not exceeding two thousand men; yet made they such vigorous resistance as protracted the siege a month; and they at last found themselves more in danger from want of provisions and ammunition, than from the assaults of the besiegers. Having conveyed intelligence of their situation to Louis, who had advanced to Amiens with his army, that prince gave orders to throw relief into the place. Fontrailles appeared, on the 16th of August, at the head of eight hundred horsemen, each of whom carried a sack of gunpowder behind him, and two quarters of bacon. With this small force he made a sudden and unexpected irruption into the English camp, and, surmounting all resistance, advanced to the fossée of the town, where each horseman threw down his burden. They immediately returned at the gallop, and were so fortunate as again to break through the English, and to suffer little or no loss (l).

The English, however, soon after, had full revenge for the insult. Henry had received intelligence of the approach of the French horse, who had advanced to protect another incursion of Fontrailles; and he commanded some troops to pass the Lis, in order to oppose them. The cavalry of France, though they consisted chiefly of gentlemen who had behaved with great gallantry in many desperate actions in Italy, were, on sight of the enemy, seized with so unaccountable a panic, that they immediately took to flight, and were pursued by the English. The duke of Longueville, who commanded the French, Bussi d'Amboise, Clermont, Imbercourt, the chevalier Bayard, and many other officers of distinction, were made prisoners (m). This action, or rather rout, is sometimes called the battle of Guinegâte, from the place where it was fought; but more commonly the Battle of Spurs, because the French, that day, made more use of their spurs than of their swords.

After this considerable advantage, the king, who was at the head of an army of above fifty thousand men, might have made incursions to the gates of Paris, and spread confusion and desolation every where. It gave Louis, however, great joy, when he heard that the English, instead of pushing their victory, and attacking the dismayed troops of France, returned to the siege of Teroüane. The governors were obliged, soon after, to capitulate; and Henry found his acquisition of so little moment, though gained at the expence of some blood, and what, in his present circumstances, was more important, of much valuable time, that he immediately demolished the fortifications. The anxieties of the French were again revived with regard to the motions of the English. The Swiss, at the same time, had entered Burgundy with a formidable army, and laid siege to Dijon, which was in no condition to resist them. Ferdinand himself, though he had made a truce with Louis, seemed disposed to lay hold of every advantage which fortune should present to him. Scarcely ever was the French monarchy in greater danger, or less in a condition to defend itself against those powerful armies, which on every side assailed or threatened it. Even many of the inhabitants of Paris, who believed themselves exposed to the rapacity and violence of the enemy, began to dislodge, though they knew not whither to retire for greater security.

But Louis was extricated from his present difficulties by the manifold egregious blunders of his enemies. The Swiss allowed themselves to be seduced into a negociation by Tremouille, governor of Burgundy; and, without making enquiry whether that nobleman had any powers to treat, they accepted of the conditions which he offered them. Tremouille, who knew that he should be disavowed by his master, stipulated whatever they were pleased to demand; and thought himself happy, at the expence of some payments and very large promises, to get rid of so formidable an enemy (n). The measures of Henry showed equal ignorance in the art of war with that of the Swiss in negociation. Tournay was a great and rich city, which, though it lay within the frontiers of Flanders, belonged to France, and afforded the troops of that kingdom a passage into the heart of the Netherlands. Maximilian, who was desirous of freeing his grandson from so troublesome a neighbour, advised Henry to lay siege to the place; and the English monarch, not considering that such an acquisition nowise advanced his conquests in France, imprudently followed this interested counsel. The city of Tournay, by its ancient charters, being exempted from the burden of a garrison, the burghers, against the remonstrance of their sovereign, strenuously insisted on maintaining this dangerous privilege; and they engaged, by themselves, to make a vigorous defence against the enemy (o). Their courage failed them when matters came to a trial; and, after a few days' siege, the place was surrendered to the English, on the 24th of September. The bishop of Tournay was lately dead; and, as a new bishop was already elected by the chapter, but not installed in his office, the king bestowed the administration of the see on his favourite, Wolsey, and put him in immediate possession of the revenues, which were considerable (p). Soon after this Henry thought proper to return to England; and he carried the greater part of his army with him. Success had attended him in every enterprize; and his youthful mind was much elated with this seeming prosperity; but all men of judgement, comparing the advantages of his situation with his progress, his expence with his acquisitions, were convinced that this campaign, so much vaunted, was in reality both ruinous and inglorious to that monarch (q).

The success which, during this summer had attended Henry's arms in the North, was much more decisive. The king of Scotland had assembled the whole force of his kingdom; and, having passed the Tweed with a brave, though a tumultuary army of above fifty thousand men, he ravaged those parts of Northumberland which lay nearest that river, and he employed himself in taking the castles of Norham, Etal, Werke, Ford, and other places of trifling importance. Lady Ford, being taken prisoner in her castle, was presented to James, and so gained on the affections of the prince, that he wasted in pleasure the critical time which, during the absence of his enemy, he should have employed in pushing his conquests. His troops, lying in a barren country, where they soon consumed all their provisions, began to be pinched with hunger; and, as the authority of the prince was feeble, and military discipline, during that age, extremely relaxed, many of them had deserted from the camp, and retired homewards. Meanwhile the earl of Surrey, having collected a force of twenty-six thousand men, of which five thousand had been sent over from the king's army in France, marched to the defence of the country, and approached the Scots, who lay on some high ground near the Cheviot hills. The river Till ran between the two armies, and prevented an engagement: Surrey, therefore, sent a herald to the Scottish camp, challenging the enemy to descend into the plain of Milfield, which lay towards the south; and there, appointing a day for the combat, to try their valour on equal ground. Receiving no satisfactory answer, he made a feint of marching towards Berwick; as if he intended to enter Scotland, to lay waste the borders, and cut off the provisions of the enemy. The Scottish army, in order to prevent his purpose, put themselves in motion; and having set fire to the huts in which they had quartered, they descended from the hills. Surrey, taking advantage of the smoke, which was blown towards him, and which concealed his movements, passed the Till with his artillery and vanguard at the bridge of Twisel, and sent the rest of his army to seek a ford at another part of the river. An engagement was now become inevitable, and both sides prepared for it with tranquillity and order, on the 9th of September (r). The English divided their army into two lines: lord Howard led the main body of the first line, sir Edmund Howard the right wing, sir Marmaduke Constable the left. The earl of Surrey, himself, commanded the main body of the second line, lord Dacres the right wing, sir Edward Stanley the left. The front of the Scots presented three divisions to the enemy: the middle was led by the king himself: the right by the earl of Huntley, assisted by lord Hume: the left by the earls of Lenox and Argyle. A fourth division, under the earl of Bothwel, made a body of reserve. Huntley began the battle; and after a sharp conflict put to flight the left wing of the English, and chased them off the field: but, on returning from the pursuit, he found the whole Scottish army in great disorder. The division under Lenox and Argyle, elated with the success of the other wing, had broken their ranks, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances and entreaties of La Motte, the French ambassador, had rushed headlong upon the enemy. Not only sir Edmund Howard, at the head of his division, received them with great valour; but Dacres, who commanded in the second line, wheeling about during the action, fell upon their rear, and put them to the sword without resistance. The division under James, and that under Bothwel, animated by the valour of their leaders, still made head against the English, and, throwing themselves into a circle, protracted the action, till night separated the combatants. The victory seemed yet undecided, and the numbers that fell on each side were nearly equal, amounting to above five thousand men: but the morning discovered where the advantage lay. The English had lost only persons of small note; but the flower of the Scottish nobility had fallen in battle, and their king himself, after the most diligent enquiry, could no where be found. In searching the field, the English met with a dead body which resembled him, and was arrayed in a similar habit; and they put it in a leaden coffin and sent it to London. During some time it was kept unburied; because James died under sentence of excommunication, on account of his confederacy with France, and his opposition to the holy see (s): but, upon Henry's application, who pretended that this prince had, in the instant before his death, discovered signs of repentance, absolution was given him, and his body was interred. The Scots, however, still asserted that it was not James's body which was found on the field of battle, but that of one Elphinston, who had been arrayed in arms resembling their king's, in order to divide the attention of the English, and share the danger with his master. It was believed that James had been seen crossing the Tweed at Kelso; and some imagined that he had been killed by the vassals of lord Hume, whom that nobleman had instigated to commit so enormous a crime. The populace, however, entertained the opinion that he was still alive, and, having secretly gone in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, would soon return and take possession of the throne. This fond conceit was long entertained among the Scots. The king of Scotland and most of his chief nobles being slain in the field of Flouden, (so this battle was called,) an inviting opportunity was offered to Henry of gaining advantages over that kingdom, perhaps of reducing it to subjection. But he discovered, on this occasion, a mind truly great and generous. When the queen of Scotland, Margaret, who was created regent during the infancy of her son, applied for peace, he readily granted it; and took compassion of the helpless condition of his sister and nephew. The earl of Surrey, who had gained him so great a victory, was restored, in 1514, to the title of duke of Norfolk, which had been forfeited by his father for engaging on the side of Richard III. Lord Howard was honoured with the title of earl of Surrey. Sir Charles Brandon, the king's favourite, whom he had before created viscount Lisle, was now raised to the dignity of duke of Suffolk. Wolsey, who was both his favourite and his minister, was created bishop of Lincoln. Lord Herbert obtained the title of earl of Worcester. Sir Edward Stanley that of lord Monteagle.

The peace which was settled with Scotland gave Henry security on that side, and enabled him to prosecute his enterprize against France, yet some other incidents had happened, which more than counterbalanced this fortunate event, and served to open his eyes with regard to the rashness of an undertaking into which his youth had betrayed him. Louis, fully sensible of the dangerous situation to which his kingdom had been reduced during the former campaign, was resolved, by every expedient, to prevent the return of like perils, and to break the confederacy of his enemies. The pope was nowise disposed to push the French to extremity; and, provided they did not return to take possession of Milan, his interests rather led him to preserve the balance among the contending parties. He accepted, therefore, of Louis's offer to renounce the council of Lyons; and he took off the excommunication which his predecessor and himself had fulminated against that king and his dominions. Ferdinand was now fast declining in years; and as he entertained no farther ambition than that of keeping possession of Navarre, which he had subdued by his arms and policy, he readily hearkened to the proposals of Louis for prolonging the truce another year, and even shewed an inclination of forming a more intimate connexion with that monarch. Louis had hinted that he intended to marry his second daughter Renée, either to Charles, prince of Spain, or his brother Ferdinand, both of them grandsons of the Spanish monarch; and he declared his resolution of bestowing on her, as her portion, his claim to the duchy of Milan. Ferdinand gladly embraced these proposals; and engaged the emperor Maximilian in the same views. He also procured the accession of that monarch to a treaty, which opened so inviting a prospect of aggrandising their common grandchildren.

When Henry was informed of Ferdinand's renewal of the truce with Louis, he fell into a violent rage, and loudly complained, that his father-in-law had first, by high promises and professions, engaged him in enmity with France, and afterwards, without giving him the least warning, had now again sacrificed his interests to his own selfish purposes, and had left him exposed alone to all the danger and expence of the war. In proportion to his easy credulity, and his unsuspecting reliance on Ferdinand, was the vehemence with which he exclaimed against the treatment which he met with; and he threatened revenge for this egregious treachery and breach of faith (t). But he lost all patience when informed of the other negociation by which Maximilian was also seduced from his alliance, and in which proposals had been agreed to, for the marriage of the prince of Spain with the daughter of France. Charles, during the life-time of the late king, had been affianced to Mary, Henry's younger sister; and, as the prince now approached the age of puberty, the king had expected the immediate completion of the marriage, and the honourable settlement of a sister, for whom he had entertained a tender affection. Such a complication, therefore, of injuries gave him the highest displeasure, and inspired him with a desire of expressing his disdain towards those who had imposed on his youth and inexperience, and had abused his too great facility.

The duke of Longueville, who had been made prisoner at the battle of Guinegâte, and who was still detained in England, was ready to take advantage of all these dispositions of Henry, in order to procure a peace, and even an alliance, which he knew to be passionately desired by his master. He represented to the king that Anne, queen of France, being lately dead, a door was thereby opened for an affinity which might tend to the advantage of both kingdoms, and which would serve to terminate honourably all the differences between them: that she had left Louis no male children; and as he had ever entertained a strong desire of having heirs to the crown, no marriage seemed more suitable to him than that with the princess of England, whose youth and beauty afforded the most flattering hopes in that particular: that, though the marriage of a princess of sixteen with a king of fifty-three might seem unsuitable, yet the other advantages attending the alliance were more than a sufficient compensation for this inequality: and that Henry, in loosening his connexions with Spain, from which he had never reaped any advantage, would contract a close affinity with Louis, a prince, who, through his whole life, had invariably maintained the character of probity and honour.

As Henry seemed to hearken to this discourse with willing ears, Longueville informed his master of the probability which he discovered of bringing the matter to a happy conclusion; and he received full powers for negociating the treaty. The articles were easily adjusted between the two monarchs. Louis agreed that Tournay should remain in the hands of the English; that Richard de la Pole should be banished to Metz, there to live on a pension assigned him by Louis; that Henry should receive payment of a million of crowns, being the arrears due by treaty to his father and himself; and that the princess Mary should bring four hundred thousand crowns as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as any queen of France, even the former, who was heiress of Britanny. The two princes also agreed on the succours with which they should mutually supply each other, in case either of them were attacked by an enemy (u). This peace was signed on the 7th of August, 1514.

Pursuant to the declaration of this treaty, Mary was sent to France with a splendid retinue, and Louis met her at Abbeville, where the espousals were celebrated on the 9th of October. He was enchanted with the beauty, grace, and numerous accomplishments of the young princess; and being naturally of an amorous disposition, which his advanced age had not entirely cooled, he was seduced into such a course of gaiety and pleasure, as proved very unsuitable to his declining state of health (v). He died on the 1st of January, 1515, in less than three months after the marriage, to the extreme regret of the French nation, who, sensible of his tender concern for their welfare, gave him, with one voice, the honourable appellation of Father of his people.

Francis, duke of Angouleme, a youth of one and twenty, who had married Louis's eldest daughter, succeeded him on the throne; and, by his activity, valour, generosity, and other virtues, gave prognostics of a happy and glorious reign. This young monarch had been extremely struck with the charms of the English princess; and, even during his predecessor's life-time, had paid her such assiduous court, as made some of his friends apprehend that he had entertained views of gallantry towards her. But being warned that, by indulging this passion, he might probably exclude himself from the throne, he forbore all farther addresses; and even watched the young dowager with a very careful eye during the first months of her widowhood. Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, was, at that time, in the court of France, the most comely personage of his time, and the most accomplished in all the exercises which were then thought to befit a courtier and a soldier. He was Henry's chief favourite; and that monarch had even once entertained thoughts of marrying him to his sister, and had given indulgence to the mutual passion which took place between them. The queen asked Suffolk, whether he had now the courage, without farther reflection, to espouse her? And she told him, that her brother would more easily forgive him for not asking his consent, than for acting contrary to his orders. Suffolk declined not so inviting an offer; and their nuptials were secretly celebrated at Paris. Francis, who was pleased with this marriage, as it prevented Henry from forming any powerful alliance by means of his sister (w), interposed his good offices in appeasing him: and even Wolsey, having entertained no jealousy of Suffolk, who was content to participate in the king's pleasures, and had no ambition to engage in public business, was active in reconciling the king to his sister and brother-in-law; and he obtained them permission to return to England.

The numerous enemies whom Wolsey's sudden elevation, his aspiring character, and his haughty deportment had raised him, served only to rivet him faster in Henry's confidence; who valued himself on supporting the choice which he had made, and who was incapable of yielding either to the murmurs of the people, or to the discontents of the great. That artful prelate likewise, well acquainted with the king's imperious temper, concealed from him the absolute ascendant which he had acquired; and while he secretly directed all public councils, he always pretended a blind submission to the will and authority of his master. By entering into the king's pleasures, he preserved his affection; by conducting his business, he gratified his indolence; and by his unlimited complaisance in both capacities he prevented all that jealousy to which his exorbitant acquisitions, and his splendid ostentatious train of life, should naturally have given birth. The archbishopric of York falling vacant by the death of Bambridge, Wolsey was promoted to that see, and resigned the bishopric of Lincoln. Besides enjoying the administration of Tournay, he got possession, on easy leases, of the revenues of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, bishoprics filled by Italians, who were allowed to reside abroad, and who were glad to compound for this indulgence, by yielding a considerable share of their income. He held in commendam the abbey of St. Albans, and many other church preferments. He was even allowed to unite with the see of York, first that of Durham, next that of Winchester; and there seemed to be no end of his acquisitions. His farther advancement in ecclesiastical dignity served him as a pretence for engrossing still more revenues: the pope, observing his great influence over the king, was desirous of engaging him in his interests, and created him a cardinal. No churchman, under colour of exacting respect to religion, ever carried to a greater height the state and dignity of that character. His train consisted of eight hundred servants, of whom many were knights and gentlemen: some even of the nobility put their children into his family as a place of education; and in order to gain them favour with their patron, allowed them to bear offices as his servants. Whoever was distinguished by any art or science paid court to the cardinal; and none paid court in vain. Literature, which was then in its infancy, found in him a generous patron; and both by his public institutions and private bounty, he gave encouragement to every branch of erudition (x). Not content with this munificence, which gained him the approbation of the wise, he strove to dazzle the eyes of the populace, by the splendour of his equipage and furniture, the costly embroidery of his liveries, and the lustre of his apparel. He was the first clergyman in England that wore silk and gold, not only on his habit, but also on his saddles and the trappings of his horses (y). He caused his cardinal's hat to be borne aloft by a person of rank; and when he came to the king's chapel, would permit it to be laid on no place but the altar. A priest, the tallest and most comely he could find, carried before him a pillar of silver, on whose top was placed a cross: but not satisfied with this parade, to which he thought himself entitled as cardinal, he provided another priest of equal stature and beauty, who marched along, bearing the cross of York, even in the diocese of Canterbury; contrary to the ancient rule and the agreement between the prelates of these rival sees (z). The people made merry with the cardinal's ostentation; and said they were now sensible, that one crucifix alone was not sufficient for the expiation of his sins and offences.

Warham, chancellor and archbishop of Canterbury, a man of a moderate temper, averse to all disputes, chose rather to retire from public employment, than maintain an unequal contest with the haughty cardinal. He resigned his office of chancellor; and the great seal was immediately delivered to Wolsey. If this new accumulation of dignity increased his enemies, it also served to exalt his personal character, and prove the extent of his capacity. A strict administration of justice took place during his enjoyment of the chancellorship; and no one in that high office ever discovered greater impartiality in his decisions, deeper penetration of judgement, or more enlarged knowledge of law and equity (a).

The duke of Norfolk, likewise finding the king's money almost exhausted by projects and pleasures, while his inclination for expence still continued, was glad to resign his office of treasurer, and retire from court. His rival, Fox bishop of Winchester, reaped no advantage from his absence; but partly overcome by years and infirmities, partly disgusted at the ascendant acquired by Wolsey, withdrew himself wholly to the care of his diocese. The duke of Suffolk had also taken offence that the king, by the cardinal's persuasion, had refused to pay a debt which he had contracted during his residence in France; and he thenceforth affected to live in privacy. These incidents left Wolsey to enjoy, without a rival, the whole power and favour of the king; and they put into his hands every kind of authority. In vain did Fox, before his retirement, warn the king "not to suffer the servant to be greater than his master:" Henry replied, that he well knew how to retain all his subjects in obedience; but he continued still an unlimited deference in every thing to the directions and counsels of cardinal Wolsey.

Public tranquillity was now so well established in England, the obedience of the people was entire, the general administration of justice by the cardinal's means (b) was so exact, that no domestic occurrence happened considerable enough to disturb the repose of the king and his minister: they might even have dispensed with giving any strict attention to foreign affairs, were it possible for men to enjoy any situation in absolute tranquillity, or abstain from projects and enterprizes, however fruitless and unnecessary.

The will of the late king of Scotland who left his widow regent of the kingdom, and the vote of the convention of states, which confirmed that destination, had expressly limited her authority to the condition of her remaining unmarried (c): but notwithstanding this limitation, a few months after her husband's death, she espoused the earl of Angus, of the name of Douglas, a young nobleman of great family and promising hopes. Some of the nobility now proposed the electing of Angus to the regency, and recommended this choice as the most likely means of preserving peace with England: but the jealousy of the great families, and the fear of exalting the Douglasses, begat opposition to the measure. Lord Hume, in particular, the most powerful chieftain in the kingdom, insisted on recalling the duke of Albany, son to a brother of James III. who had been banished into France, and who, having there married, had left posterity that were next heirs to the crown, and the nearest relations to their young sovereign. Albany, though first prince of the blood, had never been in Scotland, was totally unacquainted with the manners of the people, ignorant of their situation, unpractised in their language; yet such was the favour attending the French alliance, and so great the authority of Hume, that this prince was invited to accept the reins of government. Francis, however, careful not to give offence to the king of England, detained Albany some time in France; but at length, sensible how important it was to keep Scotland in his interests, he permitted him to go over and take possession of the regency: he even renewed the ancient league with that kingdom, though it implied such a close connexion as might be thought somewhat to intrench on his alliance with England.

When the regent arrived in Scotland, he made inquiries concerning the state of the country, and character of the people; and he discovered a scene with which he was hitherto but little acquainted. That turbulent kingdom, he perceived, was rather to be considered as a confederacy, and that not a close one, of petty princes, than a regular system of civil polity; and even the king, much more a regent, possessed an authority very uncertain and precarious. Arms more than laws prevailed; and courage, preferably to equity or justice, was the virtue most valued and respected. The nobility, in whom the whole power resided, were so connected by hereditary alliances, or so divided by inveterate enmities, that it was impossible, without employing an armed force, either to punish the most flagrant guilt, or give security to the most entire innocence. Rapine and violence, when exercised on a hostile tribe, instead of making a person odious among his own clan, rather recommended him to their esteem and approbation; and by rendering him useful to the chieftain, entitled him to a preference above his fellows. And though the necessity of mutual support served as a close cement of amity among those of the same kindred, the spirit of revenge against enemies, and the desire of prosecuting the deadly feuds (so they were called) still appeared to be passions the most predominant among the uncultivated people of Scotland.

The persons to whom Albany on his arrival first applied for information with regard to the state of the country, happened to be inveterate enemies of Hume (d); and they represented that powerful nobleman as the chief source of public disorders, and the great obstacle to the execution of the laws and the administration of justice. Before the authority of the magistrate could be established, it was necessary, they said, to make an example of this great offender; and by the terror of his punishment, teach all lesser criminals to pay respect to the power of their sovereign. Albany, moved by the artful tales of these persons, was induced to forget Hume's past services, to which he had chiefly been indebted for the regency; and he no longer bore towards him that favourable countenance with which he was wont to receive him. Hume's quick penetration soon perceived the alteration, and was incited, both by regard to his own safety, and from motives of revenge, to take measures in opposition to the regent. He applied himself to Angus and the queen-dowager, and represented to them the danger to which the infant prince was exposed from the ambition of Albany, next heir to the crown, to whom the states had imprudently entrusted the whole authority of government. Margaret by this persuasion formed the design of carrying off the young king, and putting him under the protection of her brother; and when that conspiracy was detected, she herself, attended by Hume and Angus, withdrew into the territories of the king of England, where she was delivered of a daughter not long after her arrival.

Henry, in order to check the authority of Albany and the French party, gave uncouragement to these malcontents, and assured them of his support. Matters being afterwards in appearance accommodated between Hume and the regent, that nobleman returned into his own country; but notwithstanding this seeming reconciliation, mutual suspicions and jealousies still prevailed. He was committed to custody, under the care of the earl of Arran his brother-in-law; and was for some time detained prisoner in his castle. But having persuaded Arran to enter into the conspiracy with him, he was allowed to make his escape; and he openly levied war upon the regent. A new accommodation ensued, not more sincere than the foregoing; and Hume was so imprudent as to entrust himself, together with his brother, into the hands of that prince. They were immediately seized, committed to custody, brought to trial, condemned, and executed (e).

Such violent remedies often produce, for some time, a deceitful tranquillity; but as they destroy mutual confidence, and beget the most inveterate animosities, their consequences are commonly fatal, both to the public and to those who have recourse to them. The regent, however, took advantage of the present calm which prevailed; and being invited over by the French king, who was at that time willing to gratify Henry, he went into France; and was engaged to remain there for some years. During the absence of the regent some confusions prevailed in Scotland, and such mutual enmity, rapine, and violence among the great families, that that kingdom was for a long time utterly disabled, both from offending its enemies and assisting its friends. We have carried on the Scottish history some years beyond the present period; that, as that country had little connection with the general system of Europe, we might be the less interrupted in the narration of those more memorable events which were transacted in the other kingdoms.

It was foreseen, that a young active prince like Francis, and of so martial a disposition, would soon employ the great preparations which his predecessor before his death had made for the conquest of Milan. He had been observed even to weep at the recital of the military exploits of Gaston de Foix; and these tears of emulation were held to be sure presages of his future valour. He renewed the treaty which Louis had made with Henry; and having left every thing secure behind him, he marched his armies towards the south of France; pretending that his sole purpose was to defend his kingdom against the incursions of the Swiss. This formidable people still retained their animosity against France; and having taken Maximilian duke of Milan under his protection, and in reality reduced him to absolute dependance, they were determined, from views both of honour and interest, to defend him against the invader (f). They fortified themselves in all those vallies of the Alps through which they thought the French must necessarily pass; and when Francis, with great secresy, industry, and perseverance, made his entrance into Piedmont by another passage, they were not dismayed, but descended into the plain, though unprovided with cavalry, and opposed themselves to the progress of the French arms. At Marignan, near Milan, they fought with Francis one of the most furious and best contested battles that is to be met with in the history of these later ages, on the 13th of September, 1515; and it required all the heroism of this prince to inspire his troops with courage sufficient to resist the desperate assault of those mountaineers. After a most obstinate and bloody action in the evening, night and darkness parted the combatants; but next morning the Swiss renewed the attack with unabated ardour; and it was not till they had lost all their bravest troops that they could be prevailed on to retire. The field was strewed with twenty thousand men who were slain on both sides; and the mareschal Trivulzio, who had been present at eighteen pitched battles, declared, "that every engagement which he had yet seen was only the play of children; but that the action of Marignan was a combat of heroes (g)." After this great victory, the conquest of the Milanese was easy and open to the arms of the French.

The success and glory of the French monarch began to excite jealousy in Henry; and his rapid progress, though in so distant a country, was not regarded without apprehensions by the English ministry (h). Henry also thought that he had reason to complain of Francis for sending the duke of Albany into Scotland, and undermining the power and credit of his sister the queen dowager (i). The repairing of the fortifications of Teroüenne was likewise regarded as a breach of treaty. But that which tended most to alienate the court of England, was the disgust which Wolsey had entertained against the French king.

Henry, on the conquest of Tournay, had refused to admit Lewis Gaillart, the bishop elect, to the possession of the temporalities, because that prelate declined taking the oath of allegiance to his new sovereign; and Wolsey was appointed, as above related, administrator of the bishopric. As the cardinal wished to obtain a free and undisturbed enjoyment of his revenue, he applied to Francis, and desired him to bestow on Gaillart some see of equal value in France, and to obtain his resignation of Tournay. Francis, who still hoped to recover possession of that city, and who feared that the full establishment of Wolsey in the bishopric would prove an obstacle to his purpose, had hitherto neglected to gratify the haughty prelate; and the bishop of Tournay, by applying to the court of Rome, had obtained a bull for his settlement in the see. Wolsey, who expected to be indulged in every request, and who exacted respect from the greatest princes, resented the slight put upon him by Francis; and he pushed his master to seek an occasion of quarrel with that monarch (k).

Maximilian the emperor was ready to embrace every overture for a new enterprize; especially if attended with an offer of money, of which he was very greedy, very prodigal, and very indigent. Richard Pace, formerly secretary to cardinal Bambridge, and now secretary of state, was dispatched to the court of Vienna, and had a commission to propose some considerable payments to Maximilian (l): he thence made a journey into Switzerland, and by like motives engaged some of the cantons to furnish troops to the emperor. That prince invaded Italy with a considerable army; but being repulsed from before Milan, he retreated with his army into Germany, made peace with France and Venice, ceded Verona to that republic for a sum of money, and thus excluded himself in some measure from all future access into Italy. And Henry found, that after expending five or six hundred thousand ducats in order to gratify his own and the cardinal's humour, he had only weakened his alliance with Francis, without diminishing the power of that potentate.

There were many reasons which engaged the king not to proceed farther at present in his enmity against France; he could hope for assistance from no power in Europe. Ferdinand, his father-in-law, who had often deceived him, was declining through age and infirmities; and a speedy period was looked for to the long and prosperous reign of that great monarch. Charles prince of Spain, sovereign of the Low Countries, desired nothing but peace with Francis, who had it so much in his power, if provoked, to obstruct his peaceable accession to that rich inheritance which was awaiting him. The pope was overawed by the power of France, and Venice was engaged in a close alliance with that monarchy (m). Henry, therefore, was constrained to remain in tranquillity during some time; and seemed to give himself no concern with regard to the affairs of the continent. In vain did Maximilian endeavour to allure him into some expence, by offering to make a resignation of the imperial crown in his favour. The artifice was too gross to succeed, even with a prince so little politic as Henry; and Pace, his envoy, who was perfectly well acquainted with the emperor's motives and character, gave him warning that the sole view of that prince, in making him so liberal an offer, was to draw money from him (n).

While an universal peace prevailed in Europe, that event occurred which had been so long looked for, and from which such important consequences were expected, viz. the death of Ferdinand the Catholic, which happened in February, 1516 (o), and the succession of his grandson Charles to his extensive dominions. The more Charles advanced in power and authority, the more was Francis sensible of the necessity he himself lay under of gaining the confidence and friendship of Henry; and he took at last the only method by which he could obtain success, the paying of court by presents and flattery to the haughty cardinal.

In the year 1518, Bonnivet, admiral of France, was dispatched to the court of London, and he was directed to employ all his insinuation and address, qualities in which he excelled, to procure himself a place in Wolsey's good graces. After the ambassador had succeeded in his purpose, he took an opportunity of declaring his master's regret, that by mistakes and misapprehensions he had been so unfortunate as to lose a friendship which he so much valued as that of his eminence. Wolsey was not deaf to these honourable advances from so great a monarch; and was thenceforth observed to express himself on all occasions in favour of the French alliance. The more to engage him in his interests, Francis entered into such confidence with him, that he asked his advice even in his most secret affairs; and had recourse to him in all difficult emergencies as to an oracle of wisdom and profound policy. The cardinal made no secret to the king of this private correspondence; and Henry was so prepossessed in favour of the great capacity of his minister, that he said, "he verily believed he would govern Francis as well as himself (p)." Having prepared the way, the admiral acquainted the cardinal, that his master was desirous to recover Tournay; and Wolsey immediately, without hesitation, engaged to effect his purpose. He took an opportunity of representing to the king and council, that Tournay lay so remote from Calais, that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, in case of war, to keep the communication open between these two places: that as it was situated on the frontiers of France and the Netherlands, it was exposed to attacks from both these countries, and must necessarily, either by force or famine, fall into the hands of the first assailant: that even in time of peace it could not be preserved without a large garrison, to restrain the numerous and mutinous inhabitants, ever discontented with the English government: and that the possession of Tournay, as it was thus precarious and expensive, so was it entirely useless, and afforded little or no means of annoying, on occasion, the dominions either of Charles or Francis. These reasons were of themselves convincing, and were sure of meeting with no opposition when they came from the mouth of the cardinal. A treaty, therefore, was entered into for the ceding of Tournay to the French (q).

The French monarch having succeeded so well in this negociation, began to enlarge his views, and to hope for more considerable advantages, by practising on the vanity and self-conceit of the favourite. He redoubled his flatteries to the cardinal, consulted him more frequently in every doubt or difficulty, called him in each letter father, tutor, governor, and professed the most unbounded deference to his advice and opinion. All these caresses were preparatives to a negociation for the delivery of Calais, in consideration of a sum of money to be paid for it; and if we may credit Polydore Virgil, who bears a particular ill-will to Wolsey, on account of his being dispossessed of his employment, and thrown into prison by that minister, so extraordinary a proposal met with a favourable reception from the cardinal. He ventured not, however, to lay the matter before the council: he was content to sound privately the opinion of other ministers, by dropping hints in conversation, as if he thought Calais a useless burden to the kingdom (s): but when he found that all men were strongly rivetted in a contrary persuasion, he thought it dangerous to proceed any farther in his purpose; and as he fell soon after into new connexions with the king of Spain, the great friendship between Francis and him began to suffer a gradual declension.

Wolsey's pride was now farther increased by a great accession of power and dignity. Cardinal Campeggio had been sent as legate into England, in order to procure a tithe from the clergy, for enabling the pope to oppose the progress of the Turks; a danger which was become real, and was formidable to all Christendom, but on which the politics of the court of Rome had built so many interested projects, that it had lost all influence on the minds of men. The clergy refused to comply with Leo's demands: Campeggio was recalled; and the king desired of the pope that Wolsey, who had been joined in this commission, might alone be invested with the legatine power, together with the right of visiting all the clergy and monasteries, and even with suspending all the laws of the church during a twelvemonth (t).

Wolsey, having obtained this new dignity, carried the matter much farther than vain pomp and ostentation. He erected an office, which he called the legatine court; and he was now, by means of the pope's commission and the king's favour, invested with all power, both ecclesiastical and civil, no man knew what bounds were to be set to the authority of his new tribunal. He conferred on it a kind of inquisitorial and censorial powers even over the laity, and directed it to inquire into all matters of conscience; into all conduct which had given scandal; into all actions which, though they escaped the law, might appear contrary to good morals. Offence was taken at this commission, which was really unbounded; and the people were the more disgusted, when they perceived that Wolsey, a man who indulged himself in pomp and pleasure, was so severe in repressing the least appearance of licentiousness in others. And, to render this court still more disagreeable, Wolsey made one John Allen judge in it, a person of scandalous life (u), whom he himself, as chancellor, had, it is said, condemned for perjury; and as it is pretended, that this man either extorted fines from every one whom he pleased to find guilty, or took bribes to drop prosecutions, men concluded, and with some appearance of reason, that he shared with the cardinal those wages of iniquity. The clergy, and in particular the monks, were exposed to the tyranny of this court; and as the libertinism of their lives often gave a just handle against them, they were obliged to purchase an indemnity, by paying large sums of money to the legate or his judge. Not content with this authority, Wolsey pretended, by virtue of his commission, to assume the jurisdiction of all the bishops' courts; particularly that of judging of wills and testaments; and his decisions in those important points were deemed not a little arbitrary. As if he himself were pope, and as if the pope could absolutely dispose of every ecclesiastical preferment, he presented to whatever priories or benefices he pleased, without regard to the right of election in the monks, or of patronage in the nobility and gentry (v).

No one durst to carry the king any complaint against these usurpations of Wolsey, till Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, ventured to inform him of the discontents of his people. Henry professed his ignorance of the whole matter. "A man," said he, "is not so blind any where as in his own house: but do you, father," added he to the primate, "go to Wolsey, and tell him, if any thing be amiss, that he amend it." A reproof of this kind was not likely to be effectual: it only served to augment Wolsey's enmity to Warham: but one London having prosecuted Allen, the legate's judge, in a court of law, and having convicted him of malversation and iniquity, the clamour at last reached the king's ears; and he expressed such displeasure to the cardinal, as made him ever after more cautious in exerting his authority.

While Henry, indulging himself in pleasure and amusement, entrusted the government of his kingdom to this imperious minister, an incident happened abroad, which excited his attention. Maximilian the emperor died on the 12th of January, 1519; a man who, of himself, was indeed of little consequence; but as his death left vacant the first station among Christian princes, it set the passions of men in agitation, and proved a kind of æra in the general system of Europe. The kings of France and Spain immediately declared themselves candidates for the Imperial crown; and employed every expedient of money or intrigue, which promised them success in so great a point of ambition. Henry was also encouraged to advance his pretensions; but his minister, Pace, who was dispatched to the electors, found that he began to solicit too late, and that the votes of all these princes were already pre-engaged either on one side or the other.

Francis and Charles made profession from the beginning of carrying on this rivalship with emulation, but without enmity, and Francis in particular declared, that his brother Charles and he were, fairly and openly, suitors to the same mistress: the more fortunate, added he, will carry her; the other must rest contented (w). But every body apprehended, that this extreme moderation, however reasonable, would not be of long duration; and that incidents would certainly occur to sharpen the minds of the candidates against each other. It was Charles who at (q) In order to give to that measure a more graceful appearance, it was agreed, that the dauphin and the princess Mary, both of them infants, should be betrothed, and that this city should be considered as the dowry of the princess. Such kinds of agreement were then common among sovereigns, though it was very rare that the interests and views of the parties continued so steady as to render the intended marriages effectual. But as Henry had been at considerable expence in building a citadel at Tournay, Francis agreed to pay him six hundred thousand crowns at twelve annual payments, and to put into his hands eight hostages, all of them men of quality, for the performance of the article (r): and lest the cardinal should think himself neglected in these stipulations, Francis promised him a yearly pension of twelve thousand livres, as an equivalent for his administration of the bishopric of Tournay. Hume.

(t) Hereupon Wolsey made a new display of that state and parade to which he was so much addicted. On solemn feast-days he was not content without saying mass after the manner of the pope himself: he had not only bishops and abbots to serve him; but he even engaged the first nobility to give him water and towel. He affected a rank superior to what had ever been claimed by any churchman in England. Warham the primate having written him a letter, in which he subscribed himself your loving brother, Wolsey complained of his presumption in thus challenging an equality with him. When Warham was told what offence he had given, he made light of the matter, "Know ye not," said he, "that this man is drunk with too much prosperity?"

This whole narrative has been copied by all historians from the author here cited: there are many circumstances, however, very suspicious, both because of the obvious partiality of the historian, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed.

length prevailed, to the great disappointment of the French monarch, who still continued to the last in the belief that the majority of the electoral college was engaged in his favour. And as he was some years superior in age to his rival, and, after his victory at Marignan, and conquest of the Milanese, much superior in renown, he could not suppress his indignation, at being thus, in the face of the world, after long and anxious expectation, disappointed in so important a pretension (x).

Henry possessed the felicity of being able, both by the native force of his kingdom and its situation, to hold the balance between these two powers; and had he known how to improve, by policy and prudence, this singular and inestimable advantage, he was really by means of it, a greater potentate than either of those mighty monarchs, who seemed to strive for the dominion of Europe. But this prince was, in his character, heedless, inconsiderate, capricious, impolitic; guided by his passions or his favourite; vain, imperious, haughty; sometimes actuated by friendship for foreign powers, oftener by resentment, seldom by his true interest. And thus, though he exulted in that superiority which his situation in Europe gave him, he never employed it to his own essential and durable advantage, or to that of his subjects.

Francis was well acquainted with Henry's character, and endeavoured to accommodate his conduct to it. He solicited an interview, in 1520, near Calais; in expectation of being able, by familiar conversation, to gain upon his friendship and confidence. Wolsey earnestly seconded this proposal; and hoped, in the presence of both courts, to make parade of his riches, his splendour, and his influence over both monarchs (y). And as Henry himself loved show and magnificence, and had entertained a curiosity of being personally acquainted with the French king, he cheerfully adjusted all the preliminaries of this interview. The nobility of both nations vied with each other in pomp and expence: many of them involved themselves in great debts, and were not able, by the penury of their whole lives, to repair the vain splendour of a few days. The duke of Buckingham, who, though very rich, was somewhat addicted to frugality, finding his preparations for this festival amount to immense sums, threw out some expressions of displeasure against the cardinal, whom he believed to be the author of that measure (z): an imprudence which was not forgotten by this minister.

When Henry had arrived at Canterbury on his way to Calais, he heard that the emperor had landed at Dover on the 25th of May; and he immediately hastened thither with the queen, in order to give a suitable reception to his royal guest. That great prince, politic though young, being informed of the intended interview between Francis and Henry, was apprehensive of the consequences, and was resolved to take the opportunity, in his passage from Spain to the Low Countries, to make the king still a higher compliment, by paying him a visit in his own dominions. Exclusive of the marks of regard and attachment which he gave to Henry, he strove, by every testimony of friendship, by flattery, protestations, promises, and presents, to gain on the vanity, the avarice, and the ambition of the cardinal. He instilled into this aspiring prelate the hope of ascending the papal throne; and as that was the sole point of elevation beyond his present greatness, it was sure to attract his wishes with the same ardour as if fortune had never yet favoured him with any of her presents. Buoying himself up with the idea of reaching that dignity by the emperor's assistance, he secretly devoted himself to that monarch's interests; and Charles was perhaps the more liberal of his promises, because Leo was a very young man: and it was not likely that, for many years, he should be called upon to fulfil his engagements. Henry easily observed this courtship paid to his minister; but instead of taking umbrage at it, he only made it a subject of vanity; and believed that, as his favour was Wolsey's sole support, the obeisance of such mighty monarchs to his servant, was in reality a more conspicuous homage to his own grandeur.

The day of Charles's departure, May the 30th, Henry went over to Calais with the queen and his whole court; and thence proceeded to Guisnes, a small town near the frontiers. Francis, attended in like manner, came to Ardres, a few miles distant; and the two monarchs met, for the first time, in the fields, at a place situated between these two towns, but still within the English pale: for Francis agreed to pay this compliment to Henry, in consideration of that prince's passing the sea that he might be present at the interview. Wolsey, to whom both kings had entrusted the regulation of the ceremonial, contrived this circumstance, in order to do honour to his master (a). The two monarchs, after saluting each other in the most cordial manner, retired into a tent which had been erected on purpose, and they held a secret conference together. Henry here proposed to make some amendments on the articles of their former alliance; and he began to read the treaty, "I Henry king." These were the first words; and he stopped a moment. He subjoined only the words "of England," without adding "France," the usual style of the English monarchs (b). Francis remarked this delicacy, and expressed by a smile, his approbation of it.

He soon took an opportunity of paying a compliment to Henry of a more flattering nature. That generous prince, full of honour himself, and incapable of distrusting others, was shocked at all the precautions which were observed, whenever he had an interview with the English monarch: the number of their guards and attendants were carefully reckoned on both sides: every step was scrupulously measured and adjusted: and if the two kings intended to pay a visit to the queens, they departed from their respective quarters at the same instant, which was marked by the firing of a culverin; they passed each other in the middle point between the places; and the moment that Henry entered Ardres, Francis put himself into the hands of the English at Guisnes. In order to break off this tedious ceremonial, which contained so many dishonourable implications, Francis, one day, took with him two gentlemen and a page, and rode directly into Guisnes. The guards were surprised at the presence of the monarch, who called aloud to them, "You are all my prisoners: carry me to your master." Henry was equally astonished at the appearance of Francis; and taking him in his arms, "My brother," said he, "you have here played me the most agreeable trick in the world, and have showed me the full confidence I may place in you: I surrender myself your prisoner from this moment." He took from his neck a collar of pearls worth fifteen thousand angels (c); and putting it about Francis's, begged him to wear it for the sake of his prisoner. Francis agreed, but on condition that Henry should wear a bracelet, of which he made him a present, and which was double in value to the collar (d). The king went next day to Ardres, without guards or attendants; and confidence being now fully established between the monarchs, they employed the rest of the time entirely in tournaments and festivals.

A defiance had been sent by the two kings to each other's court, and through all the chief cities in Europe, (x) From this competition, as much as from opposition of interests, arose that emulation between those two great monarchs; which, while it kept their whole age in movement, sets them in so remarkable a contrast to each other: both of them were princes endowed with talents and abilities; brave, aspiring, active, warlike; beloved by their servants and subjects, dreaded by their enemies, and respected by all the world: Francis, open, frank, liberal, munificent, carrying these virtues to an excess which prejudiced his affairs: Charles, political, close, artful, frugal; better qualified to obtain success in wars and in negociations, especially the latter. The one the more amiable man; the other the greater monarch. The king, from his oversight and indiscretions, naturally exposed to misfortunes; but qualified by his spirit and magnanimity, to extricate himself from them with honour: the emperor, by his designing interested character, fitted, in his greatest successes, to excite jealousy and opposition even among his allies, and to rouse up a multitude of enemies in the place of one whom he had subdued. And as the personal qualities of these princes counterpoised each other, so did the advantages and disadvantages of their dominions. Fortune alone, without the concurrence of prudence or valour, never reared up, of a sudden, so great a power as that which centered in the emperor Charles. He reaped the succession of Castile, of Arragon, of Austria, of the Netherlands: he inherited the conquest of Naples, of Grenada: election entitled him to the empire: even the bounds of the globe seemed to be enlarged a little before his time, that he might possess the whole treasure, as yet entire and unrifled, of the new world. But though the concurrence of all these advantages formed an empire, greater and more extensive than any known in Europe since that of the Romans, the kingdom of France alone, being close, compact, united, rich, populous, and being interposed between the provinces of the emperor's dominions, was able to make a vigorous opposition to his progress, and maintain the contest against him.

importing,

importing, that Henry and Francis, with fourteen aids, would be ready, in the plains of Picardy, to answer all comers that were gentlemen, at tilt, tournament, and barriers. The monarchs, in order to fulfil this challenge, advanced into the field on horseback, Francis surrounded with Henry's guards, and Henry with those of Francis. They were gorgeously apparelled; and were both of them the most comely personages of their age, as well as the most expert in every military exercise. They carried away the prize at all trials in those rough and dangerous pastimes; and several horses and riders were overthrown by their vigour and dexterity. The ladies were the judges in these feats of chivalry, and put an end to the rencounter, whenever they judged it expedient. Henry erected a spacious house of wood and canvas, which had been framed in London; and he there feasted the French monarch. He had placed a motto on this fabric, under the figure of an English archer embroidered on it, "Cui adhæreo præst;"—"He prevails whom I favour (e):" expressing his own situation, as holding in his hands the balance of power among the potentates of Europe. In these entertainments, more than in any serious business, did the two kings pass their time, till their departure from each other on the 24th of June.

Henry paid then a visit to the emperor and Margaret of Savoy, at Gravelines, and engaged them to go along with him to Calais, and pass some days in that fortress. The artful and politic Charles here completed the impression, which he had begun to make on Henry and his favourite, and effaced all the friendship to which the frank and generous nature of Francis had given birth. As the house of Austria began sensibly to take the ascendant over the French monarchy, the interests of England required, that some support should be given to the latter, and, above all, that any important wars should be prevented, which might bestow on either of them a decided superiority over the other. But the jealousy of the English against France has usually prevented a cordial union between these nations: and Charles, sensible of this hereditary animosity, and desirous farther to flatter Henry's vanity, had made him an offer (an offer in which Francis was afterwards obliged to concur,) that he should be entirely arbiter in any dispute or difference that might arise between the monarchs. But the master-piece of Charles's politics was the securing of Wolsey in his interests, by very important services, and still higher promises. He renewed assurances of assisting him in obtaining the papacy; and he put him in present possession of the revenues belonging to the sees of Badajox and Placencia in Castile. The acquisitions of Wolsey were now become so exorbitant, that, joined to the pensions from foreign powers, which Henry allowed him to possess, his revenues were computed nearly equal to those which belonged to the crown itself; and he spent them with a magnificence, or rather an ostentation, which gave general offence to the people, and even lessened his master in the eyes of all foreign nations (f).

The violent personal emulation and political jealousy which had taken place between the emperor and the French king soon broke out in hostilities. In 1521 hostilities commenced between the emperor and France; but while these ambitious and warlike princes were acting against each other in almost every part of Europe, they still made professions of the strongest desire of peace; and both of them incessantly carried their complaints to Henry, as to the umpire between them. The king, who pretended to be neutral, engaged them to send their ambassadors to Calais, there to negociate a peace under the mediation of Wolsey and the pope's nuncio. The emperor was well apprised of the partiality of these mediators; and his demands in the conference were so unreasonable, as plainly proved him conscious of the advantage. He required the restitution of Burgundy, a province which many years before had been ceded to France by treaty, and which, if in his possession, would have given him entrance into the heart of that kingdom: and he demanded to be freed from the homage which his ancestors had always done for Flanders and Artois, and which he himself had, by the treaty of Noyon, engaged to renew. On Francis's rejecting these terms, the congress of Calais broke up, and Wolsey, soon after, took a journey to Bruges, where he met with the emperor. He was received with the same state, magnificence, and respect, as if he had been the king of England himself; and he concluded, in his master's name, an offensive alliance with the pope and the emperor against France. He stipulated, that England should next summer invade that kingdom with forty thousand men; and he betrothed to Charles the princess Mary, the king's only child, who had now some prospect of inheriting the crown. This extravagant alliance, which was prejudicial to the interests, and might have proved fatal to the liberty and independence of the kingdom, was the result of the humours and prejudices of the king, and the private views and expectations of Wolsey.

The people saw every day new instances of the uncontrolled authority of this minister. The duke of Buckingham, constable of England, the first nobleman both for family and fortune in the kingdom, had imprudently given disgust to the cardinal; and it was not long before he found reason to repent of his indiscretion. He seems to have been a man full of levity and rash projects; and being infatuated with judicial astrology, he entertained a commerce with one Hopkins, a Carthusian frier, who encouraged him in the notion of his mounting one day the throne of England. He was descended by a female from the duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Edward III.; and though his claim to the crown was thereby very remote, he had been so unguarded as to let fall some expressions, as if he thought himself best intitled, in case the king should die without issue, to possess the royal dignity. He had not even abstained from threats against the king's life, and had provided himself with arms, which he intended to employ, in case a favourable opportunity should offer. He was committed to the Tower on the 16th of April; was afterwards brought to a trial; and the duke of Norfolk, whose son, the earl of Surrey, had married Buckingham's daughter, was created lord steward, in order to preside at this solemn procedure (g). The jury consisted of a duke, a marquis, seven earls, and twelve barons; and they gave their verdict against Buckingham, which was carried into execution on the 17th of May. There is no reason to think the sentence unjust (h); but as Buckingham's crimes seem to proceed more from indiscretion than deliberate malice, the people, who loved him, expected that the king would grant him a pardon, and imputed their disappointment to the animosity and revenge of the cardinal. The king's own jealousy, however, of all persons allied to the crown, was, notwithstanding his undoubted title, very remarkable during the whole course of his reign; and was alone sufficient to render him implacable against Buckingham. The office of constable, which this nobleman inherited from the Bohuns, earls of Hereford, was forfeited, and was never after revived in England.

During some years, particularly from 1515 to the present times, many parts of Europe had been agitated with those religious controversies which produced the reformation, one of the greatest events in history: but as it was not till this time that the king of England publicly took part in the quarrel, we had no occasion to give any account of its rise and progress. It will now be necessary to explain these theological disputes; or, what is more material, to trace from their origin those abuses which so generally diffused the opinion, that a reformation of the church, or ecclesiastical order, was become highly expedient, if not absolutely necessary. We shall be better enabled to comprehend the subject, if we take the matter a little higher, and reflect a moment on the reasons why there must be an ecclesiastical order and a public establishment of religion in every civilized community. The importance of the present occasion will excuse this short digression.

Most of the arts and professions in a state are of such a nature, that, while they promote the interests of the society, they are also useful or agreeable to some individuals; and in that case, the constant rule of the magistrate, except, perhaps, on the first introduction of any art, is, to leave the profession to itself, and trust its encouragement to those who reap the benefit of it. The artizans, finding their profits to rise by the favour of their customers, increase, as much as possible, their skill and industry; and as matters are not disturbed by any injudicious tampering, the commodity is always sure to be at all times nearly proportioned to the demand.

(e) Mezeray. (f) Polydore Virgil. Hall.

(g) When the sentence was pronounced against the duke of Buckingham, and the high steward mentioned the word Traitor, the unhappy prisoner could no longer contain his indignation: "My lords," cried he to the judges, "I am no traitor; and, for what you have now done against me, take my sincere forgiveness. As for my life, I think it not worth the trouble of a petition. May God forgive you, and pity me."

(h) Herbert. Hall. Stowe, 513. Hollingshed, p. 862.

But there are also some callings which, though useful and even necessary in a state, bring no particular advantage or pleasure to any individual; and the supreme power is obliged to alter its conduct with regard to the retainers of those professions. It must give them public encouragement in order to their subsistence; and it must provide against that negligence, to which they will naturally be subject, either by annexing peculiar honours to the profession, by establishing a long subordination of ranks and a strict dependence, or by some other expedient. The persons employed in the finances, armies, fleets, and magistracy, are instances of this order of men.

It may naturally be thought, at first sight, that the ecclesiastics belong to the first class, and that their encouragement, as well as that of lawyers and physicians, may safely be entrusted to the liberality of individuals, who are attached to their doctrines, and who find benefit or consolation from their spiritual ministry and assistance. Their industry and vigilance will, no doubt, be whetted by such an additional motive; and their skill in the profession, as well as their address in governing the minds of the people, must receive daily increase, from their increasing practice, study, and attention.

But if we consider the matter more closely, we shall find, that this interested diligence of the clergy is what every wise legislator will study to prevent; because in every religion, except the true, it is highly pernicious, and it has even a natural tendency to pervert the true, by infusing into it a strong mixture of superstition, folly, and delusion. Each ghostly practitioner, in order to render himself more precious and sacred in the eyes of his retainers, will inspire them with the most violent abhorrence of all other sects, and continually endeavour, by some novelty, to excite the languid devotion of his audience. No regard will be paid to truth, morals, or decency, in the doctrines inculcated. Every tenet will be adopted that best suits the disorderly affections of the human frame. Customers will be drawn to each conventicle by new industry and address, in practising on the passions and credulity of the populace. And in the end, the civil magistrate will find, that he has dearly paid for his pretended frugality, in saving a fixed establishment for the priests; and that in reality the most decent and advantageous composition, which he can make with the spiritual guides, is to bribe their indolence, by assigning stated salaries to their profession, and rendering it superfluous for them to be farther active, than merely to prevent their flock from straying in quest of new pastures. And in this manner ecclesiastical establishments, though commonly they arose at first from religious views, prove in the end advantageous to the political interests of society.

But we may observe, that few ecclesiastical establishments have been fixed upon a worse foundation than that of the church of Rome, or have been attended with circumstances more hurtful to the peace and happiness of mankind. The large revenues, privileges, immunities, and powers of the clergy rendered them formidable to the civil magistrate, and armed with too extensive authority an order of men, who always adhere closely together, and who never want a plausible pretence for their encroachments and usurpations. The higher dignities of the church served, indeed, to the support of gentry and nobility; but by the establishment of monasteries, many of the lowest vulgar were taken from the useful arts, and maintained in those receptacles of sloth and ignorance. The supreme head of the church was a foreign potentate, guided by interests always different from those of the community, sometimes contrary to them. And as the hierarchy was necessarily solicitous to preserve an unity of faith, rites, and ceremonies, all liberty of thought ran a manifest risk of being extinguished; and violent persecutions, or, what was worse, a stupid and abject credulity, took place every where.

To increase these evils, the church, though she possessed large revenues, was not contented with her acquisitions, but retained a power of practising farther on the ignorance of mankind. She even bestowed on each individual priest a power of enriching himself by the voluntary oblations of the faithful, and left him still an urgent motive for diligence and industry in his calling. And thus, that church, though an expensive and burthensome establishment, was liable to many of the inconveniences which belong to an order of priests trusting entirely to their own art and invention for attaining a subsistence.

The advantages attending the Romish hierarchy were but a small compensation for its inconveniences. The ecclesiastical privileges during barbarous times had served as a cheque on the despotism of kings. The union of all the western churches under the supreme pontiff facilitated the intercourse of nations, and tended to bind all the parts of Europe into a close connexion with each other. And the pomp and splendour of worship which belonged to so opulent an establishment, contributed in some respect to the encouragement of the fine arts, and began to diffuse a general elegance of taste, by uniting it with religion.

It will easily be conceived, that though the balance of evil prevailed in the Romish church, this was not the chief reason which produced the reformation. A concurrence of incidents must have contributed to forward that great revolution.

Leo X. by his generous and enterprizing temper, had much exhausted his treasury, and was obliged to employ every invention which might yield money, in order to support his projects, pleasures, and liberalities. The scheme of selling indulgences was suggested to him, as an expedient which had often served in former times to draw money from the Christian world, and make devout people willing contributors to the grandeur and riches of the court of Rome. The church, it was supposed, was possessed of a great stock of merit, as being entitled to all the good works of all the saints, beyond what were employed in their own justification; and even to the merits of Christ himself, which were infinite and unbounded: and from this unexhausted treasury the pope might retail particular portions, and by that traffic acquire money, to be employed in pious purposes, in resisting the infidels or subduing schismatics. When the money came into his exchequer, the greater part of it was usually diverted to other purposes (i).

It is commonly believed that Leo, from the penetration of his genius, and his familiarity with ancient literature, was fully acquainted with the ridicule and falsity of the doctrines which, as supreme pontiff, he was obliged by his interest to promote: it is the less wonder, therefore, that he employed for his profit those pious frauds which his predecessors, the most ignorant and credulous, had always, under plausible pretences, made use of for their selfish purposes. He published the sale of a general indulgence in 1517; and as his expences had not only exhausted his usual revenue, but even anticipated the money expected from this extraordinary expedient, the several branches of it were openly given away to particular persons, who were entitled to levy the imposition. The produce, particularly of Saxony and the countries bordering on the Baltic, was assigned to his sister Magdalene, married to Cibo, natural son of Innocent VIII. and she, in order to enhance her profit, had farmed out the revenue to one Arcemboldi, a Genoese, once a merchant, now a bishop, who still retained all the lucrative arts of his former profession (k). The Austin friers had usually been employed in Saxony to preach the indulgences, and from this trust had derived both profit and consideration: but Arcemboldi, fearing lest practice might have taught them means to secrete the money (l), and expecting no extraordinary success from the ordinary methods of collection, gave this occupation to the Dominicans. These monks, in order to prove themselves worthy of the distinction conferred on them, exaggerated the benefits of indulgences by the most unbounded panegyrics; and advanced doctrines on that head which, though not more ridiculous than those already received, were not as yet entirely familiar to the ears of the people. To add to the scandal, the collectors of this revenue are said to have lived very licentious lives, and to have spent in taverns, gaming-houses, and places still more infamous, the money which devout persons had saved from their usual expences, in order to purchase a remission of their sins (m).

All these circumstances might have given offence, but would have been attended with no event of any importance, had there not arisen a man qualified to take advantage of the incident. Martin Luther, an Austin frier, professor in the university of Wittemberg, resenting the affront put upon his order, began to preach against these abuses in the sale of indulgences (n); and he proceeded even even to decry indulgences themselves; and was thence carried, by the heat of dispute, to question the authority of the pope, from which his adversaries derived their chief arguments against him (o). Still as he enlarged his reading, in order to support these tenets, he discovered some new abuse or error in the church of Rome; and finding his opinions gain ground among the people, he promulgated them by writing, discourse, sermon, conference; and daily increased the number of his disciples. All Saxony, all Germany, all Europe, were in a very little time filled with the voice of Luther; and men, roused from that lethargy in which they had so long been slumbering, began to call in question the most ancient and most received opinions of the church of Rome. The elector of Saxony, favourable to Luther's doctrine, protected him from the violence of the papal jurisdiction: the republic of Zurich even reformed their church according to the new model: many sovereigns of the empire, and the Imperial diet itself, showed a favourable disposition towards it: and Luther, a man naturally inflexible and vehement, was become incapable, either from promises of advancement or terrors of severity, to relinquish a sect of which he was himself the founder, and which brought him a glory superior to all others, the glory of dictating the religious faith and principles of multitudes.

The rumour of these innovations soon reached England; and as there still subsisted in that kingdom great remains of the Lollards, whose principles resembled those of Luther, the new doctrines secretly gained many partizans among the laity of all ranks and denominations. But Henry had been educated in a strict attachment to the church of Rome, and he bore a particular prejudice against Luther, who in his writings spoke with contempt of Thomas Aquinas, the king's favourite author: he opposed himself, therefore, to the progress of the Lutheran tenets, by all the influence which his extensive and almost absolute authority conferred upon him: he even undertook to combat them with weapons not usually employed by monarchs, especially those in the flower of their age and force of their passions. He wrote a book in Latin against the principles of Luther; a performance which, if allowance be made for the subject and the age, does no discredit to his capacity. He sent a copy of it to Leo, who received so magnificent a present with great testimony of regard; and conferred on him the title of "Defender of the Faith;" an appellation still retained by the kings of England. Luther, who was in the heat of controversy, soon published an answer to Henry; and, without regard to the dignity of his antagonist, treated him with all the acrimony of style to which in the course of his polemics he had so long been accustomed. The king by this ill usage was still more prejudiced against the new doctrines; but the public, who naturally favour the weaker party, were inclined to attribute to Luther the victory in the dispute (p). And as the controversy became more illustrious by Henry's entering the lists, it drew still more the attention of mankind; and the Lutheran doctrine daily acquired new converts in every part of Europe; but more particularly in Germany.

The rapid and surprising progress of Lutheranism, may justly in part be ascribed to the late invention of printing, and revival of learning: not that reason bore any considerable share in opening men's eyes with regard to the impostures of the Romish church: for of all branches of literature philosophy had, as yet, and till long afterwards, made the most inconsiderable progress; neither is there any instance that argument has ever been able to free the people from that enormous load of absurdity with which superstition has every where overwhelmed them: not to mention, that the quick advancement of the Lutheran doctrine, and the violence with which it was embraced, prove sufficiently that it owed not its success to reason and reflection. The art of printing and the revival of learning forwarded its progress in another manner. By means of that art the books of Luther and his sectaries were propagated more quickly, and in greater numbers. The minds of men, somewhat awakened from a profound sleep of so many centuries, were prepared for every novelty, and scrupled less to tread in any unusual path which was opened to them. And as copies of the scriptures and other ancient monuments of the Christian faith became more common, men perceived the innovations which were introduced after the first centuries; and though argument and reasoning could not give conviction, an historical fact, well supported, was able to make impression on their understandings. Many of the powers, indeed, assumed by the church of Rome, were very ancient, and were prior to almost every political government established in Europe: but as the ecclesiastics would not agree to possess their privileges as matters of civil right, which time might render valid, but appealed still to a divine origin, men were tempted to look into their primitive charter; and they could, without much difficulty, perceive its defect in truth and authenticity.

In order to bestow on this topic the greater influence, Luther and his followers, not satisfied with opposing the pretended divinity of the Romish church, and displaying the temporal inconveniencies of that establishment, carried matters much farther, and justly treated the religion of their ancestors as abominable, detestable, damnable; foretold by sacred writ itself as the source of all wickedness and pollution. They rightly denominated the pope antichrist, called his communion the scarlet whore, and gave to Rome the appellation of Babylon; expressions which, however applied, were to be found in scripture, and which were better calculated to operate on the multitude than the most solid arguments of a different nature. Excited by contest and persecution on the one hand, by success and applause on the other, many of the reformers carried to the greatest extremity their opposition to the church of Rome; and in contradiction to the multiplied superstitions with which that communion was loaded, they adopted an enthusiastic strain of devotion, which admitted of no observances, rites, or ceremonies, but placed all merit in a mysterious species of faith, inward vision, rapture, and ecstacy. The new sectaries, seized with this spirit, were indefatigable in the propagation of their doctrine, and set at defiance all the anathemas and punishments with which the Roman pontiff endeavoured to overwhelm them.

That the civil power, however, might afford them protection against the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the Lutherans advanced doctrines favourable in some respect to the temporal authority of sovereigns. They inveighed against the abuses of the court of Rome, with which men were at that time generally discontented; and they exhorted princes to reinstate themselves in those powers of which the encroaching spirit of the ecclesiastics, especially of the sovereign pontiff, had so long bereaved them. They condemned celibacy and monastic vows, and thereby opened the doors of the convents to those who were either tired of the obedience and chastity, or disgusted with the license in which they had hitherto lived. They blamed the excessive riches, the idleness, the libertinism of the clergy; and pointed out their treasures and revenues as lawful spoil to the first invader. And as the ecclesiastics had hitherto conducted a willing and a stupid audience, and were totally unacquainted with controversy, much more with every species of true literature, they were unable to defend themselves against men armed with authorities, quotations, and popular topics, and qualified to triumph in every altercation or debate. Such were the advantages with which the reformers began their attack on the Romish hierarchy; and such were the causes of their rapid and astonishing success.

Leo X. whose oversights and too supine trust in the profound ignorance of the people, had given rise to this sect, but whose sound judgement, moderation, and temper, were well qualified to retard its progress, died in the flower of his age, a little after he received the king's book against Luther, on the 1st of December, 1521; and he was succeeded in the papal chair by Adrian, a Fleming, who had been tutor to the emperor Charles. This man was fitted to gain on the reformers by the integrity, candour, and simplicity of manners which distinguished his character; but so violent were their prejudices against the church, he rather hurt the cause by his imprudent exercise of those virtues. He frankly confessed, that many abominable and detestable practices prevailed in the court of Rome; and by this sincere avowal he gave occasion of much triumph to the Lutherans. This pontiff also, whose penetration was not equal to his good intentions, was seduced to concur in that league which Charles and Henry had formed against France (q); and he thereby augmented the scandal occasioned by the practice of so many preceding popes, who still made their spiritual arms subservient to political purposes.

poses (r). The emperor Charles, who knew that Wolsey had received a disappointment in his ambitious hopes by the election of Adrian, and who dreaded the resentment of that haughty minister, was solicitous to repair the breach made in their friendship by this incident. He paid another visit to England; where he landed on the 26th of May, 1522; and besides flattering the vanity of the king and the cardinal, he renewed to Wolsey all the promises which he had made him, of seconding his pretensions to the papal throne. Wolsey, sensible that Adrian's great age and infirmities promised a speedy vacancy, dissembled his resentment, and was willing to hope for a more prosperous issue to the next election. The emperor renewed the treaty made at Bruges, to which some articles were added; and he agreed to indemnify both the king and Wolsey for the revenue which they should lose by a breach with France. The more to ingratiate himself with Henry and the English nation, he gave to Surrey, admiral of England, a commission for being admiral of his dominions; and he himself was installed knight of the garter at London. After a stay of six weeks in England, he embarked at Southampton, and in ten days arrived in Spain, where he soon pacified the tumults which had arisen in his absence (s).

In the spring of this year, the king declared war against France; and this measure was founded on so little reason, that he could allege nothing as a ground of quarrel, but Francis's refusal to submit to his arbitration, and his sending Albany into Scotland. This last step had not been taken by the French king, till he was quite assured of Henry's resolution to attack him. Surrey sailed with such forces as were ready, ravaged the coast of Normandy; landed some troops at Cherbourg; and after laying waste part of that country, he sailed to Morlaix, a rich town in Britanny, which he took and plundered. The English merchants had great property in that place, which was no more spared by the soldiers than the goods of the French. Surrey then left the charge of the fleet to the vice-admiral, and sailed to Calais, where he took the command of the English army destined for the invasion of France. This army, when joined by forces from the Low Countries, under the command of the count de Buren, amounted in the whole to eighteen thousand men.

The French had made it a maxim in almost all their wars with the English since the reign of Charles V. never without great necessity to hazard a general engagement; and the duke of Vendôme, who commanded the French army, now embraced this wise policy. He supplied the towns most exposed, especially Boulogne, Montreuil, Teroüenne, Hedin, with strong garrisons and plenty of provisions: he himself took post at Abbeville, with some Swiss and French infantry, and a body of cavalry: the count of Guise encamped under Montreuil with six thousand men. These two bodies were in a situation to join upon occasion; to throw supply into any town that was threatened; and to harass the English in every movement. Surrey, not being provided with magazines, first divided his troops for the convenience of subsisting them; but finding that his quarters were every moment beaten up by the activity of the French generals, he drew together his forces, and laid siege to Hedin. He did not, however, succeed in this enterprize. The garrison made vigorous sallies upon his army; the French forces assaulted him from without; great rains fell; fatigue and bad weather threw the soldiers into dysenteries; and Surrey was obliged to raise the siege, and put his troops into winter-quarters about the end of October. His rear-guard was attacked at Pas, in Artois, and five or six hundred men were cut off; nor could all his efforts make him master of one place within the French frontier.

The allies were more successful in Italy; Lautrec, who commanded the French, lost a great battle at Bicocca near Milan, and was obliged to retire with the remains of his army. This misfortune, which proceeded from Francis's negligence in not supplying Lautrec with money (t), was followed by the loss of Genoa. After this battle the castle of Cremona was the sole fortress which remained in the hands of the French in Italy.

Europe was now in such a situation, and so connected by different alliances and interests, that it was almost impossible for war to be kindled in one part, and not diffuse itself throughout the whole: but of all the leagues among kingdoms, the closest was that which had so long subsisted between France and Scotland; and the English, while at war with the former nation, could not hope to remain long unmolested on the northern frontier. No sooner had Albany arrived in Scotland, than he took measures for kindling a war with England; and he summoned the whole force of the kingdom to meet in the fields of Rosline (u). He thence conducted the army southwards into Annandale; and prepared to pass the borders at Solway Frith. But many of the nobility were disgusted with the regent's administration; and observing that his connexions with Scotland were feeble in comparison of those which he maintained with France, they murmured that, for the sake of foreign interests, their peace should so often be disturbed, and war during their king's minority be wantonly entered into with a neighbouring nation, so much superior in force and riches. The Gordons, in particular, refused to advance any farther; and Albany, observing a general discontent to prevail, was obliged to conclude a truce with lord Dacres, warden of the English west marches. Soon after he departed for France; and lest the opposite faction should gather force in his absence, he sent thither before him the earl of Angus, husband to the queen-dowager.

The following year, 1523, Henry, that he might take advantage of the regent's absence, marched an army into Scotland under the command of Surrey, who ravaged the Merse and Teviotdale without opposition, and burned the town of Jedburgh. The Scots had neither king nor regent to conduct them; the two Humes had been put to death; Angus was in a manner banished by being sent into France before the departure of the duke of Albany; no nobleman of vigour or authority remained, who was qualified to assume the government; and the English monarch, who knew the distressed situation of the country, determined to push them to extremity, in hopes of engaging them, by the sense of their present weakness, to make a solemn renunciation of the French alliance, and to embrace that of England (v). He even gave them hopes of contracting a marriage between the lady Mary, heiress of England, and their young monarch; an expedient which would for ever unite the two kingdoms (w); and the queen-dowager, with her whole party, recommended every where the advantages of this alliance, and of a confederacy with Henry. She, together with her party, declared, that the interest of Scotland had too long been sacrificed to those of the French nation, who, whenever they found themselves reduced to difficulties, called for the assistance of their allies; but were ready to abandon them so soon as they found their advantage in making peace with England: that where a small state entered into so close a confederacy with a greater, it must always expect this treatment, as a consequence of the unequal alliance; but there were peculiar circumstances in the situation of the kingdoms which in the present case rendered it inevitable: that France was so distant and so divided from them by sea, that she scarcely could by any means, and never could in time, send succours to the Scots, sufficient to protect them against ravages from the neighbouring kingdom; that nature had in a manner formed an alliance between the two British nations; having inclosed them in the same island; given them the same manners, language, laws, and form of government; and prepared every thing for an intimate union between them: and that if national antipathies were abolished, which would soon be the effect of peace, these two kingdoms, secured by the ocean and by their domestic force, could set at defiance all foreign enemies, and remain for ever safe and unmolested.

The partizans of the French alliance, on the other hand, said, that the very reasons which were urged in favour of a league with England, the vicinity of the kingdom and its superior force, were the real causes why a sincere and durable confederacy could never be formed with that hostile nation: that among neighbouring states occasions of quarrel were frequent; and the more powerful would be sure to seize every frivolous pretence for oppressing the weaker, and reducing it to subjection: that as the near neighbourhood of France and England had kindled a war almost perpetual between them, it was the interest of the (r) We have thought it necessary to give in this place an outline of the circumstances which led to the Reformation; but as such an abstract account of so important an event would not be satisfactory to many of our readers, we shall prosecute the subject more at length in our next Chapter on Ecclesiastical Affairs.

Scots,

Scots, if they wished to maintain their independence, to preserve their league with the former kingdom, which balanced the force of the latter: that if they deserted that old and salutary alliance, on which their importance in Europe chiefly depended, their ancient enemies, stimulated both by interest and by passion, would soon invade them with superior force, and bereave them of all their liberties: or if they delayed the attack, the insidious peace, by making the Scots forget the use of arms, would only prepare the way for a slavery more certain and more irretrievable (x).

The arguments employed by the French party, being seconded by the natural prejudices of the people, seemed most prevalent; and when the duke of Albany himself, who had been long detained beyond his appointed time by the danger from the English fleet, at last returned to Scotland, and appeared among them, he was able to throw the balance entirely on that side. By authority of the convention of states he assembled an army, with a view of avenging the ravages committed by the English in the beginning of the campaign; and he led them southwards towards the borders of the two kingdoms: but when they were passing the Tweed at the bridge of Melross, the English party raised again such opposition, that Albany thought proper to retreat. He marched along the banks of the Tweed, keeping that river on his right; and fixed his camp opposite to Werk Castle, which Surrey had lately repaired. He sent some troops to besiege this fortress, who made a breach in it, and stormed some of the outworks: but the regent, hearing of the approach of an English army, and discouraged by the advanced season, thought proper to disband his forces, and retire to Edinburgh. Soon after he went over to France, and never again returned to Scotland. The Scottish nation, agitated by their domestic factions, were not during several years in a condition to give any more disturbance to England; and Henry had full leisure to prosecute his designs on the continent.

We must not pass over the general survey which Henry caused to be made of the whole kingdom, in 1522. The vast sums of money which Henry the Seventh had left were all spent in dissipation; and the revenues of the crown were inadequate to the ordinary charges of government; so that his military enterprizes were entirely to be provided for. With a pecuniary view he ordered accounts to be taken of the numbers of men, their years, profession, stock, revenue (y); and expressed great satisfaction on finding the nation so opulent. He then issued privy seals to the most wealthy, demanding loans of particular sums: this act of power, though somewhat irregular and tyrannical, had been formerly practised by kings of England; and the people were now familiarized to it. But Henry this year carried his authority much farther. He published an edict for a general tax upon his subjects, which he still called a loan; and he levied five shillings in the pound upon the clergy, two shillings upon the laity. This pretended loan, as being more regular, was really more dangerous to the liberties of the people; and was a precedent for the king's imposing taxes without consent of parliament.

Wolsey having found that this illegal mode of raising money had excited murmurs of discontent among the people, now advised the king to convoke a parliament; which accordingly met at Black Friers, on the 15th of April, 1523. A convocation of the clergy was also summoned at the same time. Wolsey, who had undertaken the management of the affair, began with the convocation, in hopes that their example would influence the parliament to grant a large supply. He demanded a moiety of the ecclesiastical revenues to be levied in five years, or two shillings in the pound during that time; and though he met with opposition from the bishops of Winchester and Rochester, he reprimanded the refractory members in such severe terms, that his request was at last complied with. The cardinal afterwards, attended by several of the nobility and prelates, came to the house of commons; and in a long and elaborate speech laid before them the public necessities, the danger of an invasion from Scotland, the affronts received from France, the league in which the king was engaged with the pope and the emperor; and he demanded a grant of eight hundred thousand pounds, divided into four yearly payments; a sum computed, from the late survey or valuation, to be equal to four shillings in the pound of one year's revenue, or one shilling in the pound yearly, according to the division proposed (z). So large a grant was unusual from the commons; and though the cardinal's demand was seconded by sir Thomas More the speaker, and several other members attached to the court, the house could not be prevailed with to comply (a). They only voted two shillings in the pound on all who enjoyed twenty pounds a year and upwards; one shilling on all who possessed between twenty pounds and forty shillings a year; and on the other subjects above sixteen years of age, a groat a-head. This last sum was divided into two yearly payments; the former into four; and was not, therefore, at the utmost above six-pence in the pound. The grant of the commons was but the moiety of the sum demanded; and the cardinal, therefore, much mortified with the disappointment, came again to the house, and desired to reason with such as refused to comply with the king's request. He was told, that it was a rule of the house never to reason but among themselves; and his desire was rejected. The commons, however, somewhat enlarged their former grant, and voted an imposition of three shillings in the pound on all possessed of fifty pounds a-year and upwards (b). The king was so dissatisfied with this saving disposition of the commons, that as he had not called a parliament during seven years before, he allowed seven more to elapse before he summoned another: and, on pretence of necessity, he levied in one year, from all who were worth forty pounds, what the parliament had granted him payable in four years (c); a new invasion of national privileges. These irregularities were commonly ascribed, though probably not without some prejudice, to the cardinal's counsels, who, trusting to the protection afforded him by his ecclesiastical character, was the less scrupulous in his encroachments on the civil rights of the nation.

The ambitious cardinal received this year a new disappointment in his aspiring views. Pope Adrian the Sixth died; and the cardinal de Medici, renewing his pretensions to the papal dignity, was elected in his place, with the concurrence of the emperor, and assumed the title of Clement the Seventh. Henry, on receiving intelligence of Adrian's death, wrote to the emperor, reminding him of his engagements to second the claims of his minister. Wolsey, too, exerted himself with activity suitable to the importance of the prize for which he contended; and instructed his agents at Rome to spare neither promises nor bribes in order to gain his end: but Charles had either amused him with vain hopes, which he never intended to gratify, or he judged it impolitic to oppose a candidate whose prospect of success was so great as that of Medici; or, perhaps, the cardinals durst not venture to provoke the people of Rome, while their indignation against Adrian's memory was still fresh, by placing another foreigner on the papal throne. Wolsey, after all his expectations and endeavours, had the mortification to see a pope elected of such an age and constitution, that he could derive but little consolation from the hope of surviving him. This second proof fully convinced Wolsey of the emperor's insincerity, and it excited in him all the resentment which a haughty mind experiences on being at once disappointed and deceived; and, though Clement endeavoured to soothe his vindictive nature by granting him a commission to be legate in England during life, (z) This survey or valuation, says Mr. Hume, is liable to much suspicion, as fixing the rents a great deal too high; unless the sum comprehend the revenues of all kinds, industry as well as land and money. Notwithstanding that historian's suspicion, we see no reason to doubt it, especially when we think of the income and property taxes of the present day.

(b) The following anecdote of Henry the Eighth is well attested: when that monarch heard that the commons made a great difficulty of granting the supply he demanded, he was so provoked that he sent for Edward Montague, one of the members who had a considerable influence on the house; and he being introduced to his majesty, had the mortification to hear him speak in these terms: "Ho! man! will they not suffer my bill to pass?" And laying his hand on Montague's head, who was then on his knees before him, he further said, "Get my bill passed by to-morrow, or else to-morrow this head of yours shall be off." This cavalier manner of Henry succeeded; for the next day the bill was passed. See Collins's British Peerage, and Grove's Life of Wolsey. We are told by Hall, fol. 38. that cardinal Wolsey endeavoured to terrify the citizens of London into the general loan exacted in 1525, and told them plainly, that "it were better that some should suffer indigence than that the king at this time should lack; and therefore beware and resist not, nor ruffle not in this case, for it may fortune to cost some people their heads." Such was the style employed by the king and his ministers.

with such ample powers as vested in him almost the whole papal jurisdiction in this kingdom, the injury he had received entirely dissolved the tie which had united him to the emperor; and from that moment he meditated revenge. It was necessary, however, to conceal his intention from Henry; and to suspend the execution of it until, by a dexterous improvement of the incidents which might occur, he should be able gradually to alienate the king's affections from Charles. For this reason he was so far from expressing any uneasiness on account of the repulse which he had experienced, that on every occasion, public as well as private, he was eager to express his satisfaction with the promotion of Clement (d).

The confederacy against France appeared more formidable than ever on the opening of the campaign (e). Adrian, before his death, had renewed the league with Charles and Henry: the Venetians had been induced to desert the French alliance, and to form engagements for securing Francis Sforza, brother to Maximilian, in possession of the Milanese: the Florentines, the dukes of Ferrara and Mantua, and all the powers of Italy, combined in the same measure: the emperor, in person, menaced France with a powerful invasion on the side of Guienne: the forces of England and the Netherlands hovered over Picardy: a numerous body of Germans were preparing to ravage Burgundy: but all these perils from foreign enemies were less threatening than a domestic conspiracy which had been formed, and which was now come to full maturity, against the French monarch.

Charles duke of Bourbon, constable of France, was a prince of great abilities and the most shining merit; and, besides distinguishing himself in many military enterprizes, he was adorned with every accomplishment which became a person of his high station. His virtues, embellished with the graces of youth, had made such impression on Louise of Savoy, Francis's mother, that, without regard to the inequality of their years, she made him proposals of marriage; and, meeting with a repulse, she formed schemes of unrelenting vengeance against him. She was a woman false, deceitful, vindictive, malicious; but, unhappily for France, had, by her capacity, which was considerable, acquired an absolute ascendant over her son. By her instigation Francis put many affronts on the constable, which it was difficult for a gallant spirit to endure; and, at last, he permitted Louise to prosecute a law-suit against him, by which, on the most frivolous pretences, he was deprived of his ample possessions; and inevitable ruin was brought upon him. Bourbon, provoked at the indignities he received, and thinking that, if any injuries could justify a man in rebelling against his prince and country, he must stand acquitted, had entered into a secret correspondence with the emperor and the king of England (f). Francis, pertinacious in his purpose of recovering the Milanese, had intended to lead his army in person into Italy; and Bourbon, who feigned sickness, in order to have a pretence for staying behind, purposed, as soon as the king should have passed the Alps, to raise an insurrection among his numerous vassals, by whom he was extremely beloved, and to introduce foreign enemies into the heart of the kingdom. Francis got intimation of his design; but, as he was not expeditious enough in securing so dangerous a foe, the constable made his escape (g); and, entering into the emperor's service, employed all the force of his enterprising spirit, and his great talents for war, to the prejudice of his native country.

The king of England, desirous that Francis should undertake his Italian expedition, did not openly threaten Picardy this year with an invasion; and it was not till the 24th of August that the duke of Suffolk, who commanded the English forces, passed over to Calais. He was attended by the lords Montacute, Herbert, Ferrars, Morney, Sandys, Berkeley, Powis, and many other noblemen and gentlemen (h). The English army, reinforced by some troops drawn from the garrison of Calais, amounted to about twelve thousand men; and having joined an equal number of Flemings under the count de Burun, they prepared for an invasion of France. The siege of Boulogne was first proposed; but that enterprize appearing difficult, it was thought more advisable to leave this town behind them. The frontier of Picardy was very ill provided with troops; the only defence of that province was the activity of the French officers, who infested the allied army in their march, and threw garrisons, with great expedition, into every town which was threatened by them. After coasting the Somme, and passing Hedin, Montreüil, Dourlens, the English and Flemings presented themselves before Bray, a place of small force, which commanded a bridge over that river. Here they were resolved to pass, and, if possible, to take up winter-quarters in France; but Crequi threw himself into the town, and seemed resolute to defend it. The allies attacked him with vigour and success; and when he retreated over the bridge, they pursued him so hotly, that they allowed him not time to break it down, but passed it along with him, and totally routed his army. They next advanced to Montdidier, which they besieged, and took by capitulation. Meeting with no opposition, they proceeded to the river Oise, within eleven leagues of Paris, and threw that city into great consternation; till the duke of Vendôme hastened with some forces to its relief. The confederates, afraid of being surrounded, and of being reduced to extremities during so advanced a season, thought proper to retreat. Montdidier was abandoned: and the English and Flemings, without effecting any thing, retired into their respective countries.

France defended herself from the other invasions with equal facility and equal good fortune. Twelve thousand Lansquenets broke into Burgundy under the command of the count of Furstenberg. The count of Guise, who defended that frontier, had nothing to oppose to them but some militia, and about nine hundred heavy-armed cavalry. He threw the militia into the garrison-towns; and with his cavalry he kept the field, and so harassed the Germans, that they were glad to make their retreat into Lorraine. Guise attacked them as they passed the Meuse, put them into disorder, and cut off the greater part of their rear.

The emperor made great preparations on the side of Navarre; and though that frontier was well guarded by nature, it seemed now exposed to danger from the powerful invasion which threatened it. Charles besieged Fontarabia, which a few years before had fallen into Francis's hands; and when he had drawn thither Lautrec, the French general, he of a sudden raised the siege, and sat down before Bayonne. Lautrec, aware of that stratagem, made a sudden march, and threw himself into Bayonne, which he defended with such vigour and courage, that the Spaniards were constrained to raise the siege. The emperor would have been totally unfortunate on this side, had he not turned back upon Fontarabia, and, contrary to the advice of all his generals, sitten down in the winter season before that city, well fortified and strongly garrisoned. The cowardice or misconduct of the governor saved him from the shame of a new disappointment. The place was surrendered in a few days; and the emperor, having finished this enterprize, put his troops into winter quarters.

So obstinate was Francis in prosecuting his Italian expedition, that, notwithstanding these numerous invasions with which his kingdom was menaced on every side, he had determined to lead in person a powerful army to the conquest of Milan. The intelligence of Bourbon's conspiracy and escape stopped him at Lyons; and, fearing some insurrection in the kingdom, from the intrigues of a man so powerful and so much beloved, he thought it prudent to remain in France, and to send forward his army under the command of admiral Bonnivet. The duchy of Milan had been purposely left in a condition somewhat defenceless, with a view of alluring Francis to attack it, and thereby facilitating the enterprizes of Bourbon; and no sooner had Bonnivet passed the Tesino, than the army of the league, and even Prosper Colonna, who commanded it, a prudent general, were in the utmost confusion. It is agreed, that if Bonnivet had immediately advanced to Milan, that great city, on which the whole duchy depends, would have opened its gates without resistance; but as he wasted his time in frivolous enterprizes, Colonna had opportunity to reinforce the garrison, and to put the place in a posture of defence. Bonnivet was now obliged to at-

(d) In some particulars Wolsey made a good use of this extensive power. He erected two colleges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich, the place of his nativity: he sought, all over Europe, for learned men to supply the chairs of these colleges: and, in order to bestow endowments on them, he suppressed some smaller monasteries. The execution of this project became less difficult for him, because the Romish church began to perceive that she overabounded in monks, and that she wanted some supply of learning, in order to oppose the inquisitive, or rather disputative humour of the reformers.

tempt reducing the city by blockade and famine; and he took possession of all the posts which commanded the passages to it. But the army of the league, meanwhile, was not inactive; and they so straitened and harassed the quarters of the French, that it seemed more likely the latter should themselves perish by famine, than reduce the city to that extremity. Sickness and fatigue and want had wasted them to such a degree, that they were ready to raise the blockade; and their only hopes consisted in a great body of Swiss, which was levied for the service of the French king, and whose arrival was every day expected. But these mountaineers no sooner came within sight of the French camp, than they stopped from a sudden caprice and resentment; and, instead of joining Bonnivet, they sent orders to a great body of their countrymen, who then served under him, immediately to begin their march, and to return home in their company (i). After this desertion of the Swiss, Bonnivet had no other choice but that of making his retreat as fast as possible into France.

The French being thus expelled Italy, the pope, the Venetians, the Florentines were satisfied with the advantage obtained over them, and were resolved to prosecute their victory no farther. All these powers, especially Clement, had entertained a violent jealousy of the emperor's ambition; and their suspicions were extremely augmented when they saw him refuse the investiture of Milan, a fief of the empire, to Francis Sforza, whose title he had acknowledged, and whose defence he had embraced (k). They all concluded that he intended to put himself in possession of that important duchy, and reduce Italy to subjection: Clement, in particular, actuated by this jealousy, proceeded so far in opposition to the emperor, that he sent orders to his nuncio at London, in 1524, to mediate a reconciliation between France and England. But affairs were not yet fully ripe for this change. Wolsey, disgusted with the emperor, but still more actuated by vain-glory, was determined that he himself should have the renown of bringing about that great alteration; and he engaged the king to reject the pope's mediation. A new treaty was even concluded between Henry and Charles for the invasion of France. Charles stipulated to supply the duke of Bourbon with a powerful army, in order to conquer Provence and Dauphiny: Henry agreed to pay him a hundred thousand crowns for the first month; after which, he might either chuse to continue the same monthly payments, or invade Picardy with a powerful army before the end of July. Bourbon was to possess these provinces with the title of king; but to hold them in fee of Henry, as lawful king of France. The duchy of Burgundy was to be given to Charles: the rest of the kingdom to Henry (l).

Francis might now have enjoyed, in safety, the glory of repulsing all his enemies, in every attempt which they had hitherto made for invading his kingdom; but, as he received intelligence that the king of England, discouraged by his former fruitless enterprizes, and disgusted with the emperor, was making no preparations for any attempt on Picardy, his ancient ardour seized him for the conquest of Milan; and, notwithstanding the advanced season, he was immediately determined, contrary to the advice of his wisest counsellors, to lead his army into Italy. He passed the Alps at Mount Cenis, and no sooner appeared in Piedmont than he threw the whole Milanese into consternation. The forces of the emperor and Sforza retired to Lodi on the Adda; and had Francis been so fortunate as to pursue them, they had abandoned that place, and had been totally dispersed (m); but his ill fate led him, on the 28th of October, to lay siege to Pavia, a town of considerable strength, well garrisoned, and defended by Leyva, one of the bravest officers in the Spanish service. Every attempt which the French king made to gain this important place proved fruitless. He battered the walls and made breaches; but, by the vigilance of Leyva, new entrenchments were instantly thrown up behind the breaches: he attempted to divert the course of the Tesino, which ran by one side of the city, and defended it; but an inundation of the river destroyed, in one night, all the mounds which the soldiers, during a long time and with infinite labour had been erecting. Fatigue, and the bad season (for it was the depth of winter,) had wasted the French army. The Imperial generals, meanwhile, were not inactive. Pescara and Lannoy, viceroy of Naples, assembled forces from all quarters. Bourbon, having pawned his jewels, went into Germany, and with the money, aided by his personal interest, levied a body of twelve thousand Lansquenets, with which he joined the Imperialists. This whole army advanced to raise the siege of Pavia; and the danger to the French became every day more imminent.

The state of Europe was such, during that age, that partly from want of commerce and industry every where, except in Italy and the Low-Countries, partly from the extensive privileges still possessed by the people in all the great monarchies, and their frugal maxims in granting money, the revenues of the princes were extremely narrow, and even the small armies which they kept on foot could not be regularly paid by them. The Imperial forces commanded by Bourbon, Pescara, and Lannoy, exceeded not twenty thousand men; they were the only body of troops maintained by the emperor (for he had not been able to levy any army for the invasion of France, either on the side of Spain or Flanders). Yet, so poor was that mighty monarch, that he could transmit no money for the payment of this army; and it was chiefly the hopes of sharing the plunder of the French camp which had made them advance, and kept them to their standards. Had Francis raised the siege before their approach, and retired to Milan, they must immediately have disbanded; and he had obtained a complete victory without danger or bloodshed. But it was the character of this monarch to become obstinate in proportion to the difficulties which he encountered; and having once said, that he would take Pavia or perish before it, he was resolved rather to endure the utmost extremities than depart from this resolution.

The Imperial generals, after cannonading the French camp for several days, at last made a general assault, and broke into the intrenchments, on the 24th of February, 1525. Leyva sallied from the town, and increased the confusion among the besiegers. The Swiss infantry, contrary to their usual practice, behaved in a dastardly manner, and deserted their post. Francis's forces were put to rout; and he himself, surrounded by his enemies, after fighting with heroic valour, and killing seven men with his own hand, was at last obliged to surrender himself prisoner. Almost the whole army, full of nobility and brave officers, either perished by the sword, or were drowned in the river. The few who escaped with their lives fell into the hands of the enemy.

The emperor received this news by Pennalosa, who passed through France by means of a safe-conduct, granted him by the captive king. The moderation which Charles displayed on this occasion, had it been sincere, would have done him honour. Instead of rejoicing, he expressed sympathy with Francis's ill fortune, and discovered his sense of those calamities to which the greatest monarchs are exposed (n). He refused the city of Madrid permission to make any public expressions of triumph; and said that he reserved all his exultation till he should be able to obtain some victory over the infidels. He sent orders to his frontier garrisons to commit no hostilities upon France. He spoke of concluding, immediately, a peace on reasonable terms. But all this seeming moderation was only hypocrisy, so much the more dangerous as it was profound. And he was wholly occupied in forming schemes how, from this great incident, he might draw the utmost advantage, and gratify that exorbitant ambition by which, in all his actions, he was ever governed.

The same Pennalosa, in passing through France, carried a letter from Francis to his mother, whom he had left regent, and who then resided at Lyons. It was laconic, but expressive, containing only these few words: "Madame, tout est perdu, hors l'honneur:" that is, "Madam, all is lost, except our honour." The princess was struck with the greatness of this calamity. She saw the kingdom without a sovereign, without an army, without generals, (l) This chimerical partition immediately failed of execution in the article which was most easily performed: Bourbon refused to acknowledge Henry as king of France. His enterprize, however, against Provence still took place. A numerous army of Imperialists invaded that country, under his command and that of the marquis of Pescara. They laid siege to Marseilles, which, being weakly garrisoned, they expected to reduce in a little time: but the citizens defended themselves with such valour and obstinacy, that Bourbon and Pescara, who heard of the French king's approach with a numerous army, found themselves under a necessity of raising the siege; and they led their forces, weakened, baffled, and disheartened, into Italy.

nerals, without money; surrounded on every side by implacable and victorious enemies; and her chief resource, in her present distresses, were the hopes she entertained of peace, and even of assistance from the king of England.

Had the king entered into the war against France from any concerted political views, it is evident that the victory of Pavia and the captivity of Francis were the most fortunate incidents that could have befallen him, and the only ones that could render his schemes effectual. While the war was carried on in the former feeble manner, without any decisive advantage, he might have been able to possess himself of some frontier town, or perhaps of a small territory, of which he could not have kept possession without expending much more than its value. By some signal calamity alone, which annihilated the power of France, could he hope to acquire the dominion of considerable provinces, or dismember that great monarchy, so affectionate to its own government and its own sovereigns. But as it is probable that Henry had never before carried his reflections so far, he was startled at this important event, and became sensible of his own danger, as well as that of all Europe, from the loss of a proper counterpoise to the power of Charles. Instead of taking advantage, therefore, of the distressed condition of Francis, he was determined to lend him assistance in his present calamities; and, as the glory of generosity in raising a fallen enemy concurred with his political interest, he hesitated the less in embracing these new measures.

Some disgusts also had previously taken place between Charles and Henry, and still more between Charles and Wolsey; and that powerful minister waited only for a favourable opportunity of revenging the disappointments which he had met with. The behaviour of Charles, immediately after the victory of Pavia, gave him occasion to revive the king's jealousy and suspicions. The emperor so ill supported the appearance of moderation, which he at first assumed, that he had already changed his usual style to Henry; and, instead of writing to him with his own hand, and subscribing himself "your affectionate son and cousin:" he dictated his letters to a secretary, and simply subscribed himself "Charles (o)." Wolsey also perceived a diminution in the caresses and professions with which the emperor's letters to him were formerly loaded; and this last imprudence, proceeding from the intoxication of success, was probably more dangerous to Charles's interests than the other.

Henry, though immediately determined to embrace new measures, was careful to save appearances in the change; and he caused rejoicings to be every where made on account of the victory of Pavia and the captivity of Francis. He publicly dismissed a French envoy, whom he had formerly allowed, notwithstanding the war, to reside at London (p): but, upon the regent of France's submissive applications to him, he again opened a correspondence with her; and, besides assuring her of his friendship and protection, he exacted a promise that she never would consent to the dismembering of any province from the monarchy for her son's ransom. With the emperor, however, he put on the appearance of vigour and enterprize; and in order to have a pretence for breaking with him, he dispatched Tunstal, bishop of London, to Madrid, with proposals for a powerful invasion of France. He required that Charles should immediately enter Guienne at the head of a great army, in order to put him in possession of that province; and he demanded the payment of large sums of money which that prince had borrowed from him in his last visit at London. He knew that the emperor was in no condition of fulfilling either of these demands; and that he had as little inclination to make him master of such considerable territories upon the frontiers of Spain.

Tunstal, likewise, after his arrival at Madrid, informed his master that Charles, on his part, urged several complaints against England; and, in particular, was displeased with Henry, because last year he had neither continued his monthly payments to Bourbon, nor invaded Picardy, according to his stipulations. Tunstal added, that instead of expressing an intention to espouse Mary when she should be of age, the emperor had hearkened to proposals for marrying his niece Isabella, princess of Portugal; and that he had entered into a separate treaty with Francis, and seemed determined to reap alone all the advantages of the success with which fortune had crowned his arms.

Henry, influenced by these motives, concluded at Moore, on the 30th of August, his alliance with the regent of France, and engaged to procure her son his liberty on reasonable conditions (q): the regent also, in another treaty, acknowledged the kingdom Henry's debtor for one million eight hundred thousand crowns, to be discharged in half-yearly payments of fifty thousand crowns: after which Henry was to receive during life, a yearly pension of a hundred thousand. A large present of a hundred thousand crowns was also made to Wolsey for his good offices, but covered under pretence of arrears due on the pension granted him for relinquishing the bishopric of Tournay.

Henry, in the mean time, foreseeing that this treaty with France might involve him in a war with the emperor, was determined to fill his treasury by impositions upon his own subjects; and as the parliament had discovered some reluctance in complying with his demands, he followed, as is believed, the counsel of Wolsey, and resolved to make use of his prerogative alone for that purpose. He issued commissions to all the counties of England for levying four shillings in the pound upon the clergy, three shillings and four-pence upon the laity; and so uncontroulable did he deem his authority, that he took no care to cover, as formerly, this arbitrary exaction, even under the slender pretence of a loan. But he soon found that he had presumed too far on the passive submission of his subjects. The people, displeased with an exaction beyond what was usually levied in those days, and farther disgusted with the illegal method of imposing it, broke out in murmurs, complaints, opposition to the commissioners; and their refractory disposition threatened a general insurrection. Henry had the prudence to stop short in that dangerous path into which he had entered. He sent letters to all the counties, declaring that he meant no force by his last imposition, and that he would take nothing from his subjects but by way of benevolence. He flattered himself that his condescension in employing that disguise would satisfy the people, and that no one would dare to render himself noxious to royal authority, by refusing any payment required of him in this manner. But the spirit of opposition, once roused, could not so easily be quieted at pleasure. A lawyer in the city, objecting the statute of Richard III. by which benevolences were for ever abolished, it was replied by the court, "that Richard being an usurper, and his parliament a factious assembly, his statutes could not bind a lawful and absolute monarch, who held his crown by hereditary right, and needed not to court the favour of a licentious populace (r)." The judges even went so far as to affirm positively, "that the king might exact, by commission, any sum he pleased;" and the privy council gave a ready assent to this decree, which annihilated the most valuable privilege of the people, and rendered all their other privileges precarious. Armed with such formidable authority, of royal prerogative and pretence of law, Wolsey sent for the mayor of London, and desired to know what he was willing to give for the supply of his majesty's necessities. The mayor seemed desirous, before he should declare himself, to consult the common council; but the cardinal required that he and all the aldermen should separately confer with himself about the benevolence; and he eluded by that means the danger of a formed opposition. Matters, however, went not so smoothly in the country. An insurrection was begun in some places; but as the people were not headed by any considerable person, it was easy for the duke of Suffolk, and the earl of Surrey, now duke of Norfolk, by employing persuasion and authority, to induce the ringleaders to lay down their arms, and surrender themselves prisoners. The king, finding it dangerous to punish criminals engaged in so popular a cause, was determined, notwithstanding his violent imperious temper, to grant them a general pardon; and he prudently imputed their guilt, not to their want of loyalty or affection, but to their poverty. The offenders were carried before the star-chamber, where, after a severe charge brought against them by the king's council, the cardinal said, "That, notwithstanding their grievous offence, the king, in consideration of their necessities, had granted them his gracious pardon upon condition that they would find sureties for their future good behaviour." But they replying they had no sureties, the cardinal first, and after him the duke of Norfolk said, that they would be bound for them. Upon which they were dismissed (s).

These arbitrary impositions being imputed, though on what grounds is unknown, to the counsels of the cardinal, increased the general odium under which he laboured; and the clemency of the pardon being ascribed to the king, was considered as an atonement on his part for the illegality of the measure. But Wolsey, supported both by royal and papal authority, proceeded, without scruple, to violate all ecclesiastical privileges, which, during that age, were much more sacred than civil; and, having once prevailed in that unusual attempt of suppressing some monasteries, he kept all the rest in awe, and exercised over them an arbitrary jurisdiction. By his commission as legate, he was impowered to visit them, and reform them, and chastise their irregularities; and he employed his usual agent, Allen, in the exercise of this authority. The religious houses were obliged to compound for their guilt, real or pretended, by paying large sums to the cardinal or his deputy; and this oppression was carried so far that it reached at last the king's ears, which were not commonly open to complaints against his favourite. Wolsey had built a splendid palace at Hampton Court, which he probably intended, as well as that of York Place in Westminster, for his own residence; but fearing the increase of envy on account of this magnificence; and desirous to appease the king, he made him a present of the building, and told him that, from the first, he had erected it for his use.

The absolute authority possessed by the king, rendered his domestic government, both over his people and his ministers, easy and expeditious: the conduct of foreign affairs alone required effort and application; and they were now brought to such a crisis, that it was no longer safe for England to remain entirely neutral. The feigned moderation of the emperor was of short duration; and it was soon obvious to all the world that his great dominions, far from gratifying his ambition, were only regarded as the means of acquiring an empire still more extensive. The terms which he demanded of his prisoner were such as must for ever have annihilated the power of France, and destroyed the balance of Europe. These terms were proposed to Francis soon after the battle of Pavia, while he was detained in Pizzichitone; and as he had hitherto trusted somewhat to the emperor's generosity, the disappointment excited in his breast the most lively indignation. He said that he would rather live and die a prisoner than agree to dismember his kingdom; and that even were he so base as to submit to such conditions, his subjects would never permit him to carry them into execution.

Francis was encouraged to persist in demanding more moderate terms, by the favourable accounts which he heard of Henry's dispositions towards him, and of the alarm which had seized all the chief powers in Italy upon his defeat and captivity. He was uneasy, however, to be so far distant from the emperor, with whom he must treat; and he expressed his desire (which was complied with) to be removed to Madrid, in hopes that a personal interview would operate in his favour, and that Charles, if not influenced by his ministers, might be found possessed of the same frankness of disposition by which he himself was distinguished. He was soon convinced of his mistake: and partly from want of exercise, partly from reflections on his present melancholy situation, he fell into a languishing illness; which begat apprehensions in Charles, lest the death of his captive should bereave him of all those advantages which he purposed to extort from him. He then paid him a visit in the castle of Madrid; and as he approached the bed in which Francis lay, the sick monarch called to him, "You come, sir, to visit your prisoner." "No," replied the emperor, "I come to visit my brother and my friend, who shall soon obtain his liberty." He soothed his afflictions with many speeches of a like nature, which had so good an effect, that the king daily recovered (t); and thenceforth employed himself in concerting with the ministers of the emperor the terms of his treaty.

At last the emperor, dreading a general combination against him, was willing to abate somewhat of his rigour; and the treaty of Madrid, which procured the French monarch his liberty, was signed on the 14th of January, 1526; by which it was hoped an end would be finally put to the differences between these two great monarchs. The principal condition was the restoring of Francis's liberty, and the delivery of his two eldest sons as hostages to the emperor for the cession of Burgundy: if any difficulty should afterwards occur in the execution of this last article, from the opposition of the states either of France or of that province, Francis stipulated, that in six weeks time he should return to his prison, and remain there till the full performance of the treaty. There were many other articles in this famous convention, all of them extremely severe upon the captive monarch; and Charles discovered evidently his intention of reducing Italy, as well as France, to subjection and dependence.

Many of Charles's ministers foresaw that Francis, how solemn soever the oaths, promises, and protestations exacted of him, never would execute a treaty so disadvantageous, or rather ruinous and destructive, to himself, his posterity, and his country. By putting Burgundy, they thought, into the emperor's hands, he gave his powerful enemy an entrance into the heart of the kingdom: by sacrificing his allies in Italy, he deprived himself of foreign assistance; and arming his oppressor with the whole force and wealth of that opulent country, rendered him absolutely irresistible. To these great views of interest were added the motives, no less cogent, of passion and resentment; while Francis, a prince who piqued himself on generosity, reflected on the rigour with which he had been treated during his captivity, and the severe terms which had been exacted of him for the recovery of his liberty. It was also foreseen, that the emulation and rivalship which had so long subsisted between these two monarchs, would make him feel the strongest reluctance on yielding the superiority to an antagonist, who by the whole tenor of his conduct, he would be apt to think, had shewn himself so little worthy of that advantage which fortune alone had put into his hands. His ministers, his friends, his subjects, his allies, would be sure with one voice to inculcate on him, that the first object of a prince was the preservation of his people; and that the laws of honour, which with a private man ought to be absolutely supreme, and superior to all interests, were, with a sovereign, subordinate to the great duty of ensuring the safety of his country. Nor could it be imagined that Francis would be so romantic in his principles, as not to hearken to a casuistry which was so plausible in itself, and which so much flattered all the passions by which, either as a prince or a man, he was strongly actuated.

On the 18th of March Francis entered his own dominions, and delivered his two eldest sons as hostages into the hands of the Spaniards. It was one year and twenty-two days after the fatal battle of Pavia. He mounted a Turkish horse, and immediately putting him to the gallop, he waved his hand, and cried aloud several times "I am yet a king." He soon reached Bayonne, where he was joyfully received by the regent and his whole court. He immediately wrote to Henry, acknowledging that to his good offices alone he owed his liberty, and protesting that he should be entirely governed by his counsels in all transactions with the emperor. When the Spanish envoy demanded his ratification of the treaty of Madrid, now that he had fully recovered his liberty, he declined the proposal, under colour that it was previously necessary to assemble the states both of France and of Burgundy, and to obtain their consent. The states of Burgundy soon met; and declaring against the clause which contained an engagement for alienating their province, they expressed their resolution of opposing, even by force of arms, the execution of so ruinous and unjust an article. The Imperial minister then required that Francis, in conformity to the treaty of Madrid, should now return to his prison; but the French monarch, instead of complying, made public the treaty which he had secretly concluded at Cognac, on the 22nd of May, against the ambitious schemes and usurpations of the emperor (u).

Pope Clement, the Venetians, and other Italian states, who were deeply interested in these events, had been held in the most anxious suspense with regard to the resolutions which Francis should take after the recovery of his liberty; and the pope, in particular, who suspected that this prince would never execute a treaty so hurtful to his interests, and even destructive of his independency, had very frankly offered him a dispensation from all his oaths and engagements. Francis remained not in suspense, but entered immediately into the confederacy proposed to him. It was stipulated by that king, the pope, the Venetians, the Swiss, the Florentines, and the duke of Milan, among other articles, that they would oblige the emperor to deliver up the two young princes of France, on receiving a reasonable sum of money; and to restore Milan to Sforza, without farther condition or incumbrance. The king of England was invited to accede, not only as a contracting party, but as protector of the holy league, as it was was called; and if Naples should be conquered from the emperor, in prosecution of this confederacy, it was agreed that Henry should enjoy a principality in that kingdom, of the yearly revenue of thirty thousand ducats: and that cardinal Wolsey, in consideration of the services which he had rendered to Christendom, should also, in such an event, be put in possession of a revenue of ten thousand ducats.

Francis was desirous that the appearance of this great confederacy should engage the emperor to relax somewhat in the extreme rigour of the treaty of Madrid; and while he entertained these hopes, he was the more remiss in his warlike preparations; nor did he send in due time reinforcement to his allies in Italy. The duke of Bourbon had got possession of the whole Milanese, in the beginning of 1527, of which the emperor intended to grant him the investiture; and having levied a considerable army in Germany, he became formidable to all the Italian potentates; and not the less so because Charles, destitute as usual of money, had not been able to remit any pay to the forces. The general was extremely beloved by his troops; and in order to prevent those mutinies which were ready to break out every moment, and which their affection alone for him had hitherto restrained, he led them to Rome, and promised to enrich them by the plunder of that opulent city. He was himself killed as he was planting a scaling-ladder against the walls, on the 6th of May; but his soldiers, rather enraged than discouraged by his death, mounted to the assault with the utmost valour, and entering the city sword in hand, exercised all those brutalities which may be expected from ferocity excited by resistance, and from insolence which takes place when that resistance is no more. This celebrated city, exposed by her renown alone to so many calamities, never endured in any age, even from the barbarians by whom she was often subdued, such indignities as she was now compelled to suffer. The unrestrained massacre and pillage, which continued for several days, were the least ills to which the unhappy Romans were exposed (v). Whatever was respectable in modesty, or sacred in religion, seemed but the more to provoke the insults of the soldiery. Virgins suffered violation in the arms of their parents, and upon those very altars to which they had fled for protection. Aged prelates, after enduring every indignity, and even every torture, were thrown into dungeons, and menaced with the most cruel death, in order to make them reveal their secret treasures, or purchase liberty by exorbitant ransoms. Clement himself, who had trusted for protection to the sacredness of his character, and neglected to make his escape in time, was taken captive, and found that his dignity, which procured him no regard from the Spanish soldiers, did but draw on him the insolent mockery of the German, who being generally attached to the Lutheran principles, were pleased to gratify their animosity by the abasement of the sovereign pontiff.

When intelligence of this great event was conveyed to the emperor, that young prince, habituated to hypocrisy, expressed the most profound sorrow for the success of his arms: he put himself and all his court in mourning: he stopped the rejoicings for the birth of his son Philip; and knowing that every artifice, however gross, is able, when seconded by authority, to impose upon the people, he ordered prayers during several months to be put up in the churches for the pope's liberty; which every one knew could have been effected by a single letter under his own hand.

The concern expressed by Henry and Francis for the calamity of their ally was more sincere. These two monarchs, on the 30th of April, a few days before the sack of Rome, had concluded a treaty at Westminster, in which, besides renewing former alliances, they agreed to send ambassadors to Charles, requiring him to accept of two millions of crowns as the ransom of the French princes, and to repay the money borrowed from Henry; and in case of refusal the ambassadors, attended by heralds, were ordered to denounce war against him. This war it was agreed to prosecute in the Low Countries, with an army of thirty thousand infantry, and fifteen hundred men at arms, two-thirds to be supplied by Francis, the rest by Henry. And in order to strengthen the alliance between the princes, it was stipulated that either Francis, or his son the duke of Orleans, as should afterwards be agreed on, should espouse the princess Mary, Henry's daughter. No sooner did the monarchs receive intelligence of Bourbon's enterprize, than they changed, by a new treaty, on the 29th of May, the scene of the projected war from the Netherlands to Italy; and hearing of the pope's captivity, they were farther stimulated to undertake the war with vigour for restoring him to liberty. Wolsey himself crossed the sea, in order to have an interview with Francis, and to concert measures for that purpose; and he displayed all that grandeur and magnificence with which he was so much intoxicated. He was attended by a train of a thousand horse. The cardinal of Lorraine and the chancellor Alençon met him at Boulogne: Francis himself, besides granting to that haughty prelate the power of giving in every place where he came liberty to all prisoners, made a journey as far as Amiens to meet him, and even advanced some miles from the town, the more to honour his reception. It was here stipulated, that the duke of Orleans should espouse the princess Mary; and as the emperor seemed to be taking some steps towards assembling a general council, the two monarchs agreed not to acknowledge it; but during the interval of the pope's captivity to govern the churches in their respective dominions by their own authority. Wolsey made some attempts to get his legatine power extended over France, and even over Germany; but finding his efforts fruitless, he was obliged, though with great reluctance, to desist from these ambitious enterprizes (w).

In order the more strongly to cement the union between these princes, a new treaty was concluded at London, on the 18th of September; in which Henry agreed finally to renounce all claims to the crown of France; claims which might well be deemed chimerical, but which often served as a pretence for exciting the unwary English to wage war upon the French nation. In return for this concession, Francis bound himself and his successors to pay for ever fifty thousand crowns a year to Henry and his successors; and that greater solemnity might be given to this treaty, it was agreed that the parliaments and great nobility of both kingdoms should give their assent to it. The mareschal Montmorency, accompanied by many persons of distinction, and attended by a pompous equipage, was sent over to ratify the treaty; and was received at London with all the parade which suited the solemnity of the occasion. The terror of the emperor's greatness had extinguished the ancient animosity between the nations; and Spain, during more than a century, became, though a more distant power, the chief object of jealousy to the English.

This cordial union between France and England, though it added influence to the joint embassy which they sent to the emperor, was not able to bend that monarch to submit entirely to the conditions insisted on by the allies. He departed indeed from his demand of Burgundy as the ransom of the French princes; but he required, previously to their liberty, that Francis should evacuate Genoa, and all the fortresses held by him in Italy: and he declared his intention of bringing Sforza to a trial, and confiscating the duchy of Milan, on account of his pretended treason. The English and French heralds, therefore, according to agreement, declared war against him, and set him at defiance. Charles answered the English herald with moderation; but to the French, he reproached his master with breach of faith, reminded him of the private conversation which had passed between them at Madrid before their separation, and offered to prove, by single combat, that he had acted dishonourably. Francis retaliated this challenge, by calling Charles a liar; and after demanding security of the field, he offered to maintain his cause by single combat. Many messages passed to and fro between them; but though both princes were undoubtedly brave, the intended duel never took place. The French and Spaniards during that age zealously disputed which of the monarchs incurred the blame of this failure; but all men of moderation every where lamented the power of fortune, that the prince, the more candid, generous, and sincere, should by unhappy incidents have been reduced to so cruel a situation, that nothing but his violation of treaty could preserve his people, and that he must ever after, without being able to make a proper reply, bear to be reproached with breach of promise by a rival, inferior to him both in honour and in virtue. Although this famous challenge between Charles and Francis had no immediate consequence with regard to these monarchs themselves, it produced a considerable alteration on the manners of the age (x).

While

While the political state of Europe threatened a general war, and the kings of England and France, particularly the latter, were adopting effectual measures for the release of the captive pope, a new scene was about to be opened, which was to produce endless disturbances, and effect a general change in the European system. Notwithstanding the submissive deference paid to papal authority before the reformation, the marriage of Henry with Catherine of Arragon, his brother Arthur's widow, had not passed without much scruple and difficulty. The prejudices of the people were in general bent against a conjugal union between such near relations; and the late king, though he had betrothed his son when that prince was but twelve years of age, gave evident proofs of his intention to take afterwards a proper opportunity of annulling the contract (y). He ordered the young prince, as soon as he came of age, to enter a protestation against the marriage (z); and on his death-bed he charged him, as his last injunction, not to finish an alliance so unusual, and exposed to such insuperable objections. After the king's accession some members of the privy council, particularly Warham, the primate, openly declared against the resolution of completing the marriage; and though Henry's youth and dissipation kept him during some time from entertaining any scruples with regard to the measure which he had embraced, there happened incidents sufficient to rouse his attention, and to inform him of the sentiments generally entertained on that subject. The states of Castile had opposed the emperor Charles's espousals with Mary, Henry's daughter; and, among other objections, had insisted on the illegitimate birth of the young princess (a). And when the negociations were afterwards opened with France, and mention was made of betrothing her to Francis or the duke of Orleans, the bishop of Tarbe, the French ambassador, revived the same objection (b). But though these events naturally raised some doubts in Henry's mind, there concurred other causes, which tended much to increase his remorse, and render his conscience more scrupulous.

The queen was six years older than the king; and the decay of her beauty, together with particular infirmities and diseases, had contributed, notwithstanding her blameless character and deportment, to render her person unacceptable to him. They had now been married eighteen years. Though she had borne him several children, they all died in early infancy, except one daughter (Mary); and he was the more struck with this misfortune, because the curse of being childless is the very threatening contained in the Mosaical law against those who espouse their brother's widow (c). The succession too of the crown was a consideration that occurred to every one, whenever the legality of Henry's marriage was called in question; and it was apprehended, that if doubts of Mary's legitimacy concurred with the weakness of her sex, the king of Scots, the next heir, would advance his pretensions, and might involve the kingdom in anarchy and confusion. The evils as yet recent, of civil wars and convulsions, arising from a disputed title, made great impression on the minds of men, and rendered the people universally desirous of any event which might obviate so irreparable a calamity. And the king was thus impelled both by his private passions, and by motives of public interest, to seek the dissolution of his inauspicious, and, as it was esteemed, unlawful marriage with Catherine.

Henry afterwards declared that his scruples arose entirely from private reflection; and that, on consulting his confessor, the bishop of Lincoln, he found the prelate possessed with the same doubts and difficulties. The king himself, being a great casuist and divine, next proceeded to examine the question more carefully by his own learning and study; and having had recourse to Thomas Aquinas, he observed that this celebrated doctor, whose authority was great in the church, and absolute with him, had treated of that very case, and had expressly declared against the lawfulness of such marriages (d). The prohibitions, said Thomas, contained in Leviticus, and among the rest that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine sanction; and though the pope may dispense with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be set aside by any authority less than that which enacted them. William Warham, the archbishop of Canterbury, was then applied to; and he was required to consult his brethren: all the prelates of England, except Fisher, bishop of Rochester, unanimously declared, under their hand and seal, that they deemed the king's marriage unlawful (e). Wolsey also fortified the king's scruples (f); partly with a view of promoting a total breach with the emperor, Catherine's nephew; partly desirous of connecting the king more closely with Francis, by marrying him to the duchess of Alençon, sister to that monarch; and perhaps, too, somewhat disgusted with the queen herself, who had reproved him for certain freedoms unbecoming a person of his character and station (g). But Henry was carried forward, though perhaps not at first excited, by a motive more forcible than even the suggestions of that powerful favourite.

Among the ladies who had been appointed maids of honour to the queen was Anne Boleyn, who, having had frequent opportunities of being seen by Henry, and of conversing with him, had acquired an entire ascendant over his affections. This young lady, whose grandeur and misfortunes have rendered her so celebrated, was daughter of sir Thomas Boleyn, who had been employed by the king in several embassies, and who was allied to all the principal nobility in the kingdom. His wife, mother to Anne, was daughter of the duke of Norfolk; his own mother was daughter of the earl of Ormond; his grandfather sir Geoffry Boleyn, who had been mayor of London, had espoused one of the daughters and co-heirs of lord Hastings (h). Anne herself, though then in very early youth, had been carried over to Paris by the king's sister, when the princess espoused Louis XII. of France; and upon the demise of that monarch, and the return of his dowager into England, this damsel, whose accomplishments, even in her tender years, were always much admired, was retained in the service of Claude queen of France, consort to Francis; and after the death of that princess she passed into the family of the duchess of Alençon, a woman of singular merit. The exact time when she returned to England is not perfectly known; but it was after the king had entertained doubts with regard to the lawfulness of his marriage with Catherine; if the account is to be credited which he himself afterwards gave of that transaction. Henry's scruples had made him break off all conjugal commerce with the queen; but as he still supported an intercourse of civility and friendship with her, he had occasion, in the frequent visits which he paid her, to observe the beauty, the youth, the charms of Anne Boleyn. Finding the accomplishments of her mind no wise inferior to her exterior graces, he even entertained the design of raising her to the throne; and was the more confirmed in this resolution, when he found that her virtue and modesty prevented all hopes of gratifying his passion in any other manner. As every motive, therefore, of inclination and policy, seemed thus to concur in making the king desirous of a divorce from Catherine, and as his prospect of success was inviting, he resolved to make application to Clement, and he sent Knight, his secretary, to Rome for that purpose. That he might not shock the haughty claims of the pontiff, he resolved not to found the application on any general doubts concerning the papal power to permit marriage in the nearer degrees of consanguinity; but only to lemn occasions, and which was sometimes countenanced by the civil magistrate, began thenceforth to prevail in the most trivial incidents; and men, on any affront or injury, thought themselves entitled, or even required in honour, to take revenge on their enemies, by openly vindicating their right in single combat. These absurd maxims, shed much of the best blood in Christendom during more than two centuries. So powerful, however, is the dominion of fashion, that neither the terror of penal laws, nor reverence for religion, have been able entirely to abolish a practice unknown among the ancients, and totally unjustifiable by any principles of reason. It is somewhat strange, that to this absurd and impious custom (not less frequently employed for the sanction of injury than for the suppression of injustice, and often promoting the sacrifice of real honour at the shrine of chimerical prejudice) the urbanity of modern manners should have been seriously ascribed by men of wisdom and virtue. It would perhaps be difficult to conceive a more severe satire on the times: for surely that people can advance but very frivolous claims to respect for the refinement which usually results from civilization, and which is a subject of general exultation—more modish indeed than rational—who can only be urged to decency of deportment, and propriety of conduct, by the dastardly influence of fear!

insist on particular grounds of nullity in the bull which Julius had granted for the marriage of Henry and Catherine (i). Julius's bull, when examined, afforded abundant matter of this kind; and any tribunal favourable to Henry needed not want a specious colour for gratifying him in his applications for a divorce. It was said in the preamble, that the bull had been granted upon his solicitation; though it was known that at that time he was under twelve years of age: it was also affirmed, as another motive for the bull, that the marriage was requisite, in order to preserve peace between the two crowns; though it appears that there was not then any ground or appearance of quarrel between them. These false premises in Julius's bull seemed to afford Clement a sufficient reason or pretence for annulling it, and granting Henry a dispensation for a second marriage (k). But though the pretext for this indulgence had been less plausible, the pope was in such a situation that he had the strongest motives to embrace every opportunity of gratifying the English monarch. He was then a prisoner in the hands of the emperor, and had no hopes of recovering his liberty on any reasonable terms, except by the efforts of the league which Henry had formed with Francis and the Italian powers, in order to oppose the ambition of Charles. When the English secretary, therefore, solicited him in private, he received a very favourable answer; and a dispensation was immediately promised to be granted to his master (l). Soon after, the march of a French army into Italy, under the command of Lautrec, obliged the Imperialists to restore Clement to his liberty; and he retired to Orvietto, where the secretary, with sir Gregory Cassali, the king's resident at Rome, renewed their applications to him. They still found him full of high professions of friendship, gratitude, and attachment to the king; but not so prompt in granting his request as they expected. The emperor, who had got intelligence of Henry's application to Rome, had exacted a promise from the pope, to take no steps in the affair before he communicated them to the Imperial ministers; and Clement, embarrassed by this promise, and still more overawed by the emperor's forces in Italy, seemed willing to postpone those concessions desired of him by Henry. Importuned, however, by the English ministers, he at last put into their hands a commission to Wolsey, as legate, in conjunction with the archbishop of Canterbury, or any other English prelate, to examine the validity of the king's marriage, and of Julius's dispensation (m): he also granted them a provisional dispensation for the king's marriage with any other person; and promised to issue a decretal bull, annulling the marriage with Catherine. But he represented to them the dangerous consequences which must ensue to him, if these concessions should come to the emperor's knowledge; and he conjured them not to publish those papers, or make any further use of them, till his affairs were in such a situation as to secure his liberty and independence. And his secret advice was, whenever they should find the proper time for opening the scene, that they should prevent all opposition, by proceeding immediately to a conclusion, by declaring the marriage with Catherine invalid, and by Henry's instantly espousing some other person. Nor would it be so difficult, he said, for himself to confirm these proceedings after they were passed, as previously to render them valid by his consent and authority (n).

In the beginning of 1528, Henry received the commission and dispensation from his ambassadors, and was informed of the pope's advice; he laid the whole before his ministers, and asked their opinion in so delicate a situation. The English counsellors considered the danger of proceeding in the manner pointed out to them. Should the pope refuse to ratify a deed, which he might justly call precipitate and irregular, and should he disavow the advice which he gave in so clandestine a manner, the king would find his second marriage totally invalidated; the children, which it might bring him, declared illegitimate; and his marriage with Catherine more firmly rivetted than ever (o). And Henry's apprehensions of the possibility, or even probability, of such an event were much confirmed when he reflected on the character and situation of the sovereign pontiff; he being then a prisoner.

Clement was a prince of excellent judgement, whenever his timidity, to which he was extremely subject, allowed him to make full use of those talents and that penetration with which he was endowed (p). The captivity and other misfortunes which he had undergone, by entering into a league against Charles, had so affected his imagination, that he never afterwards exerted himself with vigour in any public measure; especially if the interest or inclinations of that potentate stood in opposition to him. The Imperial forces were at that time powerful in Italy, and might return to the attack of Rome, which was still defenceless and exposed to the same calamities with which it had already been overwhelmed. And besides these dangers, Clement fancied himself exposed to perils, which threatened still more immediately his person and his dignity.

Charles, being well acquainted with the timid disposition of the pope, threw out perpetual menaces of convening a general council; which he represented as necessary to reform the church, and correct those abuses which the ambition and avarice of the court of Rome had introduced into every branch of ecclesiastical administration. The power of the sovereign pontiff himself, he said, required limitation; his conduct called aloud for amendment; and even his title to the throne which he filled might justly be called in question (q). While Charles terrified the pope with these menaces, he allured him by hopes which were no less prevalent over his affections. At the time when the emperor's forces sacked Rome, and reduced Clement to captivity, the Florentines, passionate for their ancient liberty, had taken advantage of his distresses, and revolting against the family of Medicis, had entirely abolished their authority in Florence, and re-established the democracy. The better to protect themselves in their freedom, they had entered into the alliance with France, England, and Venice, against the emperor; and Clement found, that, by this interest, the hands of his confederates were tied from assisting him in the restoration of his family; the event which, of all others, he most passionately desired. The emperor alone, he knew, was able to effect this purpose; and therefore, whatever professions he made of fidelity to his allies, he was always ready to embrace every proposal of a cordial reconciliation with that potentate (r).

These views and interests of the pope were well known in England; and as the opposition of the emperor to Henry's divorce was foreseen, as well on account of the honour and interests of Catherine his aunt, as the obvious motive of distressing an enemy, it was esteemed dangerous to take any measure of consequence, in expectation of the subsequent concurrence of a man of Clement's character, whose behaviour contained so great duplicity, and who was at present but little at his own disposal. The safest measure seemed to consist in previously engaging him so far, that he could not afterwards recede, and in making use of his present ambiguity and uncertainty, to extort the most important concessions from him. For this purpose, Stephen Gardiner, the cardinal's secretary, and Edward Fox, the king's almoner, were dispatched to Rome, on the 10th of February, 1528, and were ordered to solicit a commission from the pope, of such a nature as would oblige him to confirm the sentence of the commissioners, whatever it should be, and disable him on any account to recal the commission, or evoke the cause to Rome (s).

(i) It was a maxim in the court of Rome, that if the pope be surprized into any concession, or grant any indulgence upon false suggestions, the bull may afterwards be annulled; and this pretence had usually been employed wherever one pope had recalled any deed executed by any of his predecessors.

(q) It must be observed, that pope had always passed for the natural son of Julian of Medicis, who was of the sovereign family of Florence; and though Leo X. his kinsman had declared him legitimate, upon a pretended promise of marriage between his father and mother, few believed that declaration to be founded on any just reason or authority. The canon law, indeed, had been entirely silent with regard to the promotion of bastards to the papal throne; but what was still dangerous, the people had entertained a violent prepossession that this stain in the birth of any person was incompatible with so holy an office. And in another point, the canon law was express and positive, that no man guilty of simony could attain that dignity. A severe bull of Julius II. had added new sanctions to this law, by declaring, that a simoniacal election could not be rendered valid, even by a posterior consent of the cardinals. But unfortunately Clement had given to Cardinal Colonna a billet, containing promises of advancing that cardinal, in case he himself should attain the papal dignity by his concurrence: and this billet, Colonna, who was in entire dependence on the emperor, threatened every moment to expose to public view. Father Paul, lib. i.

But the same reasons which made the king so desirous of obtaining this concession, confirmed the pope in the resolution of refusing it: he was still determined to keep the door open for an agreement with the emperor; and he made no scruple of sacrificing all other considerations to a point which he deemed the most essential and important to his own security, and to the greatness of his family. He granted, therefore, a new commission, in which cardinal Campeggio was joined to Wolsey, for the trial of the king's marriage; but he could not be prevailed on to insert the clause desired of him. And though he put into Gardiner's hand a letter promising not to recal the present commission, this promise was found, on examination, to be couched in such ambiguous terms as left him still the power of abandoning his word whenever a fit opportunity should offer (t).

Campeggio lay under some obligations to the king; but his dependence on the pope was so much greater, that he conformed himself entirely to the views of the latter; and though he received his commission in April, he delayed his departure under so many pretences that it was October before he arrived in England. The first step which he took was to exhort the king to desist from the prosecution of his divorce; but finding that this counsel gave offence, he said, that his intention was also to exhort the queen to take the vows in a convent, and that he thought it his duty previously to attempt an amicable composure of all differences (u). The more to pacify the king, he shewed to him, as also to the cardinal, the decretal bull, annulling the former marriage with Catherine; but no intreaties whatever could prevail on him to make any other of the king's council privy to the secret (v). In order to atone in some degree for this obstinacy, he expressed to the king and the cardinal, the pope's great desire of satisfying them in every reasonable demand; and in particular, he showed, that their request for suppressing some more monasteries, and converting them into cathedrals and episcopal sees, had obtained the consent of his holiness (w).

The ambiguous behaviour of the pope and the legate, kept the court of England in suspense, and determined the king to wait with patience the issue of such uncertain councils. Fortune, meanwhile, seemed to promise him a more sure and expeditious way of extricating himself from his present difficulties. Shortly after, in 1529, Clement was seized with a dangerous illness; and the intrigues for electing his successor began already to take place among the cardinals. Wolsey, in particular, supported by the interest of England and of France, entertained hopes of being seated in the pontifical chair (x); and it appears, that if a vacancy had then happened, there was a probability that he would have reached that summit of his ambition. But the pope recovered, though after several relapses; and he returned to the same train of false and deceitful politics, by which he had hitherto amused the court of England. He still flattered Henry with professions of the most cordial attachment, and promised him a sudden and favourable issue to his process: he still continued his secret negociations with the emperor Charles, and persevered in the resolution of sacrificing all his promises, and all the interests of the Romish religion, to the elevation of his family. Campeggio, who was perfectly acquainted with his views and intentions, protracted the decision by the most artful delays; and gave Clement full leisure to adjust all the terms of his treaty with Charles, who was well acquainted with the king's extreme earnestness in this affair, and who was determined that he should obtain success by no other means than by an application to him, and by deserting his alliance with Francis, which had hitherto supported, against the superior force of Spain, the tottering state of the French monarchy. He willingly hearkened, therefore, to the applications of Catherine, his aunt; and promising her his utmost protection, exhorted her never to yield to the malice and persecutions of her enemies. The queen herself, naturally of a firm and resolute temper, was engaged by every motive to persevere in protesting against the injustice to which she thought herself exposed. The imputation of incest, which was thrown upon her marriage with Henry, struck her with the highest indignation: the illegitimacy of her daughter, which seemed a necessary consequence, gave her the most just concern: the reluctance of yielding to a rival, who, she believed, had supplanted her in the king's affections, was a very natural motive. Actuated by these considerations, she ceased not to solicit her nephew's assistance, and earnestly intreated an evocation of the cause to Rome, where alone she thought she could expect justice; and the emperor, in all his negociations with the pope, made the recall of the commission which Campeggio and Wolsey exercised in England a fundamental article (y).

In the mean time the two legates opened their court at London, on the 31st of May, 1529, and cited the king and queen to appear before it. They both presented themselves; and the king answered to his name when called: but the queen, instead of answering to hers, rose from her seat, and throwing herself at the king's feet, made a very pathetic harangue, which her virtue, her dignity, and her misfortunes rendered the more affecting. She told him "that she was a stranger in his dominions, without protection, without council, without assistance; exposed to all the injustice which her enemies were pleased to impose upon her: that she had quitted her native country without other resource than her connexions with him and his family, and had expected that, instead of suffering thence any violence or iniquity, she was assured in them of a safeguard against every misfortune: that she had been his wife during twenty years, and would here appeal to himself, whether her affectionate submission to his will had not merited better treatment, than to be thus, after so long a time, thrown from him with so much indignity: that she was conscious—he himself was assured—that her virgin honour was yet unstained, when he received her into his bed, and that her connexions with his brother had been carried no farther than the ceremony of marriage: that their parents, the kings of England and Spain, were esteemed the wisest princes of their time, and had undoubtedly acted by the best advice, when they formed the agreement for that marriage, which was now represented as so criminal and unnatural: and that she acquiesced in their judgement, and would not submit her cause to be tried by a court, whose dependence on her enemies was too visible, ever to allow her any hopes of obtaining from them an equitable or impartial decision (z)." Having spoken these words, she rose, and making the king a low reverence, she departed from the court, and never would again appear in it.

After her departure, the king did her the justice to acknowledge, "that she had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenour of her behaviour had been conformable to the strictest rules of probity and honour." He only insisted on his own scruples with regard to the legality of their marriage; and he explained the origin, the progress, and the foundation of those doubts, by which he had been so long and so violently agitated. He acquitted cardinal Wolsey from having any hand in encouraging his scruples; and he craved a sentence of the court agreeable to the justice of his cause.

The legates, after citing the queen anew, declared her "contumacious," notwithstanding her appeal to Rome; and then proceeded to the examination of the cause. The first point which came before them was the proof of prince Arthur's consummation of his marriage with Catherine; and it must be confessed, that no stronger arguments could reasonably be expected of such a fact after so long an interval. The age of the prince, who had passed his fifteenth year, the good state of his health, the long time that he had cohabited with his consort, many of his expressions to that very purpose: all these circumstances form a strong presumption in favour of the king's assertion (a). Henry himself, after his brother's death, was not allowed for some time to bear the title of prince of Wales, in expectation of her pregnancy: the Spanish ambassador, in order the better to ensure possession of her jointure, had sent over to Spain proofs of the consummation of her marriage (b): Julius's bull was founded on the supposition that Arthur had, perhaps, had knowledge of the princess: in the very treaty, fixing Henry's marriage, the consummation of the former marriage with prince Arthur is acknowledged on both sides (c). To these presumptive proofs the assertion of Catherine herself is singly opposed---an assertion highly respectable indeed, as well from the place and manner in which it was made, as from the known virtue and integrity of the queen; yet certainly inadequate to counterbalance, in a court of justice.

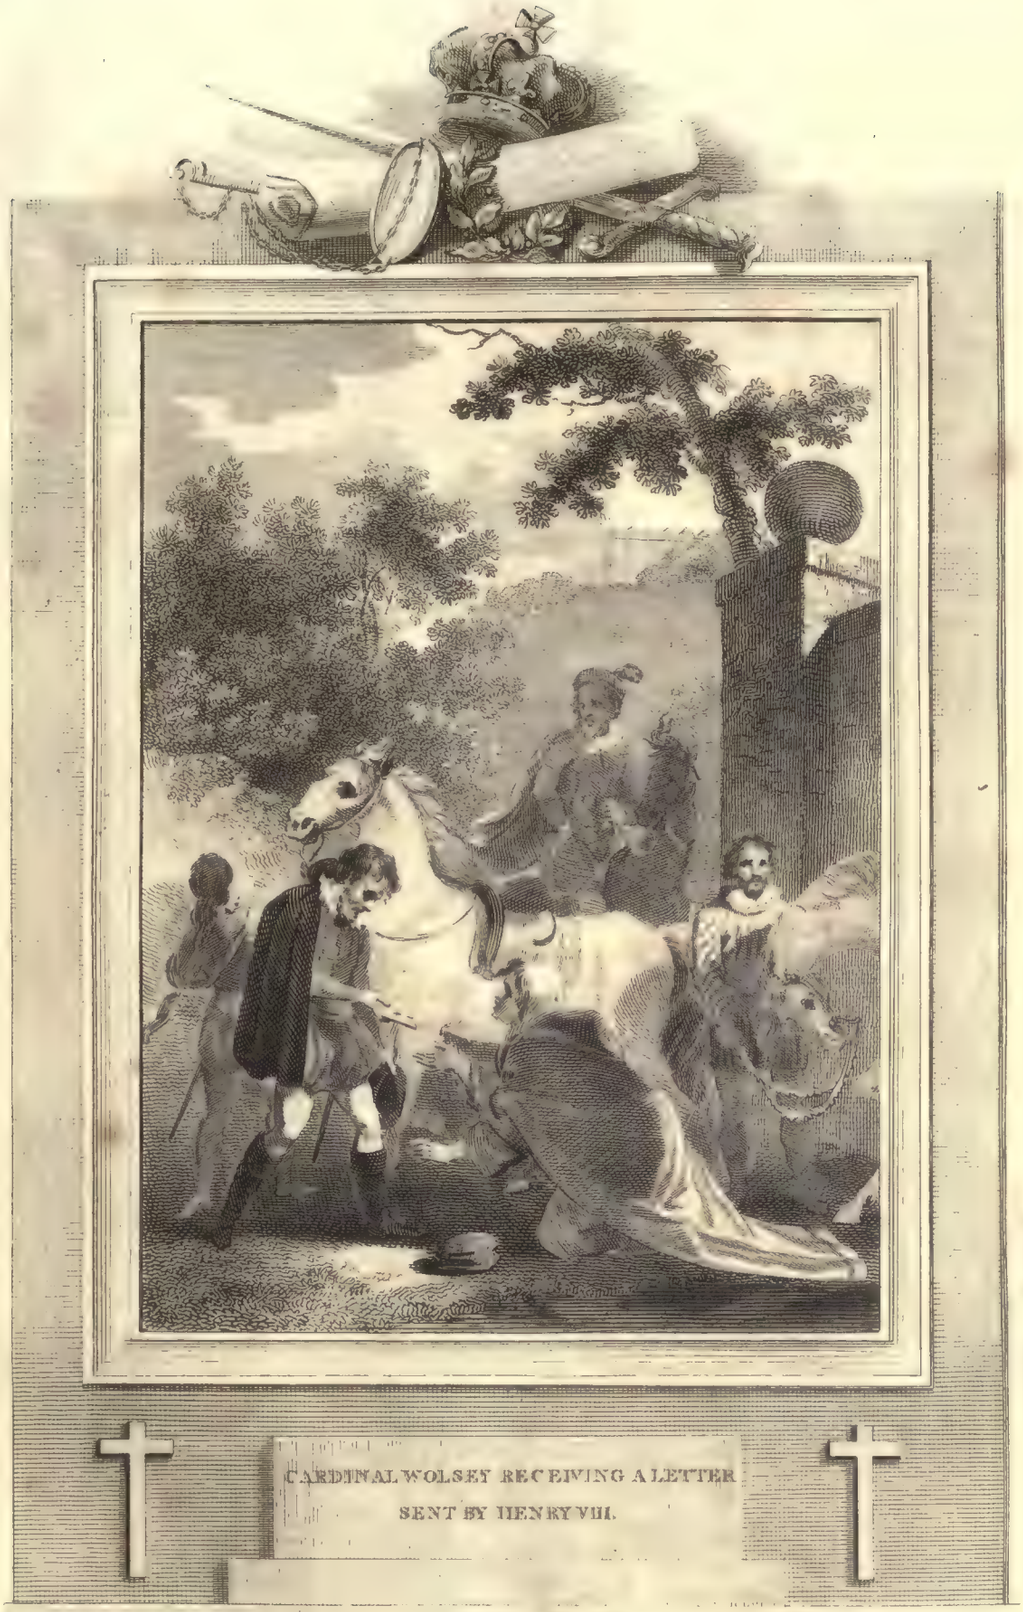
justice, the strong circumstantial evidence produced on the opposite side. We are compelled, however, to acknowledge, after an attentive consideration of the matter, that as the evidence on the part of the king must have been merely presumptive, and as the queen was the only person who could speak with absolute certainty of the fact in question---though evidently interested to disgui e the truth---her assertions have had some weight with us; so that, in conjunction with the powerful motives of her enemies to corrupt and misrepresent, we could almost be induced to give full credit to them.

These particulars were all laid before the court; accompanied with many reasonings concerning the extent of the pope's authority, and against his power of granting a dispensation to marry within the prohibited degrees. Campeggio heard these doctrines with great impatience; and notwithstanding his resolution to protract the cause, he was often tempted to interrupt and silence the king's counsel, when they insisted on such disagreeable topics. The trial was protracted till the 23d of July; and Campeggio chiefly took on him the part of conducting it. Wolsey, though the elder cardinal, permitted him to act as president of the court; because it was thought that a trial managed by an Italian cardinal would carry the appearance of greater candour and impartiality, than if the king's own minister and favourite had presided in it. The business seemed now to be drawing near to a period; and the king was every day in expectation of a sentence in his favour; when, to his great surprize, Campeggio, on a sudden, without any previous warning, and upon very frivolous pretences (d), prorogued the court till the first of October. The evocation, which came a few days after from Rome, put an end to all the hopes of success which the king had so long and so anxiously cherished (e).

While the trial was carried on before the legates at London, the emperor had, by his ministers, earnestly solicited Clement to evoke the cause; and had employed every topic of hope or terror which could operate either on the ambition or timidity of the pontiff. The English ambassadors, on the other hand, in conjunction with the French, had been no less earnest in their applications, that the legates should be allowed to finish the trial; but though they employed the same engines of promises and menaces, the motives which they could set before the pope were not so urgent or immediate as those which were held up to him by the emperor (f). The dread of losing England, and of fortifying the Lutherans by so considerable an accession, made small impression on Clement's mind, in comparison of the anxiety for his personal safety, and the fond desire of restoring the Medicis to their dominion in Florence. As soon, therefore, as he had adjusted all terms with the emperor. He laid hold of the pretence of justice, which required him, as he asserted, to pay regard to the queen's appeal; and suspending the commission of the legates, he adjourned the cause to his own personal judgement at Rome. Campeggio had, before-hand, received private orders delivered by Campana to burn the decretal bull with which he was entrusted.

Wolsey had long foreseen that this measure would be the forerunner of his ruin. Though he had at first desired that the king should rather marry a French princess than Anne Boleyn, he had employed himself with the utmost assiduity and earnestness to bring the affair to a happy issue (g): he was not, therefore, to be blamed for the unprosperous event which Clement's partiality had produced. But he had sufficient experience of the extreme ardour and impatience of Henry's temper, who could not bear to be contradicted, and who was wont, without examination or distinction, to make his ministers answerable for the success of those transactions with which they were entrusted. Anne Boleyn also, who was prepossessed against him, had imputed to him the failure of her hopes; and as she was newly returned to court, whence she had been removed from a regard to decency during the trial before the legates, she had naturally acquired an additional influence on Henry, and she served much to fortify his prejudices against the cardinal (h). Even the queen and her partizans, judging of Wolsey by the part which he had openly acted, had expressed great animosity against him; and the most opposite factions seemed now to combine in the ruin of this haughty minister. The high opinion itself, which Henry had entertained of the cardinal's capacity, tended to hasten his downfal; while he imputed the bad success of that minister's undertakings, not to ill fortune, or to mistake, but to the malignity or infidelity of his intentions. The blow, however, fell not instantly on his head. The king, who probably could not justify by any good reason his alienation from his ancient favourite, seems to have remained some time in suspense; and he received him, if not with all his former kindness, at least with the appearance of trust and esteem.

But constant experience evinces how rarely a high confidence and affection receives the least diminution, without sinking into absolute indifference, or even running into the opposite extreme; and the king seemed now determined to bring on the ruin of the cardinal with a motion almost as precipitate as he had formerly employed in his elevation. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent, on the 18th of October, 1529, to require the great seal from him; and on his scrupling to deliver it (i) without a more express warrant, Henry wrote him a letter, upon which it was surrendered, and it was delivered by the king to sir Thomas More, a person who, besides the ornaments of an elegant literature, possessed the highest virtue, probity, and talents.



Wolsey was ordered to depart from York Place, a palace which he had built in London, and which, though it really belonged to the see of York, was seized by Henry, and became afterwards the residence of the kings of England, by the title of Whitehall. All his furniture and plate were also seized; the riches and splendour of which befitted rather a royal than a private fortune. The walls of his palace were covered with cloth of gold, or cloth of silver: he had a cupboard of plate of massy gold: there were found a thousand pieces of fine holland belonging to him. The rest of his riches and furniture was in proportion; and his opulence was, probably, no small inducement to this violent persecution against him.

The cardinal was ordered to retire to Esher, a country seat which he possessed near Hampton Court; where he had leisure to meditate on the vicissitudes of fortune, and the ingratitude of mankind, which he experienced in the greatest degree. The world, that had paid him such abject court during his prosperity, now entirely deserted him on this fatal reverse. He himself was much dejected with the change; and from the same turn of mind which had made him be so vainly elated with his grandeur, he felt the stroke of adversity with double rigour (k). The smallest appearance of his return to favour threw him into transports of joy unbecoming a man.

The king, either from remorse for his late severity, or from a recollection of past times, seemed willing to suspend the effects of his ill-grounded resentment. He granted him his protection, and left him in possession of the sees of York and Winchester. He even sent him a gracious message accompanied with a ring, as a testimony of his affection. Wolsey, who was on horseback when the messenger met him, immediately alighted; and throwing himself on his knees in the mire, received, in that humble attitude, these marks of his majesty's gracious disposition towards him (l). But his enemies, who dreaded his return to court, never ceased acquainting the king with accounts of his several offences; and Anne Boleyn, in particular, contributed her endeavours in conjunction with her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, to exclude him from all hopes of ever being reinstated in his former authority. He dismissed, therefore, his numerous retinue; and as he was a kind and beneficent master, the separation passed not without a plentiful effusion of tears on both sides (m). The king's heart, notwithstanding some gleams of kindness, seemed now completely hardened against his old favourite. He ordered him to be indicted in the Star Chamber, where a sentence was passed against him; and, not content with this severity, he abandoned him to all the rigour of the parliament, which now, after a long interval, was again assembled, in the month of November. The house of lords voted a long charge against Wolsey, consisting of forty-four articles; and accompanied it with an application to the king for his punishment, and his removal from all authority. Little opposition was made to this charge in the upper house: no evidence of any part of it was so much as called for; and as it chiefly consists of general accusations, it was scarcely susceptible of any (n). The articles were sent down to the house of commons; where where Thomas Cromwell, formerly a servant of the cardinal's, and who had been raised by him from a very low station, defended his unfortunate patron with such spirit, generosity, and courage, as acquired him great honour, and laid the foundation of that favour which he afterwards enjoyed with Henry.

The cardinal's enemies finding that either his innocence or his caution prevented them from having any just ground of accusing him, had recourse to a very extraordinary expedient. An indictment was laid against him; that, contrary to a statute of Richard II. commonly called the Statute of Provisors, he had procured bulls from Rome, particularly one investing him with the legatine power, which he had exercised with very extensive authority. He confessed the indictment, pleaded ignorance of the statute, and threw himself on the king's mercy. He was, perhaps, within reach of the law; but besides that this statute had become obsolete, nothing could be more rigorous and severe, than to impute to him as a crime what he had openly, during the course of so many years, practised with the consent and approbation of the king, and the acquiescence of the parliament: not to mention what he always asserted (o), and what we can scarcely doubt of, that he had obtained the royal licence in the most formal manner, which, had he not been apprehensive of the dangers attending any opposition to Henry's lawless will, he might have pleaded in his own defence before the judges. Sentence, however, was pronounced against him, "That he was out of the king's protection; his lands and goods forfeited; and that his person might be committed to custody." But this prosecution of Wolsey was carried no farther. Henry even granted him a pardon for all offences; restored him part of his plate and furniture; and still continued from time to time to drop expressions of favour and compassion towards him.

The complaints against the usurpations of the ecclesiastics had been very ancient in England, as well as in most other European kingdoms; and as this topic was now become popular every where, it had paved the way for the Lutheran tenets, and reconciled the people in some measure to the frightful idea of heresy and innovation. The commons, finding the occasion favourable, passed several bills restraining the impositions of the clergy; one for the regulating of mortuaries; another against the exactions for the probates of wills (p); a third against non-residence and pluralities, and against churchmen's being farmers of land. But what appeared chiefly dangerous to the ecclesiastical order, were the severe invectives thrown out, almost without opposition in the house, against the dissolute lives of the priests, their ambition, their avarice, and their endless encroachments on the laity. Lord Herbert (q) has even preserved the speech of a gentleman of Gray's Inn, which is of a singular nature, and contains such topics as we should little expect to meet with during that period. The member insists upon the vast variety of theological opinions which prevailed in different nations and ages; the endless inextricable controversies maintained by the several sects; the impossibility that any man, much less the people, could ever know, or even examine, the tenets and principles of every sect; the necessity of ignorance, and a suspense of judgement with regard to all those objects of dispute: and upon the whole he infers, that the only religion obligatory on mankind is the belief of one supreme Being, the author of nature; and the necessity of good morals, in order to obtain his favour and protection. Such sentiments would be deemed latitudinarian, even in our time, and would not be advanced without some precaution in a public assembly. But though the first broaching of religious controversy might encourage the sceptical turn in a few persons of a studious disposition; the zeal with which men soon after attached themselves to their several parties, served effectually to banish for a long time all such noxious liberties.

The bills for regulating the clergy met with some opposition in the house of lords. Bishop Fisher, in particular, imputed these measures of the commons to their want of faith; and to a settled resolution derived from heretical and Lutheran principles, of robbing the church of her patrimony, and overturning the national religion. The duke of Norfolk reproved the prelate in severe and even somewhat indecent terms. He told him "that the greatest clerks were not always the wisest men." But Fisher replied, "that he did not remember any fools in his time who had proved great clerks." The exceptions taken at the bishop of Rochester's speech stopped not there. The commons, by the mouth of sir Thomas Audley, their speaker, made complaints to the king of the reflections thrown upon them; and the bishop was obliged to put a more favourable construction on the words which had given offence (r).

Henry was not displeased that the court of Rome and the clergy should be sensible that they were entirely dependent on him, and that his parliament, if he were willing to second their inclinations, was sufficiently disposed to reduce the power and privileges of the ecclesiastics. The commons gratified the king in another particular of moment, by granting him a discharge of all those debts which he had contracted since the beginning of his reign; and they grounded this bill, which occasioned many complaints, on a pretence of the king's great care of the nation, and of his regularly employing all the money which he had borrowed in the public service. Most of the king's creditors consisted of friends to the cardinal, who had been engaged by their patron to contribute to the supply of Henry's necessities; and the present courtiers were well pleased to take the opportunity of fining them (s). Several also approved of an expedient which they hoped would ever after discredit a method of supply so irregular and so unparliamentary.

The domestic transactions of England were at present so interesting to the king, that they chiefly engaged his attention; and he regarded foreign affairs only in subordination to them. He had declared war against the emperor; but the mutual advantages reaped by the commerce between England and the Netherlands, had engaged him to stipulate a neutrality with those provinces; and except by money contributed to the Italian wars, he had in effect exercised no hostility against any of the Imperial dominions. A general peace was this summer (1529) established in Europe. Margaret of Austria, aunt to the emperor, and Louisa of Savoy, mother to Francis, met at Cambray in the month of May; and, being lodged in two adjoining houses, between which a communication was opened, saw each other without ceremony or observation; and held daily conferences, at which no person besides themselves was admitted to be present. These continued till the 5th of August; when the peace of Cambray was concluded, to which the treaty of Madrid served as a basis, the former being intended to mitigate the rigour of the latter. The chief articles were, That the emperor should not, for the present, demand the restitution of Burgundy; reserving, however, in full force, his rights and pretensions to that duchy: that Francis should pay two millions of crowns, as the ransom of his two sons; and, before they were set at liberty, should restore such towns as he held in the Milanese: that he should resign the sovereignty of Flanders, and of Artois: that he should renounce all his pretensions to Naples, Milan, Genoa, and every other place beyond the Alps; and that he should immediately consummate the marriage concluded between him and the emperor's sister, Eleonora.

Henry was on this occasion so generous to his friend and the legatine power, which, however, as it was certainly done with the king's consent and permission, could be nowise criminal. Many of the other articles also regard the mere exercise of that power. Some articles impute to him as crimes, particular actions which were natural or unavoidable to any man that was prime minister with so unlimited an authority; such as receiving first all letters from the king's ministers abroad, receiving first all visits from foreign ministers, desiring that all applications should be made through him. He was also accused of naming himself with the king, as if he had been his fellow, "the king and I." It is reported, that sometimes he even put his own name before the king's, "ego et rex meus." But this mode of expression is justified by the Latin idiom, and is by far the more elegant way of writing. It is remarkable that his whispering in the king's ear, knowing himself to be affected with venereal distempers, is an article against him. Many of the charges are general, and incapable of proof. Lord Herbert goes so far as to affirm that no man ever fell from so high a station who had so few real crimes objected to him. This opinion is perhaps a little too favourable to the cardinal. Yet the refutation of the articles by Cromwell, and their being rejected by a house of commons, even in this arbitrary reign, is almost a demonstration of Wolsey's innocence. Henry was, no doubt, entirely bent on his destruction, when on his failure by a parliamentary impeachment, he attacked him upon the Statute of Provisors, which afforded him so little just hold on that minister. For that this indictment was subsequent to the attack in parliament, appears by Cavendish's Life of Wolsey, and Stowe, p. 551. and more certainly by the very articles of impeachment themselves. ally Francis, that he sent him an acquittal of near six hundred thousand crowns which that prince owed him. Francis's Italian confederates were not so well satisfied as the king with the peace of Cambray: they were almost wholly abandoned to the will of the emperor; and seemed to have no means of security left but his equity and moderation. Florence, after a brave resistance, was subdued by the Imperial arms, and finally delivered over to the dominion of the family of Medicis. The Venetians were better treated; they were only obliged to relinquish some acquisitions which they had made on the coast of Naples. The duke of Ferrara was allowed to keep possession of all his dominions. Even Francis Sforza obtained the investiture of the duchy of Milan, together with the emperor's niece, daughter to the king of Denmark, in marriage, and was pardoned for all past offences. The emperor in person passed into Italy with a magnificent train, and received the Imperial crown from the hands of the pope at Bologna. He was but twenty-nine years of age; and having already by his vigour and capacity succeeded in every enterprize, and reduced to captivity the two greatest potentates in Europe, the one spiritual, the other temporal, he attracted the eyes of all Europe; and many prognostications were formed of his growing empire.

But though Charles seemed to be prosperous on every side, and though the conquest of Mexico and Peru now began to prevent that scarcity of money under which he had hitherto laboured, he found himself threatened with difficulties in Germany; and his desire of surmounting them was the chief cause of his granting such moderate conditions to the Italian powers. Sultan Solyman, the greatest and most accomplished prince that ever sat on the Ottoman throne, had almost entirely subdued Hungary, had besieged Vienna, with an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men; and, though repulsed, still menaced the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria with conquest and subjection. The Lutheran princes of the empire, finding that liberty of conscience was denied them, had combined in a league for their own defence at Smalcade; and because they protested against the votes passed in the Imperial diet, they thenceforth received the appellation of protestants. Charles had undertaken to reduce them to obedience; and on pretence of securing the purity of religion, he had laid a scheme for aggrandizing his own family, by extending its dominions over all Germany (t).

The friendship of Henry was one material circumstance yet wanting to Charles, in order to ensure success in his ambitious enterprizes; and the king was sufficiently apprized, that the concurrence of that prince would at once remove all the difficulties which lay in the way of his divorce; that point which had long been the object of his most earnest wishes. But besides that the interests of his kingdom seemed to require an alliance with France, his haughty spirit could not submit to a friendship imposed on him by constraint; and as he had ever been accustomed to receive courtship, deference, and solicitation from the greatest potentates, he could ill brook that dependence to which this unhappy affair seemed to have reduced him. Amidst the anxieties with which he was agitated, he was often tempted to break off all connexions with the court of Rome; and though he had been educated in a superstitious reverence to papal authority, it is likely that his personal experience of the duplicity and selfish politics of Clement had served much to open his eyes in that particular. He found his prerogative firmly established at home: he observed that his people were in general much disgusted with clerical usurpations, and disposed to reduce the powers and privileges of the ecclesiastical order: he knew that they had cordially taken part with him in his prosecution of the divorce, and highly resented the unworthy treatment which, after so many services and such devoted attachment, he had received from the court of Rome. Anne Boleyn also could not fail to use all her efforts, and employ every insinuation, in order to make him proceed to extremities against the pope; both as it was the readiest way to her attaining royal dignity, and as her education in the court of the duchess of Alençon, a princess inclined to the reformers, had already disposed her to a belief of the new doctrines. But notwithstanding these inducements, Henry had strong motives still to desire a good agreement with the sovereign pontiff. He apprehended the danger of such great innovations: he dreaded the reproach of heresy: he abhorred all connexions with the Lutherans, the chief opponents of the papal power; and having once exerted himself with such applause, as he imagined, in defence of the Romish communion, he was ashamed to retract his former opinions, and betray from passion such a palpable inconsistency. While he was agitated by these contrary motives, an expedient was proposed, which, as it promised a solution of all difficulties, was embraced by him with the greatest joy and satisfaction.

Dr. Thomas Cranmer, fellow of Jesus College in Cambridge, was a man remarkable in that university for his learning, and still more for the candour and disinterestedness of his temper. He happened one evening by accident to be in company with Gardiner, now secretary of state, and Fox, the king's almoner; and as the business of the divorce became the subject of conversation, he observed that the readiest way, either to quiet Henry's conscience, or extort the pope's consent, would be to consult all the universities of Europe with regard to this controverted point: if they agreed to approve of the king's marriage with Catherine, his remorses would naturally cease; if they condemned it, the pope would find it difficult to resist the solicitations of so great a monarch, seconded by the opinion of all the learned men in Christendom (u). When the king was informed of the proposal, he was delighted with it; and swore, with more alacrity than delicacy, that Cranmer had got the right sow by the ear: he sent for that divine; entered into conversation with him; conceived a high opinion of his virtue and understanding; engaged him to write in defence of the divorce; and immediately, in prosecution of the scheme proposed, employed his agents to collect the judgements of all the learned men in the several European universities (v).

Henry had custom and precedent on his side; the principle by which men are almost wholly governed in their actions and opinions. The marrying of a brother's widow was so unusual, that no other instance of it could be found in any history or record of any Christian nation; and though the popes were accustomed to dispense with more essential precepts of morality, and even permitted marriages within other prohibited degrees, such as those of uncle and niece, the imaginations of men were not yet reconciled to this particular exercise of his authority. Several universities of Europe, therefore, in 1530, without hesitation, as well as without interest or reward (w), gave verdict in the king's favour; not only those of France, Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Toulouse, Angiers, which might be supposed to lie under the influence of their prince, ally to Henry; but also those of Italy, Venice, Ferrara, Padua, even Bologna itself, though under the immediate jurisdiction of Clement. Oxford alone (x), and Cambridge (y), made some difficulty; because these universities, alarmed at the progress of Lutheranism, and dreading a defection from the holy see, scrupled to give their (v) Had the question of Henry's marriage with Catherine been examined by the principles of sound philosophy, exempt from superstition, it seemed not liable to much difficulty. The natural reason why marriage in certain degrees is prohibited by the civil laws, and condemned by the moral sentiments of all nations, is derived from men's care to preserve purity of manners; while they reflect, that if a commerce of love were authorized between near relations, the frequent opportunities of intimate conversation, especially during early youth, would introduce an universal dissoluteness and corruption. But as the customs of countries vary considerably, and open an intercourse more or less restrained between different families, or between the several members of the same family, we find that the moral precept, varying with its cause, is susceptible, without any inconvenience, of very different latitude in the several ages and nations of the world. The extreme delicacy of the Greeks permitted no communication between persons of different sexes, except where they lived under the same roof; and even the apartments of a step mother and her daughters were almost as much shut up against visits from the husband's sons, as against those from any stranger or more distant relation: hence, in that nation it was lawful for a man to marry not only his niece, but his half-sister by the father: a liberty unknown to the Romans and other nations, where a more open intercourse was authorized between the sexes. Reasoning from this principle it would appear, that the ordinary commerce of life among great princes is so obstructed by ceremony and numerous attendants, that no ill consequence would result among them from marrying a brother's widow; especially if the dispensation of the supreme priest be previously required, in order to justify what may in common cases be condemned, and to hinder the precedent from becoming too common and familiar. And as strong motives of public interest and tranquillity may frequently require such alliances between the foreign families, there is the less reason for extending towards them the full rigour of the rule which has place among individuals.

sanction to measures whose consequences, they feared, would prove fatal to the ancient religion. Their opinion, however, conformable to that of the other universities of Europe, was at last obtained; and the king, in order to give more weight to all these authorities, engaged his nobility to write a letter to the pope, recommending his cause to the holy father, and threatening him with the most dangerous consequences in case of a denial of justice (z). The convocations too, both of Canterbury and York, pronounced the king's marriage invalid, irregular, and contrary to the law of God, with which no human power had authority to dispense (a). But Clement, lying still under the influence of the emperor, continued to summon the king to appear, either in person, or by proxy, before his tribunal at Rome; and the king, who knew that he could expect no fair trial there, refused to submit to such a condition, and would not even admit of any citation, which he regarded as a high insult, and a violation of his royal prerogative. The father of Anne Boleyn, created earl of Wiltshire, carried to the pope the king's reasons for not appearing by proxy; and, as the first instance of disrespect from England, refused to kiss his holiness's foot, which he very graciously held out to him for that purpose (b).

The extremities to which Henry was driven, both against the pope and the ecclesiastical order, were very disagreeable to cardinal Wolsey; and it has been said, that as Henry foresaw his opposition, he renewed the prosecution against his former favourite; which, however, we see no reason to assent to, when we consider the abject state to which the cardinal was now reduced. After Wolsey had remained some time at Esher, he was allowed to remove to Richmond, a palace which he had received as a present from Henry, in return for Hampton-Court: but the courtiers, dreading still his vicinity to the king, procured an order for him to remove to his see of York. The cardinal well knew that it would be in vain to resist; and therefore took up his residence at Cawood, in Yorkshire, where he rendered himself extremely popular in the neigbourhood by his affability and hospitality (c); but he was not allowed to remain long unmolested in this retreat. The earl of Northumberland received orders, without regard to Wolsey's ecclesiastical character, to arrest him for high treason, and to conduct him to London, in order to his trial. The cardinal, partly from the fatigues of his journey, partly from the agitation of his anxious mind, was seized with a disorder which turned into a dysentery; and he was able, with some difficulty, to reach Leicester Abbey. When the abbot and the monks advanced to receive him with much respect and reverence, he told them that he was come to lay his bones among them; and he immediately took to his bed, whence he never rose alive. A little before he expired he addressed himself in the following words to sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower, who had him in custody: "I pray you, have me heartily recommended unto his royal majesty; and beseech him, on my behalf, to call to his remembrance all matters that have passed between us from the beginning, especially with regard to his business with the queen; and then will he know in his conscience whether I have offended him.

"He is a prince of a most royal carriage, and hath a princely heart; and rather than he will miss or want any part of his will he will endanger the one half of his kingdom.

"I do assure you, that I have often kneeled before him, sometimes three hours together, to persuade him from his will and appetite; but could not prevail: Had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. But this is the just reward that I must receive for my indulgent pains and study, not regarding my service to God, but only to my prince. Therefore let me advise you, if you be one of the privy-council, as by your wisdom you are fit, take care what you put into the king's head: for you can never put it out again (d)."

On the 6th of January, 1531, a new session of parliament was held, together with a convocation; and the king here gave strong proofs of his extensive authority, as well as of his intention to turn it to the depression of the clergy. As an ancient statute, now almost obsolete, had been employed to ruin Wolsey, and render his exercise of the legatine power criminal, notwithstanding the king's permission; the same law was now turned against the ecclesiastics. It was pretended that every one who had submitted to the legatine court, that is, the whole church, had violated the statute of provisors; and the attorney-general accordingly brought an indictment against them (e). The convocation knew that it would be in vain to oppose reason or equity to the king's arbitrary will, or plead that their ruin would have been the certain consequence of not submitting to Wolsey's commission, which was procured by Henry's consent, and supported by his authority. They chose, therefore, to throw themselves on the mercy of their sovereign; and they agreed to pay one hundred and eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty pounds for a pardon (f). A confession was likewise extorted from them, that "the king was the protector and the supreme head of the church and clergy of England;" though some of them had the dexterity to get a clause inserted which invalidated the whole submission, and which ran in these terms, "in so far as is permitted by the law of Christ."

The commons, finding that a pardon was deemed requisite for the clergy, began to be apprehensive for themselves, lest either they should be afterwards brought into trouble on account of their submission to the legatine court, or a supply in like manner be extorted from them in return for their pardon. They therefore petitioned the king to grant a remission to his lay subjects; but they met with a repulse. He told them, that if he ever chose to forgive their offence, it would be from his own goodness, not from their application, lest he should seem to be compelled to it. Some time after, when they despaired of obtaining this concession, he was pleased to issue a pardon to the laity; and the commons expressed great gratitude for that act of clemency (g). By this strict execution of the statute of provisors, a great part of the profit, and still more of the power of the court of Rome was cut off; and the connexions between the pope and the English clergy were in some measure dissolved.

The next session found both king and parliament in the same disposition. An act was passed, on the 15th of January, 1532, against levying the annates or first fruits (h); being a year's rent of all the bishopries that fell vacant (i). This session the commons presented to the king a long complaint against the abuses and oppressions of the ecclesiastical courts; and they were proceeding to enact laws for remedying them, when a difference arose, which put an end to the session before the parliament had finished all their business. It was become a custom for men to make such settlements or trust-deeds of their lands by will, that they defrauded not only the king, but all other lords, of their wards, marriages, and reliefs; and by the same artifice the king was deprived of his premier seisin, and the profits of the livery, which were no inconsiderable branches of his revenue. Henry caused a bill to be drawn to moderate, not remedy altogether, this abuse: he was con(d) Thus died cardinal Wolsey, on the 29th of November, 1530, whose character seems to have contained as singular a variety as the fortune to which he was exposed. The obstinacy and violence of the king's temper may alleviate much of the blame which some of his favourite's measures have undergone; and when we consider, that the subsequent part of Henry's reign was much more criminal than that which had been directed by Wolsey's counsels, we shall be inclined to suspect those historians of partiality, who have endeavoured to load the memory of this minister with such violent reproaches. If in foreign politics he sometimes employed his influence over the king for his private purposes rather than for his master's service, which he boasted he had solely at heart; we must remember that he had in view the papal throne; a dignity which, had he attained it, would have enabled him to make Henry a suitable return for all his favours. The cardinal of Amboise, whose memory is respected in France, always made this apology for his own conduct, which was in some respect similar to Wolsey's; and we have reason to think that Henry was well acquainted with the views by which his minister was influenced, and took a pride in promoting them. He much regretted his death, when informed of it; and always spoke favourably of his memory: a proof that humour more than reason, or any discovery of treachery, had occasioned the last persecutions against him.

(i) This tax was imposed by the court of Rome for granting bulls to the new prelates, and was found to amount to considerable sums. Since the second of Henry VII. no less than one hundred and sixty thousand pounds had been transmitted to Rome on account of this claim; which the parliament, therefore, reduced to five per cent. on all the episcopal benefices. The better to keep the pope in awe, the king was entrusted with a power of regulating these payments, and of confirming or infringing this act at his pleasure: and it was voted, that any censures which should be passed by the court of Rome on account of that law should be entirely disregarded; and that mass should be said, and the sacraments administered, as if no such censures had been issued.

tented that every man should have the liberty of disposing in this manner of the half of his land; and he told the parliament in plain terms, "If they would not take a reasonable thing when it was offered, he would search out the extremity of the law, and then would not offer them so much again." The lords, as usual, came willingly into his terms; but the commons rejected the bill: a singular instance, where Henry might see that his power and authority, though extensive, had yet some boundaries. The commons, however, found reason to repent of their victory. The king made good his threats; he called together the judges and ablest lawyers, who argued the question in chancery; and it was decided, that a man could not by law bequeath any part of his lands in prejudice of his rightful heir (k).

The parliament being again assembled after a short prorogation, on the 10th of April, the king caused two oaths to be read to them, namely, that which the bishops took to the pope, and that to the king, on their installation; and as a contradiction might be suspected between them, while the prelates seemed to swear allegiance to two sovereigns (l), the parliament shewed their intention of abolishing the oath to the pope, when their proceedings were suddenly stopped by the breaking out of the plague at Westminster, which occasioned a prorogation (m).

After the prorogation, sir Thomas More, the chancellor, perceiving that all the measures of the king and parliament led to a breach with the church of Rome, and to an alteration of religion, with which his principles would not permit him to concur, desired leave to resign the great seal; and he descended from this high station with more joy and alacrity than he had mounted up to it. The austerity of this man's virtue, and the sanctity of his manners, had no wise encroached on the gentleness of his temper, or even diminished that frolic and gaiety to which he was naturally inclined. He sported with all the varieties of fortune into which he was thrown; and neither the pride naturally attending a high station, nor the melancholy incident to poverty and retreat, could ever lay hold of his serene and equal spirit. While his family discovered symptoms of sorrow on laying down the grandeur and magnificence to which they had been accustomed, he drew a subject of mirth from their distresses; and made them ashamed of losing even a moment's cheerfulness on account of such trivial misfortunes (n). The king, who had entertained a high opinion of his virtue, received his resignation with some difficulty; and he delivered the great seal soon after to sir Thomas Audley.

During these transactions in England, and these invasions of the papal and ecclesiastical authority, the court of Rome was not without solicitude; and she entertained just apprehensions of losing entirely her authority in England; the kingdom which of all others had long been the most devoted to the holy see, and which had yielded it the most ample revenue. While the Imperial cardinals pushed Clement to proceed to extremities against the king, his more moderate and impartial counsellors represented to him the indignity of his proceedings; that a great monarch, who had signalised himself both by his pen and his sword in the cause of the pope, should be denied a favour which he demanded on such just grounds, and which had scarcely ever before been refused to any person of his rank and station. Notwithstanding these remonstrances, the queen's appeal was received at Rome; the king was cited to appear; and several consistories were held to examine the validity of their marriage. Henry was determined not to send any proxy to plead his cause before this court: he only dispatched sir Edward Kaine and Dr. Bonner, in quality of excusators, so they were called, to carry his apology for not paying that deference to the papal authority. The prerogatives of his crown, he said, must be sacrificed if he allowed appeals from his own kingdom; and as the question regarded conscience, not power or interest, no proxy could supply his place, or convey that satisfaction which the dictates of his own mind alone could confer. In order to support himself in this measure, and add greater security to his intended defection from Rome, he procured an interview with Francis at Boulogne and Calais, on the 11th of October, where he renewed his personal friendship as well as public alliance with that monarch, and concerted all measures for their mutual defence. He even employed arguments, by which he believed he had persuaded Francis to imitate his example, in withdrawing his obedience from the bishop of Rome, and administering ecclesiastical affairs without having farther recourse to that see. And being now fully determined in his own mind, as well as resolute to stand all consequences, he privately celebrated his marriage on the 14th of November, with Anne Boleyn, whom he had previously created marchioness of Pembroke. Rowland Lee, soon after raised to the bishopric of Coventry, officiated at the marriage. The duke of Norfolk, uncle to the new queen, her father, mother, and brother, together with Dr. Cranmer, were present at the ceremony (o). Anne became pregnant soon after her marriage; and this event both gave great satisfaction to the king, and was regarded by the people as a strong proof of the queen's former modesty and virtue.

On the 4th of February, 1533, the parliament was again assembled; and Henry, in conjunction with the great council of the nation, proceeded still in those gradual and secure steps by which they loosened their connexions with the see of Rome, and repressed the usurpations of the Roman pontiff. An act was made against all appeals to Rome in causes of matrimony, divorces, wills, and other suits cognizable in ecclesiastical courts; appeals esteemed dishonourable to the kingdom, by subjecting it to a foreign jurisdiction; and found to be very vexatious, by the expence and the delay of justice which necessarily attended them (p). The more to show his disregard to the pope, Henry, finding the new queen's pregnancy to advance, on the 12th of April, publicly owned his marriage; and in order to remove all doubts with regard to its lawfulness, he prepared measures for declaring by a formal sentence the invalidity of his marriage with Catherine; a sentence which ought naturally to have preceded his espousing of Anne Boleyn (q).

The king, even amidst his scruples and remorses on account of his first marriage, had always treated Catherine with respect and distinction; and he endeavoured, by every soft and persuasive art, to engage her to depart from her appeal to Rome, and her opposition to his divorce. Finding her obstinate in maintaining the justice of her cause, he had totally forborne all visits and intercourse with her; and had desired her to make choice of any one of his palaces in which she should please to reside. She had fixed her abode for some time at Ampthill, near Dunstable; and it was in this latter town that Cranmer, now created archbishop of Canterbury on the death of Warham (r), (May 10), was appointed to open his court for (m) It is remarkable that one Temse ventured this session to move, that the house should address the king to take back the queen, and stop the prosecution of his divorce. This motion made the king send for sir Thomas Audley, the speaker; and explain to him the scruples with which his conscience had long been burdened; scruples, he said, which had proceeded from no wanton appetite, which had arisen after the fervours of youth were past, and which were confirmed by the concurring sentiments of all the learned societies in Europe. Except in Spain and Portugal, he added, it was never heard of that any man had espoused two sisters; but he himself had the misfortune, he believed, to be the first Christian man that had ever married his brother's widow. Herbert. Hall, fol. 205.

(n) We are told by lord Herbert, who represents him as a man of learning, humour, moderation, and integrity, that, having retired to Chelsea, he dismissed his servants; made a present of his fool to the lord mayor; provoked his wife, (whose mind was, probably, much weaker than his own), by some sarcastic jokes, to leave him; and lived with his daughters upon the income of a small estate, not exceeding one hundred pounds per annum, and the interest of an inconsiderable sum of money.

(r) Bishop Burnet has given us an account of the number of bulls requisite for Cranmer's installation. By one bull, directed to the king, he is upon the royal nomination made archbishop of Canterbury. By a second directed to himself, he is also made archbishop. By a third he is absolved from all censures. A fourth is directed to the suffragans, requiring them to receive and acknowledge him as archbishop. A fifth to the dean and chapter, to the same purpose. A sixth to the clergy of Canterbury. A seventh to all the laity in his see. An eighth to all that held lands of it. By a ninth he was ordered to be consecrated, taking the oath that was in the pontifical. By a tenth the pall was sent him. By an eleventh, the archbishop of York and the bishop of London were required to put it on him. These were so many devices to draw fees to offices, which the popes had erected and disposed of for money. It may be worth observing, that Cranmer, before he took the oath to the pope, made a protestation, that he did not intend thereby to restrain himself from any thing that he was bound to, either by his duty to God, the king, or the country; and that he renounced every thing in it that was contrary to any of these. This was the invention of some casuist, and not very compatible with that strict sincerity, and that scrupulous conscience of which Cranmer made profession. Collier, vol. ii. in Coll. examining examining the validity of her marriage. The near neighbourhood of the place was chosen, in order to deprive her of all plea of ignorance; and as she made no answer to the citation, either by herself or proxy, she was declared contumacious; and the primate proceeded to the examination of the cause. The evidences of Arthur's consummation of his marriage were anew produced; the opinions of the universities were read, together with the judgement pronounced two years before by the convocations both of Canterbury and York; and after these preliminary steps, Cranmer proceeded to a sentence, and annulled the king's marriage with Catherine as unlawful and invalid. By a subsequent sentence he ratified the marriage with Anne Boleyn, who soon after was publicly crowned queen, with all the pomp and dignity suited to that ceremony (s). To complete the king's satisfaction on the conclusion of this intricate and vexatious affair, she was safely delivered, on the 7th of September, 1533, of a daughter, who received the name of Elizabeth, and who afterwards swayed the English sceptre with great renown and felicity. Henry was so much delighted with the birth of this child, that soon after he conferred on her the title of princess of Wales (t); a step somewhat irregular, as she could only be presumptive, not apparent heir of the crown. But he had, during his former marriage, thought proper to honour his daughter Mary with that title; and he was determined to bestow on the offspring of his present marriage the same mark of distinction, as well as to exclude the elder princess from all hopes of the succession. His regard for the new queen seemed rather to increase than diminish by his marriage; and all men expected to see the entire ascendant of one who had mounted a throne, from which her birth had set her at so great a distance, and who by a proper mixture of severity and indulgence had long managed so intractable a spirit as that of Henry. In order to efface as much as possible all marks of his first marriage, lord Mountjoy was sent to the unfortunate Catherine, to inform her that she was thenceforth to be treated only as princess dowager of Wales; and all means were employed to make her acquiesce in that determination. But she continued obstinate in maintaining the validity of her marriage; and she would not admit any person to her presence who did not approach her with the accustomed ceremonial. Henry, forgetting his wonted generosity towards her, employed menaces against such of her servants as complied with her commands in this particular; but all his threats were not able to make her relinquish her title and pretensions (u).

When intelligence was conveyed to Rome of these transactions, so injurious to the authority and reputation of the holy see, the conclave was in a rage, and all the cardinals of the Imperial faction urged the pope to proceed to a definitive sentence, and to dart his spiritual thunders against Henry. But Clement proceeded no farther than to declare the nullity of Cranmer's sentence, as well as that of Henry's second marriage; threatening him with excommunication, if, before the first of November ensuing, he did not replace every thing in the condition in which it formerly stood (v). An event had happened, from which the pontiff expected a more amicable conclusion of the difference, and which hindered him from carrying matters to extremity against the king.

The pope had claims upon the duchy of Ferrara for the sovereignty of Reggio and Modena (w); and, having submitted his pretensions to the arbitration of the emperor, he was surprized to find a sentence pronounced against him. Enraged at this disappointment, he hearkened to proposals of amity from Francis; and when that monarch made overtures of marrying Henry, duke of Orleans, his second son, to Catherine de Medici, daughter of Laurence de Medici, cousin to the pope, Clement gladly embraced an alliance, by which his family was so much honoured. An interview was even appointed between the pope and French king at Marseilles, which took place in October; and Francis, as a common friend, there employed his good offices in mediating an accommodation between his new ally and the king of England.

If this connexion of France with the court of Rome had taken place but a few years sooner, there would have been little difficulty in adjusting the quarrel with Henry. The king's request was an ordinary one; and the same plenary power of the pope, which had granted a dispensation for his espousing of Catherine, could easily have annulled the marriage. But in the progress of the quarrel the state of affairs was much changed on both sides. Henry had shaken off much of that reverence which he had early imbibed for the apostolic see; and finding that his subjects of all ranks had taken part with him, and willingly complied with his measures for breaking off foreign dependence, he had begun to relish his spiritual authority, and would scarcely, it was apprehended, be induced to renew his submissions to the Roman pontiff. The pope, on the other hand, now ran a manifest risque of infringing his authority by a compliance with the king; and as a sentence of divorce could no longer be rested on nullities in Julius's bull, but would be construed as an acknowledgement of papal usurpations, it was foreseen that the Lutherans would thence take occasion of triumph, and would persevere more obstinately in their present principles. But notwithstanding these obstacles, Francis did not despair of mediating an agreement. He observed that the king had still some remains of prejudice in favour of the catholic church, and was apprehensive of the consequences which might ensue from too violent innovations. He saw the interest that Clement had in preserving the obedience of England, which was one of the richest jewels in the papal crown. And he hoped that these motives on both sides would facilitate a mutual agreement, and would forward the effects of his good offices.

Francis first prevailed on the pope to promise, that if Henry would send a proxy to Rome, and thereby submit his cause to the holy see, he should appoint commissioners to meet at Cambray, and form the process; and he should immediately afterwards pronounce the sentence of divorce required of him. Du Bellay, bishop of Paris, was next dispatched to London, and obtained a promise from the king, that he would submit his cause to the Roman consistory, provided the cardinals of the Imperial faction were excluded from it. The prelate carried this verbal promise to Rome; and the pope agreed, that if the king would sign a written agreement to the same purpose, his demands should be fully complied with. A day was appointed for the return of the messengers; and all Europe regarded this affair, which had threatened a violent rupture between England and the Romish church, as drawing towards an amicable conclusion (x). But the greatest affairs often depend on the most frivolous incidents. The courier who carried the king's written promise was detained beyond the day appointed; news was brought to Rome that a libel had been published in England against the court of Rome, and a farce acted before the king in derision of the pope and cardinals (y). Hereupon, the pope and cardinals, on the 23rd of March, 1534, entered into the consistory enflamed with anger; and by a precipitate sentence the marriage of Henry and Catherine was pronounced valid, and Henry declared to be excommunicated if he refused to adhere to it. Two days after the courier arrived; and Clement, who had been hurried from his usual prudence, found, that though he heartily repented of this hasty measure, it would be difficult for him to retract it, or replace affairs on the same footing as before.

We cannot imagine that the pope, had he conducted himself with ever so great moderation and temper, could hope, during the life-time of Henry, to have regained much authority or influence in England. That monarch was of a temper both impetuous and obstinate; and having proceeded so far in throwing off the papal yoke, he never could again have been brought tamely to bend his neck to it. Even at the time when he was negociating a reconciliation with the court of Rome, he either entertained so little hopes of success, or was so indifferent about the event, that he had assembled a parliament, which met on the 15th of January, 1534, and continued to enact laws totally destructive of the papal authority. The people had been prepared by degrees for this great innovation. Each preceding session had retrenched somewhat from the power and profits of the pontiff. Care had been taken, during some years, to teach the nation that a general council was much superior to a pope. But now a bishop preached every Sunday at Paul's cross, in order to inculcate the doctrine, that the pope was entitled to no authority at all beyond the bounds of his own diocese (z). The proceedings of the parliament shewed that they had entirely adopted this opinion; and there is reason to believe that the king, after having procured a favourable sentence from Rome, which would have removed all doubts with regard to his second marriage and the succession, might indeed have lived on terms of civility with the Roman pontiff, but never would have surrendered to him any considerable share of his assumed prerogative. The importance of the laws passed this session, even before intelligence arrived of the violent resolutions taken at Rome, is sufficient to justify this opinion.

All payments made to the apostolic chamber; all provisions, bulls, dispensations, were abolished: monasteries were subjected to the visitation and government of the king alone: the law for punishing heretics was moderated; the ordinary was prohibited from imprisoning or trying any person upon suspicion alone, without presentment by two lawful witnesses; and it was declared, that to speak against the pope's authority was no heresy: bishops were to be appointed by a congè d'elire from the crown, or in case of the dean and chapter's refusal, by letters patent; and no recourse was to be had to Rome for palls, bulls, or provisions: Campeggio and Ghinucci, two Italians, were deprived of the bishoprics of Salisbury and Worcester, which they had hitherto enjoyed (a): the law which had been formerly made against paying annates, or first fruits, but which had been left in the king's power to suspend or enforce, was finally established: and a submission which was exacted two years before from the clergy, and which had been obtained with great difficulty, received this session the sanction of parliament (b). In this submission the clergy acknowledged that convocations ought to be assembled by the king's authority only; they promised to enact no new canons without his consent; and they agreed that he should appoint thirty-two commissioners, in order to examine the old canons, and abrogate such as should be found prejudicial to his royal prerogative (c). An appeal was also allowed from the bishop's court to the king in Chancery.

But the most important law passed this session, was that which regulated the succession to the crown: the marriage of the king with Catherine was declared unlawful, void, and of no effect: the primate's sentence, annulling it, was ratified; and the marriage with queen Anne was established and confirmed. The crown was appointed to descend to the issue of this marriage, and failing them to the king's heirs for ever. An oath likewise was enjoined to be taken in favour of this order of succession, under the penalty of imprisonment during the king's pleasure, and forfeiture of goods and chattels. And all slander against the king, queen, or their issue, was subjected to the penalty of misprision of treason. After these compliances the parliament was prorogued; and those acts, so contemptuous towards the pope, and so destructive of his authority, were passed at the very time that Clement pronounced his hasty sentence against the king. Henry's resentment against Catherine, on account of her obstinacy, is supposed to have been the reason why he excluded her daughter from all hopes of succeeding to the crown; contrary to his first intentions when he began the process of divorce, and of dispensation for a second marriage.

We may here observe, that the king found his ecclesiastical subjects as compliant as the laity. The convocation ordered that the act against appeals to Rome, together with the king's appeal from the pope to a general council, should be affixed to the doors of all the churches in the kingdom; and they voted that the bishop of Rome had by the law of God no more jurisdiction in England than any other foreign bishop; and that the authority which he and his predecessors had there exercised was only by usurpation, and by the sufferance of English princes. Four persons alone opposed this vote in the house of commons, and one doubted. It passed unanimously in the house of lords. The bishops went so far in their complaisance, that they took out new commissions from the crown, in which all their spiritual and episcopal authority was expressly affirmed to be derived ultimately from the civil magistrate, and to be entirely dependent on the king's pleasure (d).

The oath which related to the succession was generally taken throughout the kingdom. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and sir Thomas More, were the only persons of note that entertained scruples with regard to its legality. Fisher was disliked on account of some practices into which his credulity, rather than any bad intentions, seems to have betrayed him. But More was the person of greatest reputation in the kingdom for virtue and integrity; and as it was believed that his authority would have influence on the sentiments of others, great pains were taken to convince him of the lawfulness of the oath. He declared that he had no scruple with regard to the succession, and thought that the parliament had full power to settle it: he offered to draw an oath himself, which would ensure his allegiance to the heir appointed; but he refused the oath prescribed by law; because the preamble of that oath asserted the legality of the king's marriage with Anne, and thereby implied that his former marriage with Catherine was unlawful and invalid. Cranmer the primate, and Cromwell, now secretary of state, who highly loved and esteemed More, entreated him to lay aside his scruples; and their friendly importunity seemed to weigh more with him than all the penalties attending his refusal (e). He persisted, however, in a mild though firm manner, to maintain his resolution; and the king, irritated against him as well as Fisher, ordered both to be indicted upon the statute, and committed prisoners to the Tower.

The parliament being again assembled, on the 3rd of November, conferred on the king the title of the only supreme head on earth of the church of England; as they had already invested him with all the real power belonging to it. In this memorable act the parliament granted him power, or rather acknowledged his inherent power, "to visit, and repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, or amend all errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, which fell under any spiritual authority or jurisdiction (f)." They also declared it treason to attempt, imagine, or speak evil against the king, queen, or his heirs, or to endeavour depriving them of their dignities or titles. They gave him a right to all the annates and tithes of benefices, which had formerly been paid to the court of Rome. They granted him a subsidy and a fifteenth. They attainted More and Fisher for misprision of treason. And they completed the union of England and Wales, by giving all the benefit of the English laws to that principality.

Thus the authority of the popes, like all exorbitant power, was ruined by the excess of its acquisitions, and by stretching its pretensions beyond what it was possible for any human principles or prepossessions to sustain. Indulgencies had in former ages tended extremely to enrich the holy see; but being openly abused, they served to excite the first commotions and opposition in Germany. The prerogative of granting dispensations had also contributed much to attach all the sovereign princes and great families in Europe to the papal authority; but meeting with an unlucky concurrence of circumstances, was now the cause why England separated herself from the Romish communion. The acknowledgement of the king's supremacy introduced there a greater simplicity in the government, by uniting the spiritual with the civil power, and preventing disputes about limits, which never could exactly be determined, between the contending jurisdictions. A way was also prepared for checking the exorbitances of superstition, and breaking those shackles by which all human reason, policy, and industry had so long been encumbered. The prince, it may be supposed, being head of the religion, as well as of the temporal jurisdiction of the kingdom, though he might sometimes employ the former as an engine of government, had no interest, like the Roman pontiff, in nourishing its excessive growth; and, except when blinded by his own ignorance or bigotry, would be sure to retain it within tolerable limits, and prevent its abuses. And on the whole, there followed from this revolution many beneficial consequences; though perhaps neither foreseen nor intended by the persons who had the chief hand in conducting it.

While Henry proceeded with so much order and tranquility in changing the national religion, and while his authority seemed entirely secure in England, he was held in some inquietude by the state of affairs in Ireland and in Scotland.

The earl of Kildare was deputy of Ireland, under the duke of Richmond, the king's natural son, who bore the title of lieutenant; and as Kildare was accused of some violences against the family of Ossory, his hereditary enemies, he was summoned to answer for his conduct. He left his authority in the hands of his son, who hearing that his father was thrown into prison, and was in danger of his life, immediately took up arms, and joining himself to O'Neal, O'Carrol, and other Irish nobility, committed many ravages, murdered Allen archbishop of Dublin, and laid siege to that city. Kildare meanwhile died in prison, and his son, persevering in his revolt, made applications to the emperor, who promised him assistance. The king was obliged to send over some forces to Ireland, which so harassed the rebels, that this young nobleman, finding the emperor emperor backward in fulfilling his promises, was reduced to the necessity of surrendering himself prisoner to lord Leonard Gray, the new deputy, brother to the marquis of Dorset. He was carried over to England, together with his five uncles; and after trial and conviction they were all brought to execution; though two of the uncles, in order to save the family, had pretended to join the king's party.

The earl of Angus had acquired the entire ascendant in Scotland; and having got possession of the king's person, then in early youth, he was able, by means of that advantage, and by employing the power of his own family, to retain the reins of government. The queen-dowager, however, his consort, bred him great disturbance. For having separated herself from him, on account of some jealousies and disgusts, and having procured a divorce, she had married another man of quality, of the name of Stuart; and she joined all the discontented nobility who opposed Angus's authority. James himself was dissatisfied with the slavery to which he was reduced; and by secret correspondence he incited first Walter Scot, then the earl of Lenox, to attempt by force of arms the freeing him from the hands of Angus. Both enterprizes failed of success; but James, impatient of restraint, found means at last of escaping to Stirling, where his mother then resided; and having summoned all the nobility to attend him, he overturned the authority of the Douglasses, and obliged Angus and his brother to fly into England, where they were protected by Henry. The king of Scotland, being now arrived at years of majority, took the government into his own hands; and employed himself with great spirit and valour in repressing those feuds, ravages, and disorders, which, though they disturbed the course of public justice, served to support the martial spirit of the Scots, and contributed by that means to maintain national independency. He was desirous of renewing the ancient league with the French nation; but finding Francis in close union with England, and on that account somewhat cold in hearkening to his proposals, he received the more favourably the advances of the emperor, who hoped by means of such an ally to breed disturbance to England. He offered the Scottish king the choice of three princesses, his own near relations, and all of the name of Mary; his sister, the dowager of Hungary, his niece, a daughter of Portugal, or his cousin, the daughter of Henry, whom he pretended to dispose of unknown to her father. James was more inclined to the latter proposal, had it not, upon reflection, been found impracticable; and his natural propensity to France at last prevailed over all other considerations. The alliance with Francis necessarily engaged James to maintain peace with England. But though invited by his uncle Henry to confer with him at Newcastle, and concert common measures for repressing the ecclesiastics in both kingdoms, and shaking off the yoke of Rome, he could not be prevailed on, by entering England, to put himself in the king's power. In order to have a pretext for refusing the conference, he applied to the pope, and obtained a brief, forbidding him to engage in any personal negociations with an enemy of the holy see. From these measures Henry easily concluded, that he could very little depend on the friendship of his nephew. But those events did not take place till some time after the period we are at present treating of.

The ancient and almost uninterrupted opposition of interests between the laity and clergy in England, and between the English clergy and the court of Rome, had sufficiently prepared the nation for a breach with the sovereign pontiff; and men had penetration enough to discover abuses, which were plainly calculated for the temporal advantages of the hierarchy, and which they found destructive of their own. These subjects seemed proportioned to human understanding; and even the people, who felt the power of interest in their own breast, could perceive the purpose of those numerous inventions which the interested spirit of the Roman pontiff had introduced into religion. But when the reformers proceeded thence to dispute concerning the nature of the sacraments, the operations of grace, the terms of acceptance with the Deity, men were thrown into amazement, and were during some time at a loss how to chuse their party. The profound ignorance in which both the clergy and laity formerly lived, and their freedom from theological altercations, had produced a sincere but indolent acquiescence in received opinions; and the multitude were neither attached to them by topics of reasoning, nor by those prejudices and antipathies against opponents, which have ever a more natural and powerful influence over them. As soon, therefore, as a new opinion was advanced, supported by such an authority as to call up their attention, they felt their capacity totally unfitted for such disquisitions; and they perpetually fluctuated between the contending parties. Hence the quick and violent movements by which the people were agitated, even in the most opposite directions: hence their seeming prostitution, in sacrificing to present power the most sacred principles: and hence the rapid progress during some time, and the sudden as well as entire check soon after, of the new doctrines. When men were once settled in their particular sects, and had fortified themselves in a habitual detestation of those who were denominated heretics, they adhered with more obstinacy to the principles of their education; and the limits of the two religions thenceforth remained fixed and unchangeable.

Nothing more forwarded the first progress of the reformers, than the offer which they made, of submitting all religious doctrines to private judgement, and the summons given every one to examine the principles formerly imposed upon him. Though the multitude were totally unqualified for this undertaking, they yet were highly pleased with it. They fancied that they were exercising their judgement, while they opposed to the prejudices of ancient authority more powerful prejudices of another kind. The novelty itself of the doctrines; the pleasure of an imaginary triumph in dispute; the fervent zeal of the reformed preachers; their patience and even alacrity in suffering persecution, death, and torments; a disgust at the restraints of the old religion; an indignation against the tyranny and interested spirit of the ecclesiastics; these motives were prevalent with the people, and by such considerations were men so generally induced during that age to throw off the religion of their ancestors.

But in proportion as the practice of submitting religion to private judgement was acceptable to the people, it appeared in some respects dangerous to the rights of sovereigns, and seemed to destroy that implicit obedience on which the authority of the civil magistrate is chiefly founded. The very precedent, of shaking so ancient and deep-founded an establishment as that of the Romish hierarchy might, it was apprehended, prepare the way for other innovations. The republican spirit which naturally took place among the reformers increased this jealousy. The furious insurrections of the populace, excited by Muntzer and other anabaptists in Germany (g), furnished a new pretence for decrying the reformation.

No prince in Europe was possessed of such absolute authority as Henry, not even the pope himself, in his own capital, where he united both the civil and ecclesiastical powers; and there was small likelihood that any doctrine which lay under the imputation of encouraging sedition could ever pretend to his favour and countenance. But besides this political jealousy, there was another reason which inspired Henry with an aversion to the reformers. He had early declared his sentiments against Luther; and having entered the lists in those scholastic quarrels, he had received from his courtiers and theologians infinite applause for his performance. Elated by this imaginary success, he had entertained the most lofty opinion of his own learning; and he received with contempt, any contradiction to his sentiments. Luther also had treated in an indecent manner his royal antagonist; and though he afterwards apologized for his former expressions, he never could efface the hatred which the king had conceived against him and his doctrines.

Henry's ministers and courtiers were of as motley a character as his conduct; and seemed to waver between the ancient and the new religion. The queen, engaged by interest as well as inclination, favoured the cause of the reformers: Cromwell, who was created secretary of state, advancing in the king's confidence, had embraced the same views. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, had secretly adopted the protestant tenets. On the other hand, the duke of Norfolk adhered to the ancient faith; and by his high rank he had great authority in the king's council: Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, was one of the same party. All these ministers disguised their particular opinions.

The king's ambiguous conduct, though it kept the courtiers in awe, served principally to encourage the protestant doctrine among his subjects, and promoted that spirit of innovation with which the age was generally seized, and which nothing but an entire uniformity, as well as a steady severity in the administration, could be able to repress.

About this time several monks were detected in a conspiracy, which, as it might have proved more dangerous to the king, was on its discovery attended with more fatal consequences to themselves. Elizabeth Barton, of Aldington, in Kent, commonly called the Holy Maid of Kent, had been subject to hysterical fits, which threw her body into unusual convulsions; and having produced an equal disorder in her mind, made her utter strange sayings, which, as she was scarcely conscious of them during the time, had soon after entirely escaped her memory. The silly people in the neighbourhood were struck with these appearances, which they imagined to be supernatural; and Richard Masters, vicar of the parish, a designing fellow, founded on them a project from which he hoped to acquire both profit and consideration. He went to archbishop Warham, who was then alive; and having given him an account of Elizabeth's revelations, he so far wrought on that prudent but superstitious prelate, as to receive from him orders to watch her in her trances, and carefully to note down all her future sayings. The regard paid her by a person of so exalted a rank soon rendered her still more the object of attention to the neighbourhood; and Masters easily persuaded them, as well as the maid herself, that her ravings were inspirations of the Holy Ghost. Knavery, as is usual, soon after succeeding to delusion, she learned to counterfeit trances; and she then uttered, in an extraordinary tone, such speeches as were dictated to her by her spiritual director. Masters associated with him Dr. Bocking, a canon of Canterbury; and their design was to raise the credit of an image of the Virgin, which stood in a chapel belonging to Masters, and to draw to it such pilgrims as usually frequented the more famous images and reliques. In prosecution of this design, Elizabeth pretended revelations, which directed her to have recourse to that image for a cure; and being brought before it, in the presence of a great multitude, she fell anew into convulsions; and after distorting her limbs and countenance during a competent time, she affected to have obtained a perfect recovery by the intercession of the Virgin (h). This miracle was soon noised abroad; and the two priests, finding the imposture to succeed beyond their own expectations, began to extend their views, and to lay the foundation of more important enterprizes. They taught their penitent to declaim against the new doctrines, which she denominated heresy; against innovations in ecclesiastical government; and against the king's intended divorce from Catherine. She went so far as to assert, that if he prosecuted that design, and married another, he should not be a king a month longer, and should not an hour longer enjoy the favour of the Almighty, but should die the death of a villain. Many monks throughout England, either from folly or roguery, or from faction, which is often a complication of both, entered into the delusion; and one Deering, a frier, wrote a book of the revelations and prophecies of Elizabeth (i). Miracles were daily added to increase the wonder; and the pulpit every where resounded with accounts of the sanctity and inspirations of the new prophetess. Messages were carried from her to queen Catherine, by which that princess was exhorted to persist in her opposition to the divorce; the pope's ambassadors gave encouragement to the popular credulity; and even Fisher bishop of Rochester, though a man of sense and learning, was carried away by an opinion so favourable to the party which he had espoused (k). The king at last began to think the matter worthy of his attention; and having ordered Elizabeth and her accomplices to be arrested, he brought them before the Star Chamber, where they freely, without being put to the torture, made confession of their guilt. The parliament, in the session held the beginning of this year, passed an act of attainder against some who were engaged in this treasonable imposture (l); and Elizabeth herself, Masters, Bocking, Deering, Rich, Risby, Gold, suffered for their crime. The bishop of Rochester, Abel, Addison, Lawrence, and others, were condemned for misprision of treason; because they had not discovered some criminal speeches which they heard from Elizabeth (m): and they were thrown into prison. The better to undeceive the multitude, the forgery of many of the prophetess's miracles were detected; and even the scandalous prostitution of her manners was laid open to the public. Those passions which so naturally insinuate themselves amidst the warm intimacies maintained by the devotees of different sexes, had taken place between Elizabeth and her confederates; and it was found, that a door to her dormitory, which was said to have been miraculously opened, in order to give her access to the chapel, for the sake of frequent converse with heaven, had been contrived by Bocking and Masters for purposes of a very different nature.

The detection of this imposture, attended with so many odious circumstances, both hurt the credit of the ecclesiastics, particularly the monks, and instigated the king to take vengeance on them. He suppressed three monasteries of the Observantine friers; and finding that little clamour was excited by this act of power, he was the more encouraged to lay his rapacious hands on the remainder. Meanwhile, he exercised punishment on individuals who were obnoxious to him. The parliament had made it treason to endeavour depriving the king of his dignity or titles; they had lately added to his other titles, that of supreme head of the church: it was inferred, that to deny his supremacy was treason; and many priors and ecclesiastics lost their lives for this new species of guilt. It was certainly a high instance of tyranny to punish the mere delivery of a political opinion, especially one that nowise affected the king's temporal right, as a capital offence, though attended with no overt act; and the parliament in passing this law had overlooked all the principles by which a civilized, much more a free people should be governed: but the violence of changing so suddenly the whole system of government, and making it treason to deny what during many ages it had been heresy to assert, is an event which may appear somewhat extraordinary. Even the stern unrelenting mind of Henry was at first shocked with these sanguinary measures; and he went so far as to change his garb and dress; pretending sorrow for the necessity by which he was pushed to such extremities. Still impelled, however, by his violent temper, and desirous of striking a terror into the whole nation, he proceeded, by making examples of Fisher and More, to consummate his lawless tyranny.

John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, was a prelate eminent for learning and morals, still more than for his ecclesiastical dignities, and for the high favour which he had long enjoyed with the king. When he was thrown into prison on account of his refusing the oath which regarded the succession, and his concealment of Elizabeth Barton's treasonable speeches, he had not only been deprived of all his revenues, but stripped of his very clothes, and without consideration of his extreme age, he was allowed nothing but rags, which scarcely sufficed to cover his nakedness (n). In this condition he lay in prison above a twelvemonth; when the pope, willing to recompense the sufferings of so faithful an adherent, created him a cardinal; though Fisher was so indifferent about that dignity, that even if the purple were lying at his feet, he declared that he would not stoop to take it. This promotion of a man, merely for his opposition to royal authority, roused the indignation of the king; and he resolved to make the innocent person feel the effects of his resentment. Fisher was indicted for denying the king's supremacy, was tried, condemned, and beheaded, on the 22nd of June, 1535.

The execution of this prelate was intended as a warning to More, whose compliance, on account of his great authority both abroad and at home, and his high reputation for learning and virtue, was anxiously desired by the king. That prince also bore as great personal affection and regard to More, as his imperious mind, the sport of passions, was susceptible of towards a man who in any particular opposed his violent inclinations. But More could never be prevailed on to acknowledge any opinion so contrary to his principles as that of the king's supremacy; and though Henry exacted that compliance from the whole nation, there was as yet no law obliging any one to take an oath to that purpose. Rich, the solicitor general, was sent to confer with More, then a prisoner, who kept a cautious silence with regard to the supremacy: he was only inveigled to say, that any question with regard to the law which established that prerogative, was a two-edged sword: if a person answer one way, it will confound his soul; if another, another, it will destroy his body." No more was wanted to found an indictment of high treason against the prisoner. His silence was called malicious, and made a part of his crime; and these words, which had casually dropped from him, were interpreted as a denial of the supremacy (o). Trials were mere formalities during this reign: More underwent the form of a trial; but where the king was the plaintiff, the innocence of the defendant could afford but a feeble chance of escape. A perjured jury gave sentence against More, who had long expected this fate, and who needed no preparation to fortify him against the terrors of death. Not only his constancy, but even his cheerfulness, nay his usual facetiousness, never forsook him; and he made a sacrifice of his life to his integrity, with the same indifference that he maintained in any ordinary occurrence. When he was mounting the scaffold, he said to one, "Friend, help me up, and when I come down again, let me shift for myself." The executioner asking him forgiveness, he granted the request, but told him, "You will never get credit by beheading me, my neck is so short." Then laying his head on the block, he bade the executioner stay till he put aside his beard; "For," said he, "it never committed treason." Nothing was wanting to the glory of this end, except a better cause, more free from weakness and superstition: but as sir Thomas More followed his principles and sense of duty, however misguided, his constancy and integrity are not the less objects of our admiration. He was beheaded, on the 6th of July, 1535, in the fifty-third year of his age.

When the execution of these great men, bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More was reported at Rome, especially that of the former, who was invested with the dignity of cardinal, every one discovered the most violent rage against the king; and numerous libels were published by the wits and orators of Italy, comparing him to Caligula, Nero, Domitian, and all the most unrelenting tyrants of antiquity. Clement VII. had died on the 25th of September, 1534, about six months after he pronounced sentence against the king; and Paul III., of the name of Farnese, had succeeded to the papal throne. This pontiff, who, while cardinal, had always favoured Henry's cause, had hoped that, personal animosities being buried with his predecessor, it might not be impossible to form an agreement with England; and the king himself was so desirous of accommodating matters, that in a negociation which he entered into with Francis a little before this time, he required that that monarch should conciliate a friendship between him and the court of Rome. But Henry was accustomed to prescribe, not to receive terms; and even while he was negociating for peace, his usual violence often carried him to commit offences which rendered the quarrel totally incurable. The execution of Fisher was regarded by Paul as so capital an injury, that he passed censures against the king on the 30th of August, 1535, citing him and all his adherents to appear in Rome within ninety days, in order to answer for their crimes: if they failed, he excommunicated them; deprived the king of his crown; laid the kingdom under an interdict; declared his issue by Anne Boleyn illegitimate; dissolved all leagues which any catholic princes had made with him; gave his kingdom to any invader; commanded the nobility to take arms against him; freed his subjects from all oaths of allegiance; cut off their commerce with foreign states; and declared it lawful for any one to seize them, to make slaves of their persons, and to convert their effects to his own use (p). But though these censures were passed, they were not at that time openly denounced: the pope delayed their publication till he should find an agreement with England entirely desperate; and till the emperor, who was at that time hard pressed by the Turks and the protestant princes in Germany, should be in a condition to carry the sentence into execution.

The king knew that he might expect any injury which it should be in Charles's power to inflict; and he therefore made it the chief object of his policy to incapacitate that monarch from wreaking his resentment upon him (q). He renewed his friendship with Francis, and opened negociations for marrying his infant daughter, Elizabeth, with the duke of Angoulême, third son of Francis. The two monarchs also made advances to the princes of the Protestant league in Germany, ever jealous of the emperor's ambition: and Henry, besides remitting them some money, sent Fox bishop of Hereford, as Francis did Du Bellay lord of Langley, to treat with them. But during the first fervours of the reformation, an agreement in theological tenets was held, as well as an union of interests, to be essential to a good correspondence among states; and though both Francis and Henry flattered the German princes with hopes of their embracing the confession of Augsburg, it was looked upon as a bad symptom of their sincerity, that they exercised such extreme rigour against all preachers of the reformation in their respective dominions (r). Henry carried the feint so far, that, while he thought himself the first theologian in the world, he yet invited over Melancthon, Bucer, Sturmius, Draco, and other German divines, that they might confer with him, and instruct him in the foundation of their tenets. These theologians were now of great importance in the world; and no poet or philosopher, even in ancient Greece, where they were treated with most respect, had ever reached equal applause and admiration. The German princes told the king that they could not spare their divines; and as Henry had no hopes of agreement with such zealous disputants, and knew that in Germany the followers of Luther would not associate with the disciples of Zuinglius, because, though they agreed in every thing else, they differed in some minute particulars with regard to the eucharist, he was the more indifferent on account of this refusal. He could also foresee, that even while the league of Smalcalde did not act in concert with him, they would always be carried by their interests to oppose the emperor; and the hatred between Francis and that monarch was so inveterate, that he deemed himself sure of a sincere ally in one or other of these potentates.

While these negociations were carrying on, an incident happened in England which promised a more amicable conclusion of those disputes, and seemed even to open the way for a reconciliation between Henry and Charles. Queen Catherine was seized with a lingering illness, which at last brought her to her grave: she died at Kimbolton, in the county of Huntingdon, on the 6th of January, 1536, in the fiftieth year of her age. A little before she expired, she wrote a very tender letter to the king; in which she gave him the appellation of "her most dear Lord, King, and Husband." She told him, that as the hour of her death was now approaching, she laid hold of this last opportunity to inculcate on him the importance of his religious duty, and the comparative emptiness of all human grandeur and enjoyment: that though his fondness towards these perishable advantages had thrown her into many calamities, as well as created to himself much trouble, she yet forgave him all past injuries, and hoped that his pardon would be ratified in heaven: and that she had no other request to make, than to recommend to him his daughter, the sole pledge of their loves; and to crave his protection for her maids and servants. She concluded with these words, "I make this vow, that mine eyes desire you above all things (s)." The king was touched even to the shedding of tears, by this last tender proof of Catherine's affection; but queen Anne is said to have expressed her joy for the death of her rival (t).

The emperor thought that, as the demise of his aunt had removed all foundation of personal animosity between him and Henry, it might not now be impossible to detach him from the alliance of France, and to renew his own confederacy with England, from which he had formerly reaped so much advantage. He sent Henry proposals for a return to ancient amity, upon these conditions (u); that he should be reconciled to the see of Rome, that he should assist him in his war with the Turks, and that he should take part with him against Francis, who now threatened the duchy of Milan. The king replied, that he was willing to be on good terms with the emperor, provided that prince would acknowledge that the former breach of friendship came entirely from himself: as to the conditions proposed, the proceedings against the bishop of Rome was so just, and so fully ratified by the parliament of England, that they could not now be revoked; when Christian princes should have settled peace among themselves, he would not fail to exert that vigour which became him, against the enemies of the faith; and after amity with the emperor was once fully restored, he should then, as a common friend both to him and Francis, be ready either to mediate an agreement between them, or to assist the injured party.

Henry became more indifferent to the advances made by the emperor, both on account of his experience of the usual duplicity and insincerity of that monarch, and the intelligence which he received of the present transactions in Europe. Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, had died without issue; and the emperor maintained that the duchy, being a fief of the empire, was devolved to him as head of the Germanic body: not to give umbrage, however, to the states of Italy, he professed his intention of bestowing that principality on some prince who should be hateful to no party, and he even made offer of it to the duke of Angoulême, third son of Francis. The French monarch, who pretended that his own right to Milan was now revived upon Sforza's death, was content to substitute his second son, the duke of Orleans, in his place; and the emperor pretended to close with this proposal. But his sole intention in that liberal concession seemed to be to gain time, till he should put himself in a warlike posture, and be able to carry an invasion into Francis's dominions. The ancient enmity between these princes broke out anew in bravadoes, and in personal insults on each other, ill becoming persons of their rank, and still less suitable to men of such unquestioned bravery. Charles soon after invaded Provence in person, with an army of fifty thousand men; but met with no success. His army perished with sickness, fatigue, famine, and other disasters; and he was obliged to raise the siege of Marseilles, and retire into Italy with the broken remains of his forces. An army of Imperialists, near thirty thousand in number, which invaded France on the side of the Netherlands, and laid siege to Peronne, made no greater progress, but retired upon the approach of a French army. And Henry had thus the satisfaction to find, both that his ally Francis was likely to support himself without foreign assistance, and that his own tranquillity was fully ensured by these violent continental wars.

If any inquietude remained with the English court, it was solely occasioned by the state of affairs in Scotland. James, receiving intelligence of the dangerous situation of his ally Francis, generously levied some forces; and embarking them on board vessels he had hired for that purpose, landed them safely in France. He even went over in person; and making haste to join the camp of the French king, which then lay in Provence, and to partake of his danger, he met that prince at Lyons, who having repulsed the emperor, was now returning to his capital. Recommended by so agreeable and seasonable an instance of friendship, the king of Scots paid his addresses to Magdalen, daughter of the French monarch; and this prince had no other objection to the match than what arose from the infirm state of his daughter's health, which seemed to threaten her with a speedy dissolution. But James having gained the affections of the princess, and obtained her consent, the father would no longer oppose the united desires of his daughter and his friend: they were accordingly married, and soon after set sail for Scotland, where the young queen, as was foreseen, died in a little time after her arrival. Francis, however, was afraid lest his ally Henry, whom he likewise looked on as his friend, and who lived with him on a more cordial footing than is usual among great princes, should be displeased that this close confederacy between France and Scotland was concluded without his participation. He therefore dispatched Pommeraye to London, in order to apologize for this measure; but Henry, with his usual openness and freedom, expressed such displeasure, that he refused even to confer with the ambassador; and Francis was apprehensive of a rupture with a prince who regulated his measures more by humour and passion, than by the rules of political prudence. But the king was so fettered by the opposition in which he was engaged against the pope and the emperor, that he pursued no farther this disgust against Francis; and in the end every thing remained in tranquillity, both on the side of France and of Scotland.

The domestic peace of England seemed to be exposed to more hazard by the innovations in religion; and it may be affirmed, that in this dangerous conjuncture nothing ensured public tranquillity so much as the decisive authority acquired by the king, and his great ascendant over all his subjects. Not only the devotion paid to the crown was profound during that age: the personal respect inspired by Henry was considerable; and even the terrors with which he overawed every one were not attended with any considerable degree of hatred. His frankness, his sincerity, his magnificence, his generosity, were virtues which counterbalanced his violence, cruelty, and impetuosity. And the important rank which his vigour more than his address acquired him in all foreign negociations flattered the vanity of Englishmen, and made them the more willingly endure those domestic hardships to which they were exposed. The king, conscious of his advantages, was now proceeding to the most dangerous exercise of his authority; and after paving the way for that measure by several preparatory expedients, he was determined to suppress the monasteries, and to put himself in possession of their ample revenues.

Cromwell, secretary of state, had been appointed vicar-general, or vicegerent; a new office, by which the king's supremacy, or the absolute uncontrollable power assumed over the church, was delegated to him. He employed Layton, London, Price, Gage, Petre, Bellasis, and others, as commissioners, who carried on every where a rigorous inquiry with regard to the conduct and deportment of all the friers. During times of faction, especially of the religious kind, no equity is to be expected from adversaries; and as it was known that the king's intention in this visitation was to find a pretence for abolishing monasteries, we may naturally conclude, that the reports of the commissioners are very little to be relied on. Friers were encouraged to bring in informations against their brethren; the slightest evidence was credited; and even the calumnies spread abroad by the friends of the reformation were regarded as grounds of proof.

Some few monasteries, terrified with this rigorous inquisition carried on by Cromwell and his commissioners, surrendered their revenues into the king's hands; and the monks received small pensions as the reward of their obsequiousness. Orders were given to dismiss such nuns and friers as were below four and twenty, whose vows were on that account supposed not to be binding. The doors of the convents were opened, even to such as were above that age; and every one recovered his liberty who desired it. But as all these expedients did not fully answer the king's purpose, he had recourse to his usual instrument of power, the parliament; and in order to prepare men for the innovations projected, the report of the visitors was published, and a general horror was endeavoured to be excited in the nation against institutions which to their ancestors had been the objects of the most profound veneration.

The king, though determined utterly to abolish the monastic orders, resolved to proceed gradually; and he gave directions to the parliament, on the 4th of February, 1536, to go no further at present, than to suppress the lesser monasteries, which possessed revenues below two hundred pounds a year (v). These were found to be the most corrupted, as lying less under the restraint of shame, and being exposed to less scrutiny (w); and it was deemed safest to begin with them, and thereby prepare the way for the greater innovations projected. By this act three hundred and seventy-six monasteries were suppressed, and their revenues, amounting to thirty-two thousand pounds a year, were granted to the king; besides their goods, chattels, and plate, computed at a hundred thousand pounds more (x). It does not appear that any opposition was made to this important law: so absolute was Henry's authority! A court, called the court of augmentation of the king's revenue, was erected for the management of these funds; and the people naturally concluded, from this circumstance, that Henry intended to proceed in despoiling the church of her patrimony (y).

The act formerly passed, empowering the king to name thirty-two commissioners for framing a body of canon-law, was renewed; but the project was never carried into execution. Henry thought that the present perplexity of that law increased his authority, and kept the clergy in still greater dependence.

Farther progress was made in completing the union of Wales with England: the separate jurisdictions of several great lords or marchers, as they were called, which obstructed the course of justice in Wales, and encouraged robbery and pillaging, were abolished; and the authority of the king's courts was extended every where. Some jurisdictions of a like nature in England were also abolished (z) this session.

(x) It is pretended, see Hollingshed, p. 939, that ten thousand monks were turned out on the dissolution of the lesser monasteries. If so, most of them must have been Mendicants: for the revenue could not have supported near that number. The Mendicants, no doubt, still continued their former profession.

The commons, sensible that they had gained nothing by opposing the king's will, when he formerly endeavoured to secure the profits of wardships and liveries, were now contented to frame a law (a), such as he dictated to them. It was enacted, That the possession of land shall be adjudged to be in those who have the use of it, not in those to whom it is transferred in trust.

After all these laws were passed, the king dissolved the parliament, on the 14th of April; a parliament memorable not only for the great and important innovations which it introduced, but also for the long time it had sitten, and the frequent prorogations which it had undergone. Henry had found it so obsequious to his will that he did not chuse, during those religious ferments, to hazard a new election; and he continued the same parliament above six years: a practice at that time unusual in England.

About this time Anne Boleyn lost the king's favour; and soon after lost her life by the rage of that furious monarch. Henry had persevered in his love to this lady during six years that his prosecution of the divorce lasted; and the more obstacles he met with to the gratification of his passion, the more determined zeal did he exert in pursuing his purpose. But the affection which had subsisted, and still increased under difficulties, had not long attained secure possession of its object, when it languished from satiety; and the king's heart was apparently estranged from his consort. Anne's enemies soon perceived the fatal change; and they were forward to widen the breach, when they found that they incurred no danger by interposing in those delicate concerns. She had been delivered of a dead son; and Henry's extreme fondness for male issue being thus for the present disappointed, his temper, equally violent and superstitious, was disposed to make the innocent mother answerable for the misfortune (b). But the chief means which Anne's enemies employed to inflame the king against her, was his jealousy.

Anne, though she appears to have been entirely innocent, and even virtuous in her conduct, had a certain gaiety, if not levity of character, which threw her off her guard, and made her less circumspect than her situation required. Her education in France rendered her the more prone to those freedoms; and it was with difficulty she conformed herself to that strict ceremonial practised in the court of England. More vain than haughty, she was pleased to see the influence of her beauty on all around her, and she indulged herself in an easy familiarity with persons who were formerly her equals, and who might then have pretended to her friendship and good graces. Henry's dignity was offended with these popular manners; and though the lover had been entirely blind, the husband possessed but too quick discernment and penetration. Ill instruments interposed, and put a malignant interpretation on the harmless liberties of the queen: the viscountess of Rocheford, in particular, who was married to the queen's brother, but who lived on bad terms with her sister-in-law, insinuated the most cruel suspicions into the king's mind; and as she was a woman of profligate character, she paid no regard either to truth or humanity in those calumnies which she suggested. She pretended that her own husband was engaged in a criminal correspondence with his sister; and, not content with this imputation, she poisoned every action of the queen's, and represented each instance of favour which she conferred on any one as a token of affection. Henry Norris, groom of the stole, Weston and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's chamber, together with Mark Smeton groom of the chamber, were observed to possess much of the queen's friendship; and they served her with a zeal and attachment which, though chiefly derived from gratitude, might not improbably be seasoned with some mixture of tenderness for so amiable a princess. The king's jealousy laid hold of the slightest circumstance, and finding no particular object on which it could fasten, it vented itself equally on every one that came within the verge of its fury.

Had Henry's jealousy been derived from love, though it might on a sudden have proceeded to the most violent extremities, it would have been subject to many remorses and contrarieties; and might at last have suffered only to augment that affection on which it was founded. But it was a more stern jealousy, fostered entirely by pride: his love was transferred to another object. Jane, daughter of sir John Seymour, and maid of honour to the queen, a young lady of singular beauty and merit, had obtained an entire ascendant over him; and he was determined to sacrifice every thing to the gratification of this new appetite. Unlike to most monarchs, who judge lightly of the crime of gallantry, and who deem the young damsels of their court rather honoured than disgraced by their passion, he seldom thought of any other attachment than that of marriage; and in order to attain this end, he underwent more difficulties, and committed greater crimes, than those which he sought to avoid by forming that legal connexion. And having thus entertained the design of raising his new mistress to his bed and throne, he more willingly hearkened to every suggestion which threw any imputation of guilt on the unfortunate Anne Boleyn.

The king's jealousy first appeared openly in a tilting at Greenwich, on the 1st of May, 1536, where the queen happened to drop her handkerchief; an incident probably casual, but interpreted by him as an instance of gallantry to some of her paramours (c). He immediately retired from the place; sent orders to confine her to her chamber; arrested Norris, Brereton, Weston, and Smeton, together with her brother Rocheford; and threw them into prison. The queen, astonished at these instances of his fury, thought that he meant only to try her; but finding him in earnest, she reflected on his obstinate unrelenting spirit, and she prepared herself for that melancholy doom which was awaiting her. Next day she was sent to the Tower; and on her way thither she was informed of her supposed offences, of which she had hitherto been ignorant: she made earnest protestations of her innocence; and when she entered the prison she fell on her knees, and prayed God so to help her, as she was not guilty of the crime imputed to her. Her surprise and confusion threw her into hysterical disorders; and in that situation she thought that the best proof of her innocence was to make an entire confession, and she revealed some indiscretions and levities which her simplicity had equally betrayed her to commit and to avow. She owned that she had once rallied Norris on his delaying his marriage, and had told him that he probably expected her when she should be a widow: she had reproved Weston, she said, for his affection to a kinswoman of hers, and his indifference towards his wife: but he told her that she had mistaken the object of his affection, for it was herself: upon which she defied him (d). She affirmed that Smeton had never been in her chamber but twice, when he played on the harpsichord: but she acknowledged that he had once had the boldness to tell her, that a look sufficed him. The king, instead of being satisfied with the candour and sincerity of her confession, regarded these indiscretions only as preludes to greater and more criminal intimacies.

Notwithstanding the multitudes whom the beneficence of the queen's temper had obliged during her prosperous fortune, no one durst interpose between her and the king's fury; and the person whose advancement every breath had favoured, and every countenance had smiled upon, was now left neglected and abandoned. Even her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, preferring the connections of party to the ties of blood, was become her most dangerous enemy; and all the retainers to the catholic religion hoped that her death would terminate the king's quarrel with Rome, and leave him again to his natural and early bent, which had inclined him to maintain the most intimate union with the apostolic see. Cranmer alone, of all the queen's adherents, still retained his friendship for her; and, as far as the king's impetuosity permitted him, he endeavoured to moderate the violent prejudices entertained against her.

The queen herself wrote Henry a letter from the Tower, full of the most tender expostulations, and of the warmest protestations of innocence (e). This letter had no influence on the unrelenting mind of Henry, who was determined

(e) This letter contains so much nature, and even elegance, as to deserve to be transmitted to posterity, without any alteration in the expression. It is as follows:

"SIR, your grace's displeasure and my imprisonment are things so strange unto me, as what to write or what to excuse I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy. I no sooner received this message by him than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.

mined to pave the way for his new marriage by the death of Anne Boleyn. Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton, were tried; but no legal evidence was produced against them. The chief proof of their guilt consisted in a hearsay from one lady Wingfield, who was dead. Smeton was prevailed on, by the vain hopes of life, to confess a criminal correspondence with the queen (f); but even her enemies expected little advantage from this confession; for they never dared to confront him with her; and he was immediately executed; as were also Brereton and Weston. Norris had been much in the king's favour; and an offer of life was made him, if he would confess his crime, and accuse the queen: but he generously rejected the proposal; and said, "that in his conscience he believed her entirely guiltless: but for his part he could accuse her of nothing, and he would rather die a thousand deaths than calumniate an innocent person."

The queen and her brother, George Boleyn, viscount Rocheford, were tried by a jury of peers, consisting of the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and twenty-three more: their uncle the duke of Norfolk presided as high steward. Upon what proof or pretence the crime of incest was imputed to them is unknown: the chief evidence, it is said, amounted to no more than that Rocheford had been seen to lean on her bed before some company. Part of the charge against her was, that she had affirmed to her minions that the king never had her heart; and had said to each of them apart, that she loved him better than any person whatsoever: "Which was to the slander of the issue begotten between the king and her." By this strained interpretation, her guilt was brought under the statute of the twenty-fifth of this reign; in which it was declared criminal to throw any slander upon the king, queen, or their issue. Such palpable absurdities were at that time admitted; and they were regarded by the peers of England as a sufficient reason for sacrificing an innocent queen to the cruelty of their lecherous and sanguinary tyrant. Though unassisted by counsel, she defended herself with presence of mind; and the spectators could not forbear pronouncing her entirely innocent. Judgement, however, as might naturally be expected, was given by the court, both against the queen and lord Rocheford; and her verdict contained, that she should be burned or beheaded at the king's pleasure. When this dreadful sentence was pronounced, she was not terrified, but lifting up her hands to heaven, said, "O Father! O Creator! thou who art the way, the truth, and the life, thou knowest that I have not deserved this fate." And then turning to the judges, made the most pathetic declarations of her innocence.

Henry, not satisfied with this cruel vengeance, was resolved entirely to annul his marriage with Anne Boleyn, and to declare her issue illegitimate: he recalled to his memory, that a little after her appearance in the English court, some attachment had been acknowledged between her and the earl of Northumberland, then lord Piercy; and he now questioned the nobleman with regard to these engagements. Northumberland took an oath before the two archbishops, that no contract or promise of marriage had ever passed between them: he received the sacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk and others of the privy council; and this solemn act he accompanied with the most solemn protestations of veracity (g). The queen, however, was shaken by menaces of executing the sentence against her in its greatest rigour, and was prevailed on to confess in court some lawful impediment to her marriage with the king (h). The afflicted primate who sat as judge thought himself obliged by this confession to pronounce the marriage null and invalid (i).

The queen now prepared for suffering the death to which she was sentenced. She sent her last message to the king, and acknowledged the obligations which she owed him, in thus uniformly continuing his endeavours for her advancement: "From a private gentlewoman, she said, he had first made her a marchioness, then a queen, and now, since he could raise her no higher in this world, he was sending her to be a saint in heaven." She then renewed the protestations of her innocence, and recommended her daughter to his care. Before the lieutenant of the Tower, and all who approached her, she made the like declarations; and continued to behave herself with her usual serenity, and even with cheerfulness. "The executioner," she said to the lieutenant, "is, I hear, very expert; and my neck is very slender:" upon which she grasped it in her hand and smiled. When brought, however, to the scaffold, on the 19th of May, she softened her tone a little with regard to her protestations of innocence, says Mr. Hume; but we do not find that she did so. Her maternal concern for Elizabeth prevailed in these last moments over that indignation which the unjust sentence by which she suffered naturally excited in her. She said that she was come to die, as she was sentenced by the law: She would accuse none, nor say any thing of the ground upon which she was judged. She prayed heartily for the king; called him a most merciful and gentle prince; and acknowledged that he had always been to her a good and gracious sovereign; and if any one should think proper to canvass her cause, she desired him to judge the best (k). She was beheaded by the executioner of Calais, who was sent for as more expert than any in England. Her body was negligently thrown into a common chest of elm-tree, made to hold arrows; and was buried in the Tower.

The innocence of this unfortunate queen cannot reasonably be called in question. Henry himself, in the violence of his rage, knew not whom to accuse as her lover; and though he imputed guilt to her brother, and four persons more, he was able to bring proof against none of them. The whole tenour of her conduct forbids us to ascribe to her an abandoned character, such as is implied in the king's accusation: had she been so lost to all prudence and sense of shame, she must have exposed herself to detection, and afforded her enemies some evidence against her. But the king made the most effectual apology for her, by marrying Jane Seymour the very day after her execution (l). His impatience to gratify this new passion caused him to forget all regard to decency; and his cruel heart was not softened a moment by the bloody catastrophe of a person who had so long been the object of his most tender affection.

The lady Mary, daughter of Catherine, now thought the death of her step-mother a proper opportunity for reconciling herself to the king, who, besides other causes of disgust, had been offended with her on account of the part which she had taken in her mother's quarrel. Her

"But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And, to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Anne Boleyn: with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget myself in my exaltation or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as I now find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other object. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain, of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess your daughter. Try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled on that party for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto, your grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein.

"But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander, must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness, then I desire of God that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof, and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgement-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgement I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocence shall be openly known and sufficiently cleared.

"My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen who (as I understand) are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Anne Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your grace any farther, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May;

"Your most loyal and ever faithful wife,

"ANNE BOLEYN."

advances were not at first received; and Henry exacted from her some farther proofs of submission and obedience: he required this young princess, then about twenty years of age, to adopt his theological tenets; to acknowledge his supremacy; to renounce the pope; and to own her mother's marriage to be unlawful and incestuous. These points were of hard digestion with the princess; but after some delays, and even refusals, she was at last prevailed on to write a letter to her father (m), containing her assent to the articles required of her: upon which she was received into favour. But notwithstanding the return of the king's affection to the issue of his first marriage, he divested not himself of kindness towards the lady Elizabeth; and the new queen, who was blest with a singular sweetness of disposition, discovered strong proofs of attachment towards her.

The trial and conviction of queen Anne, and the subsequent events, made it necessary for the king to summon a new parliament, which was accordingly done on the 8th of June; and he, here, in his speech, made a merit of his infamy to his people, declaring that, notwithstanding the misfortunes attending his two former marriages, he had been induced for their good to venture on a third. The speaker supported the farce by professions of gratitude; and he took thence occasion to praise the king for his wonderful gifts of grace and nature: he compared him, for justice and prudence to Solomon; for strength and fortitude, to Sampson; and for beauty and comeliness, to Absalom. The king very humbly replied, by the mouth of the chancellor, "that he disavowed these praises; since, if he were really possessed of such endowments, they were the gift of Almighty God only." Henry found that the parliament was no less submissive in deeds than complaisant in expressions, and that they would go the same lengths as the former in gratifying even his most lawless passions. His divorce from Anne Boleyn was ratified (n); that queen and all her accomplices were attainted; the issue of both his former marriages were declared illegitimate, and it was even made treason to assert the legitimacy of either of them; to throw any slander upon the present king, queen, or their issue, was subjected to the same penalty; the crown was settled on the king's issue by Jane Seymour, or any subsequent wife; and in case he should die without children, he was empowered, by his will or letters patent, to dispose of the crown: an enormous authority, especially when entrusted to a prince so violent and capricious in his humour. Whoever, being required, refused to answer upon oath to any article of this act of settlement, was declared to be guilty of treason; and by this clause a species of political inquisition was established in the kingdom, as well as the accusations of treason, multiplied to an unreasonable degree. The king was also empowered to confer on any one, by his will or letters patent, any castles, honours, liberties, or franchises; words which might have been extended to the dismembering of the kingdom, by the erection of principalities and independent jurisdictions. It was also, by another act, made treason to marry, without the king's consent, any princess related in the first degree to the crown. This act was occasioned by the discovery of a design formed by Thomas Howard, brother of the duke of Norfolk, to espouse the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to the king, by his sister the queen of Scots and the earl of Angus. Howard, as well as the young lady, was committed to the Tower. She recovered her liberty soon after; but he died in confinement. An act of attainder passed against him this session of parliament.

Another accession was likewise gained to the authority of the crown: the king, or any of his successors, was empowered to repeal or annul, by letters patent, whatever act of parliament had been passed before he was four and twenty years of age. Whoever maintained the authority of the bishop of Rome, by word or writ, or endeavoured in any manner to restore it in England, was subjected to the penalty of premunire; that is, his goods were forfeited, and he was put out of the protection of law. And any person who possessed any office, ecclesiastical or civil, or received any grant or charter from the crown, and yet refused to renounce the pope by oath, was declared to be guilty of treason. The renunciation prescribed runs in the style of "So help me God, all saints, and the holy evangelists (o)". The pope, hearing of Anne Boleyn's disgrace and death, had hoped that the door was opened to a reconciliation, and had been making some advances to Henry: but this was the reception he met with. Henry was now become indifferent with regard to papal censures; and finding a great increase of authority, as well as of revenue, to accrue from his quarrel with Rome, he was determined to persevere in his present measures. This parliament also, even more than any foregoing, convinced him how much he commanded the respect of his subjects, and what confidence he might repose in them. Though the elections had been made on a sudden, without any preparation or intrigue, the members discovered an unlimited attachment to his person and government (p).

The concurrence of the two national assemblies, the parliament and the convocation, served, no doubt, to increase the king's power over the people, and raised him to an authority more absolute than any prince in a simple monarchy, even by means of military force is ever able to attain. But there are certain bounds beyond which the most slavish submission cannot be extended. All the late innovations, particularly the dissolution of the smaller monasteries, and the imminent danger to which all the rest were exposed (q), had bred discontent among the people, and had disposed them to revolt. The expelled monks, wandering about the country, excited both the piety and compassion of men; and as the ancient religion took hold of the populace by powerful motives, suited to vulgar capacity, it was able, now that it was brought into apparent hazard, to raise the strongest zeal in its favour (r). Discontents had even reached some of the nobility and gentry, whose ancestors had founded the monasteries, and who placed a vanity in those institutions, as well as reaped some benefit from them, by the provisions which they afforded them for their younger children. The more superstitious were interested for the souls of their forefathers, which, they believed, must now lie during many ages in the torments of purgatory, for want of masses to relieve them. It seemed unjust to abolish pious institutions for the faults, real or pretended, of individuals. Even the most moderate and reasonable deemed it somewhat iniquitous, that men who had been invited into a course of life by all the laws, human and divine, which prevailed in their country, should be turned out of their possessions, and so little care be taken of their future subsistence. And when it was observed, that the rapacity and bribery of the commissioners and others, employed in visiting the monasteries, intercepted much of the profits resulting from these confiscations, it tended much to increase the general discontent (s).

The people, however, though they continued to murmur, did not break into open sedition till the complaints of the secular clergy concurred with those of the regular. As Cromwell's person was little acceptable to the ecclesiastics; the authority which he exercised being so new, so absolute, so unlimited, inspired them with disgust and terror. He published, in the king's name, without the consent either of parliament or convocation, an ordinance, by which he retrenched many of the ancient holidays; prohibited several superstitions gainful to the clergy, such as pilgrimages, images, reliques; and even ordered the incumbents in the parishes to set apart a considerable portion of their revenue for repairs, and for the support of exhibitioners and the poor of their parish. The secular priests, finding themselves thus reduced to a grievous servitude, (n) The parliament, in annulling the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, gives this as a reason, "For that his highness had chosen to wife the excellent and virtuous lady Jane, who for her convenient years, excellent beauty, and pureness of flesh and blood, would be apt, God willing, to conceive issue by his highness."

(q) A proposal had formerly been made in the convocation for the abolition of the lesser monasteries; and had been much opposed by bishop Fisher, who was then alive. He told his brethren that this was fairly showing the king the way how he might come at the greater monasteries. "An ax," said he, "which wanted a handle, came upon a time into the wood, and making his moan to the great trees that he wanted a handle, to work withal, and for that cause he was constrained to sit idle; therefore he made it his request to them that they would be pleased to grant him one of their small saplings within the wood to make him a handle; who, mistrusting no guile, granted him one of their smaller trees to make him a handle. But now becoming a complete ax, he fell so to work within the same wood, that in process of time there was neither great nor small trees to be found in the place where the wood stood. And so, my lords, if you grant the king these smaller monasteries, you do but make him a handle, whereby, at his own pleasure, he may cut down all the cedars within your Lebanons." Dr. Bailie's Life of Bishop Fisher, p. 108.

instilled into the people those discontents which they had long harboured in their own bosoms.

The first rising was in Lincolnshire. It was headed by Dr. Mackrel, prior of Barlings, who was disguised like a mean mechanic, and who assumed the name of captain Cobler (t). They acknowledged the king to be supreme head of the church of England; but they complained of suppressing the monasteries, of evil counsellors, of persons meanly born raised to dignity, of the danger to which the jewels and plate of their parochial churches were exposed: and they prayed the king to consult the nobility of the realm concerning the redress of these grievances (u). Henry was little disposed to entertain apprehensions of danger, especially from a low multitude, whom he despised. He sent forces against the rebels under the command of the duke of Suffolk; and he returned them a very sharp answer to their petition. There were some gentry, whom the populace had constrained to take part with them, and who kept a secret correspondence with Suffolk. They informed him, that resentment against the king's reply was the chief cause which retained the malcontents in arms, and that a milder answer would probably suppress the rebellion. Henry had levied a great force at London, with which he was preparing to march against the rebels; and being so well supported by power, he thought that, without losing his dignity, he might now show them some greater condescension. He sent a new proclamation, requiring them to return to their obedience, with secret assurances of pardon. This expedient had its effect: the populace was dispersed: Mackrel and some of their leaders fell into the king's hands, and were executed: the greater part of the multitude retired peaceably to their usual occupations: a few of the more obstinate fled to the north, where they joined the insurrection that was raised in Yorkshire.

The northern rebels, as they were more numerous, were also on other accounts more formidable than those of Lincolnshire; because the people were there more accustomed to arms, and because of their vicinity to the Scots, who might make advantage of these disorders. One Robert Aske, a gentleman, had taken the command of them, and he possessed the art of governing the populace. Their enterprize they called The Pilgrimage of Grace: some priests marched before in the habits of their order, carrying crosses in their hands: in their banners was woven a crucifix, with the representation of a chalice, and of the five wounds of Christ (v): they wore on their sleeve an emblem of the five wounds, with the name of Jesus wrought in the middle: they all swore that they had entered into the pilgrimage of grace from no other motive than their love to God, their care of the king's person and issue, their desire of purifying the nobility, of driving base-born persons from about the king, of restoring the church, and of suppressing heresy. Allured by these fair pretences, about forty thousand men from the counties of York, Durham, Lancaster, and those northern provinces, flocked to their standard; and their zeal, no less than their numbers, inspired the court with apprehensions.

The earl of Shrewsbury, moved by an earnest zeal for the king's service, raised forces, though at first without any commission, in order to oppose the rebels. The earl of Cumberland repulsed them from his castle of Skipton: sir Ralph Evers defended Scarborough Castle against them (w): Courtney, marquis of Exeter, the king's cousin-german, obeyed orders from court, and levied troops. The earls of Huntingdon, Derby, and Rutland, imitated his example. The rebels, however, prevailed in taking both Hull and York: they had laid siege to Pontefract Castle, into which the archbishop of York and lord Darcy had thrown themselves. It was soon surrendered to them; and the prelate and nobleman, who secretly wished success to the insurrection, seemed to yield to the force imposed on them, and joined the rebels.

The duke of Norfolk was appointed general of the king's forces against the northern rebels; and as he headed the party at court which supported the church of Rome, he was also suspected of bearing some favour to the cause which he was sent to oppose. His prudent conduct, however, seems to acquit him of this imputation. He encamped near Doncaster, together with the earl of Shrewsbury; and as his army was small, scarcely exceeding five thousand men, he made choice of a post where he had a river in front, the ford of which he purposed to defend against the rebels. They had intended to attack him in the morning; but during the night there fell such violent rains as rendered the river utterly impassable; and Norfolk wisely laid hold of the opportunity to enter into treaty with them. In order to open the door for negociation, he sent them a herald; whom Aske, their leader, received with great ceremony; he himself sitting in a chair of state, with the archbishop of York on one hand, and lord Darcy on the other. It was agreed, that two gentlemen should be dispatched to the king with proposals from the rebels; and Henry purposely delayed giving an answer, and allured them with hopes of entire satisfaction, in expectation that necessity would soon obliged them to disperse themselves. Being informed that this artifice had in a great measure succeeded, he required them instantly to lay down their arms, and submit to mercy; promising a pardon to all except six, whom he named, and four, whom he reserved to himself the power of naming. But though the greater part of the rebels had gone home for want of subsistence, they had entered into the most solemn engagements to return to their standards, in case the king's answer should not prove satisfactory. Norfolk, therefore, soon found himself in the same difficulty as before; and he opened again a negociation with the leaders of the multitude. He engaged them to send three hundred persons to Doncaster, with proposals for an accommodation; and he hoped, by intrigue and separate interests, to sow the seeds of dissension among so great a number. Aske himself had intended to be one of the deputies, and he required a hostage for his security: but the king, when consulted, replied, that he knew no gentleman or other whom he esteemed so little as to put him in pledge for such a villain. The demands of the rebels were so exorbitant, that Norfolk rejected them; and they prepared again to decide the contest by arms. They were as formidable as ever, both by their numbers and spirit; and, notwithstanding the small river which lay between them and the royal army, Norfolk had great reason to dread the effects of their fury. But while they were preparing to pass the ford, rain fell a second time in such abundance, as made it impracticable for them to execute their design; and the populace, partly reduced to necessity by want of provisions, partly struck with superstition at being thus again disappointed by the same accident, suddenly dispersed themselves. The duke of Norfolk, who had received powers for that end, forwarded the dispersion by the promise of a general amnesty; and the king ratified this act of clemency. He published, however, on the 9th of December, a manifesto against the rebels, and an answer to their complaints; in which he employed a very lofty style, well suited to his tyrannical disposition. He told them, that they ought no more to pretend giving a judgement with regard to government, than a blind man with regard to colours: "And we," he added, "with our whole council, think it right strange that ye, who be but brutes and inexpert folk, do take upon you to appoint us, who be meet or not for our council."

This pacification did not seem likely to be of long continuance; for Norfolk was ordered to keep his army together, and to march into the northern parts, in order to exact a general submission. Lord Darcy, as well as Aske, was sent for to court; and the former, upon his refusal or delay to appear, was thrown into prison. Every place was full of jealousy and complaints. A new insurrection broke out, in 1537, headed by Musgrave and Tilby; and the rebels besieged Carlisle with eight thousand men. Being repulsed by that city, they were encountered in their retreat by Norfolk, who put them to flight; and having made prisoners of all their officers except Musgrave, who escaped, he instantly put them to death by martial law, to the number of seventy persons. An attempt made by sir Francis Bigot and Halam, to surprize Hull, met with no better success; and several other risings were suppressed by the vigilance of Norfolk. The king, enraged by these multiplied revolts, was determined not to adhere to the general pardon which he had granted; and from a movement of his usual violence, he made the innocent suffer for the guilty. Norfolk, by command from his master, spread the royal banner, and wherever he thought proper executed martial law in the punishment of offenders. Besides Aske, the leader of the first insurrection, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer, sir Thomas Piercy, sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest, William Lumley, and many others, were thrown into prison; and most of them were condemned and executed. Lord Hussey was found guilty as an accomplice in the insurrection of Lincolnshire, and was executed at Lincoln. Lord Darcy, though he pleaded compulsion, and appealed for his justification to a long life spent in the service of the crown, was beheaded on Tower Hill. Before his execution, he accused Norfolk of having secretly encouraged the rebels; but Henry, either sensible of that nobleman's services, and convinced of his fidelity, or afraid to offend one of such extensive power and great capacity, rejected the information. Being now satiated with punishing the rebels, he published anew a general pardon, to which he faithfully adhered (x); and he erected by patent a court of justice at York, for deciding law-suits in the northern counties: a demand which had been made by the rebels.

Not long after these successes, on the 12th of October, 1537, the queen was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of Edward; but the queen died two days after (y). A son, however, had so long been ardently wished for by Henry, and was now become so necessary, in order to prevent disputes with regard to the succession, after the acts declaring the two princesses illegitimate, that the king's affliction was drowned in his joy, and he expressed great satisfaction on the occasion. The prince, not six days old, was created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. Sir Edward Seymour, the queen's brother, formerly made lord Beauchamp, was raised to the dignity of earl of Hertford. Sir William Fitz-Williams, high admiral, was created earl of Southampton; sir William Paulet, lord St. John; sir John Russel, lord Russel.

During these transactions, a new rupture had occurred on the continent, between the emperor and the French monarch, owing to the death of Sforza, duke of Milan, and the subsequent pretensions of Francis to the sovereignty of the vacant duchy. Charles, unprepared for war, continued for some time to amuse the king of France with a negociation; in the course of which he insinuated his willingness to cede the duchy of Milan to his third son, the duke of Angouleme: but when he had made every necessary preparation, he publicly insulted the French ambassador at Rome, in the presence of the pope and cardinals, by uttering the most indecent invectives against their sovereign, which he concluded by challenging Francis to single combat. "But," said Charles, "should he, by declining this method of terminating our differences, render war inevitable, nothing shall divert me from prosecuting it to such extremity, as shall reduce one of us to be the poorest gentleman in his own dominions. Nor do I fear it will be on me this misfortune shall fall; I enter upon action with the fairest prospect of success; the justice of my cause, the union of my subjects, the number and valour of my troops, the experience and fidelity of my generals, all conspire to ensure it. Of all these advantages the king of France is destitute; and, were my resources no more certain, and my hopes of victory no better founded than his, I would instantly throw myself at his feet, and with folded hands, and a rope about my neck, implore his mercy."

Soon after this Charles entered Provence at the head of fifty thousand men; but the prudent measures adopted by Francis, from the advice of the mareschal Montmorency, who was entrusted with the execution of them, defeated all his endeavours. The country being entirely desolated and stripped of all possible means of subsistence, the imperial troops suffered daily diminution from sickness, famine, and fatigue; and after an unsuccessful attempt on Marseilles, and some other efforts equally fruitless, Charles was compelled to retire into Italy with the broken remains of his forces. Another army of imperialists, near thirty thousand strong, which invaded France on the side of the Netherlands, and laid siege to Peronne, made no greater progress, but retreated upon the approach of a French army. At length, his treasury being exhausted, all his designs baffled, and all his efforts repulsed; Charles, after having so arrogantly boasted of victory, was obliged to submit to an inglorious truce for ten years, which was concluded at Nice on the 18th of June, 1538, under the mediation of the pope.

A few days after the signing of the truce, the emperor set sail to Barcelona, but was driven by contrary winds to the island of St. Margaret, on the coast of Provence. When Francis (who happened to be not far distant) heard of this, he considered it as an office of civility to invite him to take shelter in his dominions; and even proposed a personal interview with him at Aigues-Mortes. The emperor, who would not be outdone by his rival in complaisance, instantly repaired thither. So soon as he cast anchor in the road, Francis, without waiting to settle any point of ceremony, but relying implicitly on the emperor's honour for his security, visited him on board his galley; and was received and entertained with the warmest demonstrations of esteem and affection. The next day the emperor repaid the confidence which the king had placed in him: he landed at Aigues-Mortes, with as little precaution, and met with a reception equally cordial. He remained on shore during the night; and, in both visits they vied with each other in expressions of respect and friendship. After twenty years of open hostilities, or of secret enmity, after so many injuries reciprocally inflicted or endured; after having formally given the lye, and challenged one or other to single combat; after the emperor had so publicly inveighed against Francis, as a prince void of honour and integrity; and Francis had accused him of being accessary to the murder of his eldest son---(who died in 1536, and was supposed to have been poisoned by his cup-bearer, the count de Montecuculi; though it is most probable they are right who attribute his death to his having drank too freely of cold water, after over heating himself at tennis)—such an interview appears altogether singular, and even unnatural. But the history of these monarchs, as the learned modern historian of Charles's reign has remarked, abounds with surprizing transitions: from implacable enmity they appeared to pass, in a moment, to the most cordial reconciliation; from suspicion and distrust to perfect confidence: and from practising all the dark arts of an insidious policy, they could assume, on a sudden, the liberal and open manners of two gallant gentlemen.

During the war between the emperor and Francis, an event had occurred, which abated, in some degree, the warmth and cordiality of friendship which had so long subsisted between the latter and the king of England. James the Fifth of Scotland, an enterprizing young prince, having heard of the emperor's intention to invade Provence, was so fond of shewing that he did not yield to any of his ancestors, in the sincerity of his attachment to the French crown, and so eager to distinguish himself by some military exploit, that he levied a body of troops, with an intention of leading them in person to the assistance of the king of France. But, though some unfortunate circumstances prevented him from taking any forces with him, nothing could divert him from going himself. Although he arrived too late to be of any service to the French king, yet Francis was so highly pleased with his zeal, that he could not refuse him his daughter Magdalen, whom he demanded in marriage; and the nuptials were accordingly celebrated in January, 1537.

The years 1537 and 1538 were principally employed in the suppression of the greater monasteries, an account of which will be given in the Ecclesiastical History, in the following chapter.

The English during this age were extremely unhappy, insomuch, that, when they laboured under any grievance, they had not the satisfaction of expecting redress from parliament: on the contrary, they had reason to dread each meeting of that assembly, and were then sure of having tyranny converted into law, and aggravated, perhaps, with some circumstance, which the arbitrary prince and his ministers had not hitherto devised, or did not think proper of themselves to carry into execution. This abject

But she was delivered at Hampton Court on the 12th, and died on the 24th of October, according to a Journal that was written by Cecil, which says, that she died in twelve days after Edward's birth; and so it is in the Herald's Office. It is related by some writers, that when the queen was in extreme labour, the physicians finding it to be impracticable to save both her and the child, desired to know the king's pleasure, whether he would have his wife spared or the child; a question which he answered by saying, that he preferred the preservation of the child, as he could easily find other wives. The infant was then extracted by the Cæsarian operation, of the effects of which the mother died. We cannot, however, vouch for the veracity of this story, and we believe it is generally exploded.

servility never appeared more conspicuously than in a new parliament which the king assembled to meet on the 28th of April, 1539, and which, if he had been so pleased, might have been the last that ever sat in England. But Henry found them too useful instruments of dominion ever to entertain thoughts of giving them a total exclusion.

The parliament was opened by the lord chancellor, who informed the house of lords, "That it was his majesty's earnest desire to extirpate from his kingdom all diversity of opinion in matters of religion; and as this undertaking was, he owned, important and arduous, he desired them to chuse a committee from among themselves, who might draw up certain articles of faith, and communicate them afterwards to the parliament." The lords named the vicar-general, Cromwell, now created a peer, the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops of Durham, Carlisle, Worcester, Bath and Wells, Bangor, and Ely. The house might have seen what an arduous task they had undertaken: so great was the diversity of opinion in this small committee, that it could come to no conclusion. The duke of Norfolk then moved in the house, "That, since there were no hopes of having a report from the committee, the articles of faith, intended to be established, should be reduced to six; and a new committee be appointed to draw an act with regard to them." As this peer was understood to speak the sense of the king, his motion was immediately complied with; and after a short prorogation, the bill of the "six articles," or the bloody bill, as the Protestants justly termed it, was introduced, and having passed the two houses, received the royal assent (z); by which it was enacted, that they should be burned or hanged, who,

I. By word or writing, denied transubstantiation.

II. Maintained that communion in both kinds was necessary.

III. That it was lawful for priests to marry.

IV. That vows of chastity may be broken.

V. That private masses are unprofitable. Or,

VI. That auricular confession is not necessary to salvation.

The king, in framing this law, laid his oppressive hand on both parties; and even the catholics had reason to complain, that the friars and nuns, though dismissed their convent, should be capriciously restrained to the practice of celibacy (a): but as the protestants were chiefly exposed to the severity of the statute, the misery of adversaries, according to the usual maxims of party, was regarded by the adherents to the Catholic faith, as their own prosperity and triumph.

The parliament having by this act resigned all their religious liberties, proceeded to a surrender of their civil; and by one act they made a total subversion of the English constitution. They gave to the king's proclamation the same force as to a statute enacted by parliament; and to render the matter worse, if possible, they framed this law as if it were only declaratory, and were intended to explain the natural extent of royal authority (b).

In order to give this statute an appearance of moderation, the parliament enacted, that no proclamation should deprive any person of his lawful possessions, liberties, inheritances, privileges, franchises; nor yet infringe any common law or laudable custom of the realm (c). Were it possible to conceive that any act could be more opposite to the spirit of liberty than this law, it would have been another of the same parliament. They passed an act of attainder not only against the marquis of Exeter, the lords Montacute, Darcy, Hussey, and others, who had been legally tried and condemned; but also against some persons of the highest quality, who had never been accused, or examined, or convicted. Henry bore a violent hatred to cardinal Pole, which had extended itself to all his friends and relations; and particularly his mother the countess of Salisbury, who on that account had become extremely noxious to him. She was also accused of having employed her authority with her tenants, to hinder them from reading the new translation of the Bible; of having procured bulls from Rome, which it is said had been seen at Coudray, her country seat; and of having kept a correspondence with her son, the cardinal: but Henry found, either that these offences could not be proved, or that they would not by law be subjected to such severe punishments as he desired to inflict upon her. He resolved, therefore, to proceed in a more summary and more tyrannical manner; and for that purpose he sent Cromwell to ask the judges whether the parliament could attaint a person who was forth-coming, without giving him any trial, or citing him to appear before them? The judges replied, that it was a dangerous question, and that the high court of parliament ought to give the example to inferior courts, of proceeding according to justice: no inferior court could act in that arbitrary manner, and they thought that the parliament never would. Being pressed to give a more explicit answer, they replied, "that if a person were attainted in that manner, the attainder could never afterwards be brought in question, but must remain good in law." Henry learned by this decision, that such a method of proceeding, although contrary to the principles of equity, was yet practicable; and this being all he was desirous of knowing, he resolved to employ it against the countess of Salisbury. Cromwell showed to the house of peers a banner, on which were embroidered the five wounds of Christ, the symbol chosen by the northern rebels; and this banner, he affirmed, was found in the countess's house (d). No other proof seems to have been produced in order to ascertain her guilt: the servile parliament, therefore, without farther inquiry, passed a bill of attainder against her; and they involved in the same bill, without any better proof, as far as appears, Gertrude, marchioness of Exeter, sir Adrian Fortescue, and sir Thomas Dingley. These two gentlemen were executed: the marchioness was pardoned, and survived the king; the countess was reprieved.

The only beneficial act passed this session, was that by which the parliament confirmed the surrender of the monasteries; yet even this act contains much falsehood, much tyranny, and were it not that all private rights must submit to public interest, much injustice and iniquity. Every art that could be thought of was used to persuade the abbots to surrender their monasteries; but three abbots in particular, the abbots of Colchester, Reading, and Glastonbury; neither influenced by promises, nor intimidated by threats, had resolutely refused to make a concession which they regarded as destructive to their interests, as well as sacrilegious and criminal in itself; and, in order to punish them for their opposition, and make them an example to others, means had been found to convict them of treason; they had perished by the hands of the executioner, and the revenue of the convents had been forfeited (e). Besides, though none of these violences had taken place, the king knew that a surrender made by men who were only tenants for life, would not bear examination; and he was therefore resolved to make all sure by his usual expedient, an act of parliament. In the preamble to this act, the parliament asserts, that all the surrenders made by the abbots had been, "without constraint, of their own accord, and according to due course of common law." And in consequence, the two houses confirm (z) See the following chapter.

(a) There is a story, that the duke of Norfolk, meeting, soon after this act was passed, one of his chaplains, who was suspected of favouring the reformation, said to him, "Now, sir, what think you of the law to hinder priests from having wives?" "Yes, my lord," replies the chaplain, "you have done that; but I will answer for it you cannot hinder men's wives from having priests."

(b) The preamble contains, that the king had formerly set forth several proclamations which froward persons had wilfully contemned, not considering what a king by his royal power may do; that this license might encourage offenders not only to disobey the laws of Almighty God, but also to dishonour the king's most royal majesty, who may full ill bear it; that sudden emergencies often occur, which require speedy remedies, and cannot await the slow assembling and deliberations of parliament; and that, though the king was empowered by his authority derived from God, to consult the public good on these occasions, yet the opposition of refractory subjects might push him to extremity and violence: for these reasons the parliament, that they might remove all occasion of doubt, ascertained by a statute this prerogative of the crown, and enabled his majesty, with the advice of his council, to set forth proclamations enjoining obedience under whatever pains and penalties he should think proper: and these proclamations were to have the force of perpetual laws. 31 Hen. VIII. c. 8.

(c) They did not consider that no penalty could be inflicted upon the disobeying of proclamations, without invading some liberty or property of the subject; and that the power of enacting new laws joined to the dispensing power, then exercised by the crown, amounted to a full legislative authority. It is true, the kings of England had always been accustomed from their own authority to issue proclamations, and to exact obedience to them; and this prerogative was, no doubt, a strong symptom of absolute government: but still there was a difference between a power which was exercised on a particular emergence, and which must be justified by the present expedience or necessity; and an authority conferred by a positive statute, which could no longer admit of control or limitation.

the surrenders, and secure the property of the abbey lands to the king and his successors for ever (f). It is remarkable, that all the mitred abbots still sat in the house of peers; and that none of them entered any protests against this injurious statute: indeed, their forbearance is not to be wondered at, when we reflect on the fate of their three brethren abovementioned.

In this session the rank of all the great officers of state was fixed: Cromwell, as vicegerent, had the precedency assigned him above all of them. It was thought singular, that a blacksmith's son, for he was no other, should have place next the royal family; and that a man possessed of no manner of literature should be set at the head of the church.

No sooner indeed was the act of the six articles passed, than the catholics were very vigilant in informing against offenders; and in a short time nearly five hundred persons were thrown into prison. But Cromwell, who had not had interest to prevent that act, was able for the present to elude its execution. Seconded by the duke of Suffolk, and chancellor Audley, as well as by Cranmer, he remonstrated against the cruelty of punishing so many delinquents; and he obtained permission to set them at liberty. The arbitrary disposition and changeable temper of the king gave each party an opportunity of triumphing in its turn. No sooner had Henry passed this law, which seemed to inflict so deep a wound on the Reformers, than he granted a general permission for every one to have the new translation of the Bible in his family: a concession which was regarded by that party as an important acquisition.

As Henry was observed to be much governed by his wives while he retained his fondness for them, the final prevalence of either party seemed much to depend on the choice of the future queen. Immediately after the death of Jane Seymour, the most beloved of all his wives, he began to think of a new marriage. He first cast his eye towards the duchess-dowager of Milan, niece to the emperor; and he made proposals for that alliance. But meeting with difficulties, he was led by his friendship for Francis rather to think of a French princess. He demanded therefore the duchess-dowager of Longueville, daughter of the duke of Guise, a prince of the house of Lorraine; but Francis told him, that the lady was already betrothed to the king of Scotland. The king, however, would not take a refusal: he had set his heart on the match: the information which he had received of the duchess's accomplishments and beauty, had prepossessed him in her favour; and having privately sent over Meautys to examine her person, and get certain intelligence of her conduct, the accounts which that agent brought him served farther to inflame his desires. He learned that she was big made; and he thought her on that account the more proper match for him who was now become somewhat corpulent. The pleasure too of mortifying his nephew, whom he did not love, was a farther incitement to his prosecution of this match; and he insisted that Francis should give him the preference to the king of Scots. But Francis would not offend his friend and ally; and to prevent farther solicitation, he immediately sent the princess to Scotland. Not to shock, however, Henry's humour, Francis made him an offer of Mary of Bourbon, daughter of the duke of Vendôme; but as the king was informed that James IV. king of Scotland had formerly rejected this princess, he would not hear any farther of such a proposal. The French monarch then offered him the choice of the two younger sisters of the queen of Scots; and he assured him that they were nowise inferior either in merit or size to their eldest sister, and that one of them was even superior in beauty. The king was as scrupulous with regard to the person of his wives as if his heart had been really susceptible of the most delicate passion; and he was unwilling to trust any relations, or even pictures, with regard to this important particular. He proposed to Francis, that they should have a conference at Calais, on pretence of business; and that this monarch should bring along with him the two princesses of Guise, together with the finest ladies of quality in France, that he might make his choice from among them. But Francis was shocked at the proposal: he was impressed with too much regard, he said, for the fair sex, to carry ladies of the first quality like geldings to a market there to be chosen or rejected by the humour of the purchaser (g). Henry would hearken to none of these niceties, but still insisted on his proposal; which, however, notwithstanding Francis's earnest desire of obliging him, was finally rejected.

After this Henry began to turn his thoughts towards a German alliance: and as the princes of the league of Smalcalde were greatly disgusted with the emperor on account of his persecuting their religion, he hoped, by matching himself into one of their families, to renew a connexion which he regarded as so advantageous to him. Cromwell seconded this intention; and proposed to him Anne of Cleves, whose father, the duke of that name, had great interest among the Lutheran princes, and whose sister, Sibylla, was married to the elector of Saxony, the head of the protestant league. A flattering picture of the princess, by Hans Holbein, the king's painter, determined Henry to apply to her father; and after some negociation, the marriage, notwithstanding the opposition of the elector of Saxony, was concluded; and Anne was brought over to England (h). The king, impatient to be satisfied with regard to the person of his bride, went privately to Rochester, and got a sight of her. He found her big indeed, and tall, as he could wish; but utterly destitute both of beauty and grace; very unlike the pictures and representations which he had received: he swore she was a great Flanders mare; and declared that he never could possibly bear her any affection. The matter was worse when he found that she could speak no language but Dutch, of which he was entirely ignorant; nor was bred to music, which he admired; and that the charms of her conversation were not likely to compensate for the homeliness of her person. He returned to Greenwich very melancholy; and much lamented his hard fate to Cromwell, as well as to lord Russel, sir Anthony Brown, and sir Anthony Denny (i).

It was the subject of debate among the king's counsellors, whether the marriage could not yet be dissolved, and the princess be sent back to her own country. Henry's situation seemed at that time very critical. After the ten years truce concluded between the emperor and the king of France, a good understanding was thought to have taken place between these rival monarchs; and such marks of union appeared as gave great jealousy to the court of England. The emperor, who knew the generous nature of Francis, even greatly confided in him. An insurrection had been raised in the Low Countries by the inhabitants of Ghent, and seemed to threaten the most dangerous consequences. Charles, who resided at that time in Spain, resolved to go in person to Flanders, in order to appease those disorders; but he found great difficulties in chusing the manner of his passing thither. The road by Italy and Germany was tedious; the voyage through the Channel dangerous, by reason of the English naval power: he asked permission of Francis to pass through his dominions; and he entrusted himself into the hands of a rival whom he had so mortally offended. The French monarch received him at Paris with great magnificence and courtesy; and though prompted both by revenge and interest, as well as by the advice of his mistress and favourites, to make advantage of the present opportunity, he conducted the emperor safely out of his dominions; and would not even speak to him of business during his abode in France, lest his demands should bear the air of violence upon his royal guest.

Henry, being informed of these particulars, now believed that an entire union had taken place between these princes; and that their religious zeal might prompt them to unite their forces against England. An alliance with the German princess therefore seemed more than ever requisite for his interest and safety; and he knew that if he sent back the princess of Cleves, such an affront would be highly resented by her friends and family: so that he resolved, notwithstanding his aversion to her, to complete the marriage; which was celebrated at Greenwich, on the 6th of January, 1540; and he told Cromwell, that since matters had gone so far, he must put his neck into the yoke. Cromwell, who knew how much his own interests were concerned in this affair, was very anxious to learn from the king, next morning after the marriage, whether (f) 31 Hen. VIII. c. 13.—This assertion, every syllable of which it was well known to every member of the parliament, was utterly false.

(g) Le Grand, vol. iii. p. 638.

(h) Henry was so pleased on this occasion, that he ordered a fleet of fifty sail to go for her, under the command of William Fitz-Williams, earl of Southampton.

(i) This gentleman, in order to give him comfort, told him, that his misfortune was common to him with all kings, who could not, like private persons, chuse for themselves; but must receive their wives from the judgement and fancy of others.

he now liked his spouse any better. The king told him that he hated her worse than ever; and that her person was more disgusting on a near approach: he was resolved never to meddle with her; and said that he had strong reasons to suspect her virginity, (a point about which he pretended to be an excellent judge). He continued, however, to be civil to Anne; he even seemed to repose his usual confidence in Cromwell; but though he exerted this command over himself, a discontent lay lurking in his breast, and was ready to burst out whenever an occasion should offer.

A parliament was summoned to meet on the 12th of April, this year; and none of the abbots were allowed a place in the house of peers. The king, by the mouth of the chancellor, complained to the parliament of the great diversity of religions which still prevailed among his subjects: a grievance, he affirmed, which ought the less to be endured because the Scriptures were now published in English, and ought universally to be the standard of belief to all mankind. But he had appointed, he said, some bishops and divines to draw up a list of tenets to which his people were to assent; and he was determined that Christ, the doctrine of Christ, and the truth, should have the victory (k). Cromwell, as vicar-general, made also, in the king's name, a speech to the upper house; and the peers in return bestowed great flattery on him, and in particular, said that he was worthy, by his desert, to be vicar-general of the universe. That minister seemed to be no less in his master's good graces: soon after the sitting of the parliament, he received the title of earl of Essex, and was installed knight of the Garter.

There now remained but one religious order in England; the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, or the knights of Malta, as they are commonly called. This order, partly ecclesiastical, partly military, had by their valour done great service to Christendom; and had very much retarded at Jerusalem, Rhodes, and Malta, the rapid progress of the barbarians. During the general surrender of the religious houses in England, they had obstinately refused to yield up their revenues to the king; and Henry, who would endure no society that professed obedience to the pope, was obliged to have recourse to his usual expedient, the parliament, for the dissolution of this order. Their revenues were large, and formed an addition nowise contemptible to the many acquisitions which the king had already made. But his profuse generosity dissipated the plunder of the churches faster than his rapacity could supply; and the parliament was surprized this session to find a demand made upon them of four tenths, and a subsidy of one shilling in the pound during two years: so ill were the public expectations answered, that the crown was never more to require any supply from the people. The commons, though lavish of their liberty, and of the blood of their fellow-subjects, were extremely frugal of their money; and it was not without difficulty so small a grant could be obtained by this absolute and dreaded monarch. The convocation gave the king four shillings in the pound, to be levied in two years (l).

Henry's favour to Cromwell, and his acquiescence in the marriage with Anne of Cleves, were both of them deceitful appearances: his aversion to the queen daily increased; and having at last broken all restraint, it prompted him at once to seek the dissolution of a marriage so odious to him, and to involve his minister in ruin, who had been the innocent author of it. In seeking a divorce from Anne of Cleves, the king seemed to have acted without regard to the effects which such a step might have on his projected league with the German princes. The circumstance of Anne having been contracted, some years before, to a son of the duke of Lorraine, was gladly embraced as a pretext for the dissolution of her marriage with Henry.

Various circumstances now concurred to effect the ruin of Cromwell. All the nobility hated a man who, being of such low extraction, had not only soared above them by his station of vicar-general, but had engrossed many of the other considerable offices in the gift of the crown: besides enjoying that commission, which gave him a high and almost absolute authority over the clergy, and even over the laity, he was privy seal, chamberlain, and master of the wards: he had also obtained the order of the garter, a dignity which had ever been conferred only on men of illustrious families, and which in their idea had been profaned by its being communicated to so mean a person. The people were averse to him, as the supposed author of the violence on the monasteries; establishments which were still revered and beloved by many of the commonalty. The catholics regarded him as the concealed enemy of their religion: the protestants, observing his exterior concurrence with all the persecutions exercised against them, were inclined to bear him as little favour; and reproached him with the timidity, if not treachery, of his conduct. And the king, who found that great clamours had on all hands arisen against the administration, was not displeased to throw on Cromwell the load of public hatred; and he hoped by making so easy a sacrifice to regain the affections of his subjects.

There was, however, another cause which set these motives in action, and brought about a revolution in the ministry. The king had now fixed his affection on Catherine Howard, niece to the duke of Norfolk; and being determined to gratify this new passion, he could find no expedient but by procuring a divorce from his present consort, to raise Catherine to his bed and throne. The duke of Norfolk who had long been engaged in enmity with Cromwell, made the same use of her insinuations to ruin this minister, that he had formerly done of Anne Boleyn's against Wolsey: and when all his schemes were prepared, he obtained a commission from the king to arrest Cromwell at the council-table, on an accusation of high treason, and to commit him to the Tower (m). Immediately after, a bill of attainder was framed against him; and the house of peers thought proper, without trial, examination, or evidence, to condemn to death a man whom a few days before they had declared worthy to be "vicar-general of the universe (n)." The house of commons passed the bill, though not without some opposition. Cromwell was accused of heresy and treason; but the proofs of his treasonable practices are utterly improbable, and even absolutely ridiculous (o). It was stated in the act of attainder against the earl, that he had performed many acts of power without the consent or knowledge of the king; that he had frequently been induced, by bribes, to authorize the infringement of the royal proclamations; that he had used traitorous expressions against his majesty; that he had encouraged the growth of heresy, by the dispersion of heterodox publications, by licensing persons who were disaffected to the church to preach their erroneous doctrines, and by releasing many notorious heretics. As he had not the benefit of a trial, his adversaries, perhaps, were not very scrupulous with regard to the truth of the charges which they adduced against him; and, if his defence had been heard, many of the actions imputed to him might have been found to have proceeded from the king's private instructions.

Cromwell endeavoured to soften the king by the most humble supplications; but all this was without effect: it was not the practice of that prince to ruin his ministers and favourites by halves; and though the unhappy prisoner once wrote to him in so moving a strain as even to draw tears from his eyes, he hardened himself against all sensations of pity, and refused his pardon. The conclusion of Cromwell's letter ran in these words: "I, a most woeful prisoner, am ready to submit to death when it shall please God and your majesty; and yet the frail flesh incites me to call to your grace for mercy and pardon of mine offences. Written at the Tower with the heavy heart and trembling hand of your highness's most miserable prisoner, and poor slave, Thomas Cromwell." And a little below, "Most gracious prince, I cry for mercy, mercy, mercy (p)." When brought to the place of execution, on the 28th of July, he avoided all earnest protestations of his innocence, (k) The king seems to have expected more effect in ascertaining truth, from this new book of his doctors, than had ensued from the publication of the Scriptures.

(l) The pretext for these grants was, the great expence which Henry had undergone for the defence of the realm, in building forts along the sea-coast, and in equipping a navy. As he had at present no ally on the continent in whom he reposed much confidence, he relied only on his domestic strength, and was on that account obliged to be more expensive in his preparations against the danger of an invasion.

(m) While Cromwell was in this situation, he was deserted by all his friends except Cranmer, who, in a letter to the king, earnestly interceded for him, representing him as one of the most faithful servants that any prince ever had.

(n) We must observe, that Cromwell himself had been a servile instrument of Henry's tyrannical injustice, in procuring attainders against the countess of Salisbury and other persons, who were not admitted to trial; and he was now subjected, in his turn, to the same arbitrary process.

and

and all complaints against the sentence pronounced upon him (q). He knew that Henry would resent on his son those symptoms of opposition to his will, and that his death alone would not terminate that monarch's vengeance (r).

The measures for divorcing Henry from Anne of Cleves were carried on at the same time with the bill of attainder against Cromwell. The house of peers, in conjunction with the commons, petitioned the king to allow his marriage to be examined; and orders were immediately given to lay the matter before the convocation. The king pleaded her precontract with the duke of Lorraine as a ground of divorce; and added two reasons more, which may seem a little extraordinary; that when he espoused Anne he had not inwardly given his consent, and that he had not thought proper to consummate the marriage. The convocation was satisfied with these reasons, and solemnly annulled the marriage between the king and queen: the parliament ratified the decision of the clergy (s); and the princess was soon after made acquainted with the sentence.

Anne was blest with a happy insensibility of temper, even in the points which most nearly affect her sex; and the king's aversion towards her, as well as his prosecution of the divorce, had never given her the least uneasiness. She willingly hearkened to terms of accommodation with him; and when he offered to adopt her as his sister, to give her place next the queen and his own daughter, and to make a settlement of three thousand pounds a year upon her, she accepted of the conditions, and gave her consent to the divorce. She even wrote to her brother (for her father was now dead), that she had been very well used in England, and desired him to live on good terms with the king. The only instance of pride which she betrayed was, that she refused to return to Germany, after the affront which she had received; and she passed the remainder of her days in England.

Anne's moderation, however, was not able to prevent this incident from producing a great coldness between the king and the German princes; but as the political situation of Europe was much altered, Henry was the more indifferent about their resentment. The close intimacy which had taken place between Francis and Charles had subsisted during a very short time: the dissimilarity of their characters soon renewed, with greater violence than ever, their former hatred. While Charles remained at Paris, Francis had been imprudently engaged, by his open temper, and by that satisfaction which a noble mind naturally feels in performing generous actions, to make in confidence some dangerous discoveries to that interested monarch; and having now lost all suspicion of his rival, he hoped that the emperor and he, supporting each other, might neglect every other alliance. He not only communicated to his guest the state of his negociations with sultan Solyman and the Venetians; but also laid open the solicitations which he had received from Henry to enter into a confederacy against him. Charles had no sooner reached his own dominions, than he shewed himself unworthy of the friendly reception he had met with. He absolutely refused to fulfil his promise, and put the duke of Orleans in possession of the duchy of Milan: he informed Solyman and the senate of Venice of the treatment which they had received from their ally; and he took care that Henry should not be ignorant how readily Francis had abandoned him, to whom he owed many and important obligations, and had sacrificed him to a new confederate: he even misrepresented many things which the unsuspecting heart of the French monarch had disclosed to him. If Henry possessed true judgement and generosity, this incident alone had been sufficient to guide him in the choice of his ally. But his haughty and domineering pride caused him immediately to renounce the friendship of Francis, who had so unexpectedly given the preference to the emperor: and as Charles invited him to a renewal of ancient friendship, he willingly accepted of the offer; and thinking himself secure in this alliance, he neglected the amity both of France and the princes of the German empire.

This alliance was extremely agreeable to Henry's catholic subjects; and as it had perhaps contributed, among other reasons, to the ruin of Cromwell, it made them entertain hopes of a final prevalence over their antagonist. The marriage of the king with Catherine Howard, who was cousin-german to Anne Boleyn, which was celebrated on the 8th of August, was also regarded as a favourable incident to their party; and the subsequent events corresponded to their expectations. The king's councils being now directed by Norfolk and Gardiner, a furious persecution commenced against the protestants; and the law of the six articles was executed with rigour. Dr. Barnes, who had been the cause of Lambert's execution, felt in his turn the severity of the persecuting spirit; and, by a bill which passed in parliament, he was, without trial (t), condemned to the flames, together with Thomas Gerrard, parson of Honey Lane, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney. He discussed theological questions even at the stake; and as the dispute between him and the sheriff turned upon the invocation of saints, he said that he doubted whether the saints could pray for us; but if they could, he hoped in half an hour to be praying for the sheriff and all the spectators. He next entreated the sheriff to carry to the king his dying request, which he fondly imagined would have authority with that monarch, who had sent him to the stake. The purport of his request was, that Henry, besides repressing superstitious ceremonies, should be extremely vigilant in preventing fornication and common swearing. While Henry was exerting this violence against the protestants, he spared not the catholics who denied his supremacy; and a foreigner, at that time in England, had reason to say, that Henry acted with great inconsistency, for those who were against the pope were burned, and those who were for him were hanged. The king even displayed in an ostentatious manner this tyrannical impartiality, which reduced both parties to subjection, and infused terror into every breast (u).

Although the spirit of the English seemed to be sunk under the despotic power of Henry, there appeared some symptoms of discontent: an inconsiderable rebellion broke out in Yorkshire, headed by sir John Nevil; but it was soon suppressed, and Nevil, with other ringleaders, was executed. The rebels were supposed to have been instigated by the intrigues of cardinal Pole; and the king was instantly determined to make the countess of Salisbury, who already lay under sentence of death, suffer for her son's offences. He ordered her to be carried to execution on the 27th of May, 1541; and this venerable matron maintained still, in these distressful circumstances, the spirit of that long race of monarchs from whom she was descended (v). This insurrection engaged Henry to make a progress to the North, in order to quiet the minds of his people, (q) Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, suffered decapitation on Tower Hill, with lord Hungerford, who had also been attainted without trial for imputed acts of treason.

(r) He was, says Hume, a man of prudence, industry, and abilities; worthy of a better master and of a better fate. Though raised to the summit of power from a low origin, he betrayed no insolence or contempt towards his inferiors; and was careful to remember all the obligations which, during his more humble fortune, he had owed to any one. He had served as a private centinel in the Italian wars; when he received some good offices from a Lucquese merchant, who had entirely forgotten his person, as well as the service which he had rendered him. Cromwell in his grandeur happened at London to cast his eye on his benefactor, now reduced to poverty by misfortunes. He immediately sent for him, reminded him of their ancient friendship, and, by his grateful assistance, reinstated him in his former prosperity and opulence. Burnet, vol. i. p. 172.

(s) To shew how much Henry sported with law and common sense; how servilely the parliament followed all his caprices; and how much both of them were lost to all sense of shame; an act was passed this session, declaring that a pre-contract should be no ground for annulling a marriage; as if that pretext had not been made use of both in the case of Anne Boleyn and Anne of Cleves. But the king's intention in this law is said to be a design of restoring the princess Elizabeth to her right of legitimacy; and it was his character never to look farther than the present object, without regarding the inconsistency of his conduct. The parliament made it high treason to deny the dissolution of Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves. Herbert.

(t) What renders the matter clear that neither Barnes, Gerrard, nor Jerome, had been permitted to defend themselves, is the negative answer of the sheriff to Dr. Barnes, who asked him whether he knew the crime for which he was about to suffer? But Barnes, turning to the stake, replied, This tells me the crime I am supposed to be guilty of; and then prayed for the king and Gardiner, whom he suspected to be the author of his death.

(u) Dr. Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome had been carried to the place of execution on three hurdles; and along with them there was placed on each hurdle a catholic, who was also executed for his religion. These catholics were Abel, Fetherstone, and Powel, who declared that the most grievous part of their punishment was the being coupled to such heretical miscreants as suffered with them.

(v) She refused to lay her head on the block, or submit to a sentence where she had received no trial. She told the executioner, that if he would have her head, he must win it the best way he could: and thus, shaking her venerable grey locks, she ran about the scaffold; and the executioner followed her with his ax, aiming many fruitless blows at her neck before he was able to give the fatal stroke. Thus perished the last people, to reconcile them to his government, and to abolish the ancient superstitions, to which those parts were much addicted. He had also another motive for this journey: he proposed to have a conference at York with his nephew the king of Scotland, and, if possible to cement a close and indissoluble union with that kingdom (w).

A similar spirit of religious innovation with that which had seized other parts of Europe, had made its way into Scotland, and had begun, before this period, to excite similar jealousies, fears, and persecutions. About the year 1527, Patric Hamilton, a young man of a noble family, having been created abbot of Ferne, was sent abroad for his education; but had fallen into company with some reformers, aed he returned into his own country, very ill disposed towards that church, of which his birth and his merit entitled him to attain the highest dignities. The fervour of youth, and his zeal for novelty, made it impossible for him to conceal his sentiments; and Campbel, prior of the Dominicans, who under colour of friendship and a sympathy in opinion had insinuated himself into his confidence, accused him before cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews. Hamilton was invited to St. Andrews, in order to maintain with some of the clergy a dispute concerning the controverted points; and after much reasoning with regard to justification, free-will, original sin, and other topics of that nature, the conference ended with their condemning Hamilton to be burned for his errors. The young man, who had been deaf to the insinuations of ambition, was less likely to be shaken with the fears of death; while he proposed to himself both the glory of bearing testimony to the truth, and the immediate reward attending his martyrdom. The people, who compassionated his youth, his virtue, and his noble birth, were much moved at the constancy of his end; and an incident which soon followed still more confirmed them in their favourable sentiments towards him. He had cited Campbel, who still insulted him at the stake, to answer before the judgement seat of Christ; and as that persecutor, either astonished with these events, or overcome with remorse, or, perhaps, seized casually with a distemper, soon after lost his senses, and fell into a fever, of which he died; the people regarded Hamilton as a prophet as well as a martyr (x).

Among the disciples converted by Hamilton, was one frier Forrest, who became a zealous preacher; and who, though he did not openly discover his sentiments, was suspected to lean towards the new opinions. His diocesan, the bishop of Dunkel, enjoined him, when he met with a good epistle or good gospel which favoured the liberties of holy church, to preach on it, and let the rest alone. Forrest replied, that he had read both the Old and the New Testaments, and had not found an ill epistle or ill gospel in any part of them. Such close attachment to the scriptures was regarded in those days as a sure characteristic of heresy; and Forrest was soon after brought to trial, and condemned to the flames (y).

At the period of which we are now treating, the clergy were reduced to great difficulties, not only in Scotland, but all over Europe. As the reformers aimed at a total subversion of ancient establishments, which they represented as idolatrous, impious, detestable; the priests, who found both their honours and properties at stake, thought they had a right to resist, by every mean in their power, these dangerous invaders, and that the same simple principles of equity which justified a man in killing a pirate or a robber, would acquit them for the execution of such heretics. A toleration, which, however, was never acceptable to ecclesiastics, might, they said, be admitted in other cases; but seemed an absurdity where fundamentals were shaken, and where the possessions and even the existence of the established clergy were brought in danger. But though the church was thus carried by policy, as well as inclination, to kindle the fires of persecution; they found the success of this remedy very precarious; and observed, that the enthusiastic zeal of the reformers, inflamed by punishment, was apt to prove contagious on the compassionate minds of the spectators. The new doctrine, amidst all the dangers to which it was exposed, secretly spread itself throughout the country; and the minds of men were gradually disposed to a revolution in religion.

The most dangeroue symptom, however, for the clergy in Scotland was, that the nobility, from the example of England, had cast a wistful eye on the revenues of the church, and hoped, if a reformation took place, to enrich themselves by the plunder of the ecclesiastics. Even James himself, who was very poor, and was somewhat inclined to magnificence, particularly in building, had been swayed by similar motives: and began to threaten the clergy with the same fate that had attended them in the neighbouring country of South Britain. Henry also never ceased exhorting his nephew to imitate his example; and being moved both by the pride of making proselytes, and the prospect of security, should Scotland embrace a close union with him, he solicited the king of Scots to meet him at York; and obtained a promise to that purpose. The ecclesiastics were extremely alarmed at this resolution of James, and employed every expedient in order to prevent the execution of it. They represented the danger of innovation; the pernicious consequences of aggrandizing the nobility, already too powerful; the hazard of putting himself into the hands of the English, his hereditary enemies; the dependence on them which must ensue upon his losing the friendship of France, and of all foreign powers. To these considerations they added the prospect of immediate interest, by which they found the king to be much governed: they offered him a present gratuity of fifty thousand pounds; they promised him that the church should always be ready to contribute to his supply; and they pointed out to him the confiscation of heretics, as the means of filling his treasury, and of adding a hundred thousand pounds a-year to the crown revenues (z). The insinuations of his new queen, to whom youth, beauty, and address had given a powerful influence over him, seconded all these reasons; and James was at last engaged first to delay his journey, and then to send excuses to the king of England, who had already come to York, in order to be present at the interview (a).

This disappointment greatly chagrined Henry, and he vowed vengeance against his nephew. He began to vent his spleen by permitting piracies at sea, and incursions at land; but he received soon after, in his own family, an affront to which he was much more sensible, and which touched him in a point where he had always shewed an extreme delicacy. He had thought himself very happy in his new marriage: the agreeable person and disposition of Catherine had entirely captivated his heart and gained his affections; and he made no secret of his devoted attachment to her. He had even publicly, in his chapel, returned solemn thanks to Heaven for the happiness which the conjugal state afforded him; and he directed the bishop of Lincoln to compose a form of prayer for that purpose. But the queen's conduct very little merited this tenderness: one John Lascelles carried intelligence of some particulars which he had heard of her dissolute life to Cranmer; and told him that his sister, formerly a servant in the family of the old duchess of Norfolk, with whom Catherine was educated, had given him a faithful account of her licentious manners. Derham and Mannoc, both of them servants to the duchess, had been admitted to her bed; and she had even taken little care to conceal her shame from the other servants of the family. The primate, struck with this intelligence, which it was equally dangerous to conceal or to discover, communicated the of the line of Plantagenet, which with great glory, but still greater crimes and misfortunes, had governed England for the space of three hundred years. By her father, the duke of Clarence, she was cousin german to Henry's mother. Lord Leonard Grey, a man who had formerly rendered service to the crown, was also beheaded for treason soon after the countess of Salisbury. We know little concerning the grounds of his prosecution.

(w) During this progress, the places through which the king passed made their submission to him, making him the following presents: Stamford gave him twenty pounds; Lincoln, forty pounds; Boston, fifty pounds; Lindsey, three hundred pounds; Kesteven, and the church of Lincoln, fifty pounds; the chief persons of Yorkshire, nine hundred pounds; the archbishop of York with three hundred priests, six hundred pounds; the mayors of York, Newcastle, and Hull, one hundred pounds each. And as there had been a trifling insurrection, he, to throw all miscarriages on Cromwell, and to put his subjects in expectation of better times, issued out a proclamation, That all who had been aggrieved for want of justice, by any of his former ministers, should come to him and his council for redress.

matter to the earl of Hertford, and to the chancellor. They agreed that the matter should by no means be buried in silence; and the archbishop himself seemed the most proper person to disclose it to the king. Cranmer, unwilling to speak on so delicate a subject, wrote a narrative of the whole, and conveyed it to Henry, who was infinitely astonished at the intelligence. So confident was he of the fidelity of his consort, that at first he gave no credit to the information; and he said to the privy-seal, to lord Russel, high admiral, sir Anthony Brown, and Wriothesley, that he regarded the whole as a falsehood. Cranmer was now in a very perilous situation; and had not full proof been found, certain and inevitable destruction hung over him. The king's impatience, however, and jealousy, prompted him to search the matter to the bottom: the privy-seal was ordered to examine Lascelles, who persisted in the information he had given; and still appealed to the testimony of his sister. That nobleman next made a journey under pretence of hunting, and went to Sussex, where the woman at that time resided: he found her both constant in her former intelligence, and particular as to the facts; and the whole bore but too much the appearance of probability. Mannoc and Derham, who were arrested at the same time, and examined by the chancellor, made the queen's guilt certain by their confession; and discovered other particulars, which redounded still more to her dishonour. Three maids of the family were admitted into her secrets, and some of them had even passed the night in bed with her and her lovers. All the examinations were laid before the king, who was so deeply affected that he remained a long time speechless, and at last burst into tears. He found, to his surprize, that his great skill in distinguishing a true maid, of which he boasted in the case of Anne of Cleves, had failed him in that of his present consort. The queen, being next questioned, denied her guilt; but when informed that a full discovery was made, she confessed that she had been criminal before marriage; and only insisted that she had never been false to the king's bed. But as there was evidence that one Colepepper had passed the night with her alone since her marriage; and as it appeared that she had taken Derham, her old paramour, into her service, she seemed to deserve little credit in this asseveration; and the king, enraged to the highest degree, was not of a humour to make any difference between these degrees of guilt.

Henry now had recourse to his usual instrument of tyranny, a parliament, which accordingly met on the 6th of January, 1542. The two houses, having received the queen's confession, made an address to the king. They entreated him not to be vexed with this untoward accident, to which all men were subject; but to consider the frailty of human nature, and the mutability of human affairs; and from these views to derive a subject of consolation. They desired leave to pass a bill of attainder against the queen and her accomplices; and they begged him to give his assent to this bill, not in person, which would renew his vexation, and might endanger his health, but by commissioners appointed for that purpose. And as there was a law in force, making it treason to speak ill of the queen, as well as of the king, they craved his royal pardon if any of them should, on the present occasion, have transgressed any part of the statute. Having obtained a gracious answer to these requests, the parliament proceeded to vote a bill of attainder for treason against the queen, and the viscountess of Rocheford, (called in the act the bawd,) who had conducted her secret amours; and in this bill Colepepper and Derham were also comprehended. At the same time they passed a bill of attainder for misprision of treason against the old duchess of Norfolk, Catherine's grandmother; her uncle, lord William Howard, and his lady, together with the countess of Bridgewater, and nine persons more; because they knew the queen's vicious course of life before her marriage, and had concealed it (b).

Henry, willing to secure himself for the future, as well as his successors, from this fatal accident, engaged the parliament to pass a law somewhat extraordinary. It was enacted, That any one who knew, or vehemently suspected any guilt in the queen, might within twenty days disclose it to the king or council, without incurring the penalty of any former law against defaming the queen; but prohibiting every one at the same time from spreading the matter abroad, or even privately whispering it to others: it was also enacted, That if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, she should be guilty of treason if she did not previously reveal her guilt to him. The people made merry with this singular clause, and said, the king must henceforth look out for a widow; for no reputed maid would ever be persuaded to incur the penalty of the statute (c). When the king had given his assent to this act, he signed a warrant for the queen's execution, and she was beheaded, on the 12th of February, on Tower Hill, together with the infamous lady Rocheford. They behaved in a manner suitable to their dissolute life; and as lady Rocheford (d) was known to be the chief instrument in bringing Anne Boleyn to her end, she died unpitied; and men were farther confirmed, by the discovery of this woman's guilt, in the favourable sentiments which they had entertained of the unfortunate queen Anne.

In this session, Henry, being of opinion, that a greater splendour of title would flatter the Irish, and promote their more perfect submission, exchanged his style of lord of Ireland for that of king; and his proclamation for that purpose was communicated to the parliament; but it was not confirmed by statute till some years afterwards. He also gratified some of the chieftains of that island with titles; and the vigour of his administration restored tranquillity to his Hibernian subjects. This session likewise the commons first began the practice of freeing any of their members who were arrested, by a writ issued by the speaker. Formerly it had been usual for them to apply for a writ from chancery to that purpose. This precedent increased the authority of the commons, and had afterwards important consequences.

Henry did not demand any subsidy from this parliament; but found means of enriching his exchequer from another quarter: he took farther steps towards the dissolution of colleges, hospitals, and other foundations of that nature. The courtiers had been practising on the presidents and governors to make a surrender of their revenues to the king; and they had been successful with eight of them. But there was an obstacle to their farther progress: it had been provided, by the local statutes of most of these foundations, that no president or any number of fellows could consent to such a deed, without the unanimous vote of all the fellows; and this vote was not easily obtained. All such statutes were annulled by parliament; and the revenues of these houses were now exposed to the rapacity of the king and his favourites (e). The church had been so long their prey, that nobody was surprized at any new inroads made upon her. From the regular, Henry now proceeded to make devastations on the secular clergy. He extorted from many of the bishops a surrender of chapter lands; and by this device he pillaged the sees of Canterbury, York, and London, and enriched his greedy parasites and flatterers with their spoils.

Henry was fully determined to avenge himself on the king of Scots for treating the advances which he had made him with contumely, and would gladly have obtained a supply from parliament, in order to prosecute that enterprize; but as he deemed it imprudent to discover his intentions, that assembly, conformably to their frugal maxims, would not understand the hints that were given them; and the king was disappointed in his expectations. He continued, however, to make preparations for war; and when he thought himself in a condition to invade Scotland, he published a manifesto, by which he endeavoured to justify hostilities. He complained of James's breach of promise, in declining the proposed interview; which appears to have been the real ground of the quarrel (f): but in order to give a more specious colouring to the enterprize, he mentioned other injuries; namely, that his nephew had granted protection to some English rebels and fugitives, and had detained some land, of small value, on the frontiers, which Henry pretended belonged to England. He even revived the old claim to the vassalage of Scotland, and summoned James to do homage to him as his liege lord and superior. He employed the duke of Norfolk, whom he called the scourge of the Scots, as commander in chief of his forces; and though James sent the bishop of Aberdeen and sir James Learmont of Darsay to appease his uncle, he would hearken to no terms of accommodation, and even refused to allow the ambassadors to return. While Norfolk was assembling his army at Newcastle, sir Robert Bowes, attended by sir Ralph Sadler, sir Ralph Evers, sir Brian Latoun, and others, made an incursion into Scotland, and advanced towards Jedburgh, with an intention of pillaging and destroying that town. The earl of Angus, and George Douglas his brother, who had been many years banished their country, and had subsisted by Henry's bounty, joined the English army in this incursion; and the forces, commanded by Bowes, were upwards of four thousand men. James had not been negligent in his preparations for defence, and had posted a considerable body, under the command of the earl of Huntley, for the protection of the borders. Lord Hume, at the head of his vassals, was hastening to join Huntley when he met with the English army, which consisted of twenty thousand men; and an action ensued on the 24th of August, 1542. During the engagement the forces under Huntley began to appear; and the English, afraid of being surrounded and overpowered, took to flight, and were pursued by the enemy. Evers, Latoun, and some other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners. A few only of small note fell in the skirmish.

(b) This was an effect of Henry's usual extravagance, to expect that parents should so far forget the ties of natural affection, and the sentiments of shame and decency, as to reveal to him the most secret disorders of their family. He himself seems to have been sensible of the cruelty of this proceeding: for he pardoned the duchess of Norfolk, and most of the others condemned for misprision of treason.

(d) Lady Rocheford certainly deserved her fate for the concern which she had in bringing Anne Boleyn as well as her own husband to the block.

(e) It was enacted by this parliament, that there should be trial of treason in any county where the king should appoint by commission. The statutes of treason had been extremely multiplied in this reign; and such an expedient saved trouble and charges in trying that crime.

In the mean time the duke of Norfolk began to move from his camp at Newcastle; and being attended by the earls of Shrewsbury, Derby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Rutland, with many others of the nobility, he advanced to the borders. His forces amounted to above twenty thousand men; and it required the utmost efforts of Scotland to resist so formidable an armament. James had assembled his whole military force at Fala and Sautrey, and was ready to advance, upon receiving intelligence of Norfolk's invading his kingdom. The English passed the Tweed at Berwick, and marched along the banks of the river to Kelso; but hearing that James had collected near thirty thousand men, they repassed the river at that village, and retreated into their own country. The king of Scots, inflamed with a desire of military glory, and of revenge on his invaders, gave the signal for pursuing them, and carrying the war into England: but his nobles opposed this resolution, and refused to attend him in his projected expedition. Enraged at this mutiny, he reproached them with cowardice, and threatened vengeance; but still resolved, with the forces which adhered to him, to make an impression on the enemy. He sent ten thousand men to the western borders, who entered England at Solway Frith; and he himself followed them at a small distance, ready to join them upon occasion. Disgusted, however, at the refractory disposition of his nobles, he sent a message to the army, depriving lord Maxwel, their general, of his commission, and conferring the command on Oliver Sinclair, a private gentleman, who was his favourite. The army was extremely disgusted with this alteration, and was ready to disband; when a small body of English appeared, not exceeding five hundred men, under the command of Dacres and Musgrave. A panic seized the Scots, who immediately took to flight, and were pursued by the enemy (g). Few were killed in this rout; for it was no action. Among the prisoners were the earls of Cassilis and Glencairn; the lords Maxwel, Fleming, Somerville, Oliphant, Grey, who were all sent to London, and given in custody to different noblemen. Besides these, there were taken two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred soldiers, with twenty-four pieces of cannon.

Intelligence of this affair was speedily conveyed to the king of Scots, who was astonished; and being naturally of a melancholic disposition, as well as endowed with a high spirit, he lost all command of his temper on this dismal occasion. Rage against his nobility, who he believed had betrayed him; shame for a defeat by such unequal numbers; regret for the past, fear of the future; all these passions so wrought upon him, that he would admit of no consolation, but abandoned himself wholly to despair. His body was wasted by sympathy with his anxious mind; and even his life began to be thought in danger. He had no issue living; and hearing that his queen was safely delivered, he asked whether she had brought him a male or female child? being told the latter; he turned himself in his bed: "The crown came with a woman," said he, "and it will go with one: many miseries await this poor kingdom: Henry will make it his own either by force of arms or by marriage." A few days after, December 14, he expired, in the flower of his age (h); a prince of considerable virtues and talents; well fitted, by his vigilance and personal courage, for repressing those disorders to which his kingdom during that age was so much exposed. He executed justice with impartiality and rigour; but as he supported the commonality and the church against the rapine of the nobility, he escaped not the hatred of that order. The protestants also, whom he opposed, have endeavoured to throw many stains on his memory; but have not been able to fix any considerable imputation upon him (i).

On the death of James, Henry projected, in 1543, the scheme of uniting Scotland to his own dominions, by marrying his son Edward to the new queen of that kingdom. He called together the Scottish nobles who were his prisoners (k), and proposed to them an expedient, by which he hoped those disorders, so prejudicial to both states, would for the future be prevented. He offered to bestow on them their liberty without ransom; and only required of them engagements to favour the marriage of the prince of Wales with their young mistress. They were prevailed on to give their assent to the proposal, which appeared to them so natural and so advantageous to both kingdoms; and being conducted to Newcastle, they delivered to the duke of Norfolk hostages for their return, in case the intended nuptials were not completed: from that place they proceeded to Scotland, where they found affairs in some confusion.

The Roman pontiff, observing his authority in Scotland to be in danger from the spreading of the doctrines of the Reformation, had bestowed on Beaton, the primate, the dignity of cardinal, in order to confer more influence upon him; and that prelate had long been regarded as prime minister to James (l), and as the head of that party which defended the privileges and property of the ecclesiastics of his own church.

James Hamilton, earl of Arran, was next heir to the crown of Scotland by his grandmother, daughter of James III. and on that account seemed best entitled to possess that high office into which the cardinal by his forgery had intruded himself. The prospect also of his succession after a princess, who was in such tender infancy, procured him many partizans; and though his character indicated little spirit, activity, or ambition, a propensity which he had discovered for the new opinions, had attached him to all the zealous promoters of the Reformation. By means of these adherents, joined to the vassals of his own family, he had been able to make opposition to the cardinal's administration; and the suspicion of Beaton's (g) This circumstance happened on the 24th of November.

(h) This prince was the father of that unfortunate queen of Scots, Mary, who was afterwards beheaded in England in the reign of queen Elizabeth. She was born only seven days before his death.

(i) The persecutions exercised during James's reign are not to be ascribed to his bigotry, a vice of which he seems to have been as free as Francis the First, or the emperor Charles, both of whom, as well as James, shewed, in different periods of their lives, even an inclination to the new doctrines. The extremities to which all these princes were carried, proceeded entirely from the situation of affairs during that age, which rendered it impossible for them to act with greater temper or moderation, after they had embraced the resolution of supporting the ancient establishments. So violent was the propensity of the times towards innovation, that a bare toleration of the new preachers was equivalent to a formed design of changing the national religion.

(k) The earl of Cassilis, one of these persons, had been committed to the care of archbishop Cranmer; and he so profited by the instructions of that prelate, that, upon his return home, which was shortly after, he embraced the doctrines of the Reformation.

(l) Upon the death of the king, this man, apprehensive of the consequences, both to his party and to himself, endeavoured to keep possession of power; and for that purpose he is accused of executing a deed, which required a high degree of temerity. He forged, it is said, a will for the king, appointing himself, and three noblemen more, regents of the kingdom during the minority of the infant princess (m): at least, for historians are not well agreed in the circumstances of the fact, he had read to James a paper of that import, to which that monarch, during the delirium which preceded his death, had given an imperfect assent and approbation (n). By virtue of this will Beaton had put himself in possession of the government; and having united his interests with those of the queen-dowager, he obtained the consent of the convention of states, and excluded the pretensions of the earl of Arran.

forgery, with the accession of the noblemen who had been prisoners in England, assisted too by some money sent from London, was able to turn the balance in his favour. The earl of Angus and his brother, having taken the present opportunity of returning into their native country, opposed the cardinal with all the credit of that powerful family; and the majority of the convention had now embraced opposite interests to those which formerly prevailed. Arran was declared governor; the cardinal was committed to custody under the care of lord Seton; and a negociation was commenced with sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador, for the marriage of the infant queen with the prince of Wales (o). By means of the conditions which were agreed upon, the war between the nations, which had threatened Scotland with such dismal calamities, seemed to be fully composed, and to be changed into perpetual concord and amity. The cardinal-primate, however, prevailed on Seton to restore him to his liberty, and by his intrigues, he confounded all the schemes which were laid by Henry, notwithstanding their appearing to be so well concerted. He assembled the most considerable ecclesiastics; and having represented to them the imminent danger to which their revenues and privileges were exposed, he persuaded them to collect privately from the clergy a large sum of money, by which, if entrusted to his management, he engaged to overturn the schemes of their enemies. Besides the partizans whom he acquired by pecuniary motives, he roused up the zeal of those who were attached to the Catholic worship; and represented the union with England as the sure forerunner of ruin to the church and to the Catholic system. The national antipathy of the Scots to their southern neighbours was also an infallible engine by which the cardinal wrought upon the people; and though the terror of Henry's arms, and their own inability to make resistance, had procured a temporary assent to the alliance and marriage proposed, the settled habits of the nation produced an extreme aversion to those measures. The English ambassador and his retinue received many insults from persons whom the cardinal had instigated to commit those violences, in hopes of bringing on a rupture: but Sadler prudently dissembled the matter; and waited patiently till the day appointed for the delivery of the hostages. He then demanded of the regent the performance of that important article; but received for answer, that his authority was very precarious, that the nation had now taken a different impression, and that it was not in his power to compel any of the nobility to deliver themselves as hostages to the English. Sadler, foreseeing the consequence of this refusal, sent a summons to all those who had been prisoners in England, and required them to fulfil the promise which they had given, of returning into custody. None of them showed so much sentiment of honour as to fulfil their engagements, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Cassilis. Henry was so well pleased with the behaviour of this nobleman, that he not only received him graciously, but honoured him with presents, gave him his liberty, and sent him back to Scotland, with his two brothers whom he had left as hostages.

This behaviour of the generality of the Scottish nobles, though it reflected dishonour on the nation, was not disagreeable to cardinal Beaton, who foresaw that these persons would now be deeply interested to maintain their enmity and opposition to England. And as a war was soon expected with that kingdom, he found it necessary immediately to apply to France, and to crave the assistance of that ally during the present distresses of the Scottish nation. Though the French king was sensible of his interest in supporting Scotland, a demand of aid could not have been made on him at a more unseasonable juncture. His pretensions on the duchy of Milan, and his resentment against the emperor Charles, had engaged him in a war with that potentate; and having made great, though fruitless efforts, during the preceding campaign, he was disabled at present from defending his own dominions, much less from granting any succour to the Scots. Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, a young nobleman of a great family, was at that time in the French court; and Francis, being informed that he was engaged in ancient and hereditary enmity with the Hamiltons, (the relations of the earl of Arran,) who had murdered his father, sent him over to his native country, as a support to the cardinal and the queen dowager: and he promised that a supply of money, and, if necessary, even military succours, should soon be dispatched after him. On account of these preparations, the earl of Arran assembled his friends, and made an attempt to get the person of the infant queen into his custody; but being repulsed, he accommodated the affair with his enemies, and entrusted that precipus charge to four neutral persons, the heads of potent families, the Grahams, Areskines, Lindseys, and Levingstones. The arrival of Lenox, in the midst of these transactions, served to render the victory of the French party over the English still more indisputable.

The opposition Henry met with in Scotland from the intrigues of the French excited his resentment, and farther confirmed the resolution which he had already taken against France, and of uniting his arms with those of the emperor. He had other grounds of complaint against the French king; which, though not of great importance, yet being recent, were able to overbalance those great injuries which he had formerly received from Charles. Henry pretended that Francis had engaged to imitate his example in separating himself entirely from the see of Rome, and that he had broken his promise in that particular. He was dissatisfied that James his nephew had been allowed to marry, first Magdalene of France, then a princess of the house of Guise; and he considered these alliances as pledges which Francis gave of his intentions to support the Scots against the power of England. He had been informed of some railleries which the French king had thrown out against his conduct with regard to his wives. He was disgusted that Francis, after so many obligations which he owed him, had sacrificed him to the emperor; and, in the confidence of friendship, had rashly revealed his secrets to that subtle and interested monarch. And he complained that regular payments were never made of the sums due to him by France, and of the pension which had been stipulated. Impelled by these motives, he alienated himself from his ancient friend and confederate, and formed a league with the emperor, who earnestly courted his alliance (p). That they might have a pretence for enforcing their claims, they sent a message to Francis, requiring him to renounce his alliance with sultan Solyman, and to make reparation for all the evils which Christendom had sustained from that unnatural confederacy. Upon the French king's refusal, war was declared against him by the allies (q).

While the treaty with the emperor was negociating, the king summoned a new session of parliament, on the 22nd of January, 1543, in order to obtain supplies for his projected war with France. The parliament granted him a subsidy, to be paid in three years: it was levied in a peculiar manner; but exceeded not three shillings in the pound upon any individual (r). The convocation gave the king six shillings in the pound, to be levied in three years. Greater sums were always, even during the establishment of the Catholic religion, exacted from the clergy than from the laity: which made the emperor Charles say, when Henry dissolved the monasteries, and sold their revenues, or bestowed them on his nobility and courtiers, that he had killed the hen which brought him the (o) The following conditions were quickly agreed on; that the queen should remain in Scotland till she should be ten years of age; that she should then be sent to England to be educated; that six Scottish noblemen should immediately be delivered as hostages to Henry; and that the kingdom, notwithstanding its union with England, should still retain its laws and privileges. Sir Ralph Sadler's Letters.

(p) This league, besides stipulations for mutual defence, contained a plan for invading France; and the two monarchs agreed to enter Francis's dominions with an army, each of twenty-five thousand men; and to require that prince to pay Henry all the sums which he owed him, and to consign Boulogne, Montreuil, Terouenne, and Ardres, as a security for the regular payment of his pension for the future: in case these conditions were rejected, the confederate princes agreed to challenge for Henry the crown of France, or, in default of it, the duchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, and Guienne; for Charles, the duchy of Burgundy, and some other territories. Rymer, vol. xiv. p. 768. vol. xv. p. 2.

(q) It may be proper to remark, that the partizans of France objected to Charles his alliance with the heretical king of England, as no less noxious than that which Francis had contracted with Solyman; and they observed, that this league was a breach of the solemn promise which he had given to Clement VII. never to make peace or alliance with England.

(r) They who were worth in goods twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds, paid four pence of every pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, sixteen pence; from twenty and upwards, two shillings. Lands, fees, and annuities, from twenty shillings to five pounds, paid eight pence in the pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, sixteen pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two shillings; from twenty pounds and upwards, three shillings.

golden

golden eggs (s). The parliament also facilitated the execution of the former law, by which the king's proclamations were made equal to statutes: they appointed that any nine counsellors should form a legal court for punishing all disobedience to proclamations. The total abolition of juries in criminal causes, as well as of all parliaments, seemed, if the king had so pleased, the necessary consequence of this enormous law. He might issue a proclamation, enjoining the execution of any penal statute, and afterwards try the criminals, not for breach of the statute, but for disobedience to his proclamation (t).

On the 12th of July, this year, the king married Catherine Par, widow of Nevil lord Latimer; a woman of virtue, and somewhat inclined to the Reformation; but, knowing the danger of contradicting the king in religious matters, she withheld her interference; and even refused to interfere in behalf of three Protestants, who were burned at Windsor, immediately after her marriage, at the solicitation of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester. By this, Henry's sixth marriage, he confirmed what had formerly been foretold in jest, that he would be obliged to espouse a widow. The king's league with the emperor seemed a circumstance no less favourable to the catholic party; and thus matters remained still nearly balanced between the partizans of the two religions.

The advantages gained by this powerful confederacy between Henry and Charles were inconsiderable during the present year. The campaign was opened with a victory gained by the duke of Cleves, Francis's ally, over the forces of the emperor (u): Francis in person took the field early; and made himself master, without resistance, of the whole duchy of Luxembourg: he afterwards took Landrecy, and added some fortifications to it. Charles having at last assembled a powerful army, appeared in the Low Countries; and after taking almost every fortress in the duchy of Cleves, he reduced the duke to accept of the terms which he was pleased to prescribe to him. Being then joined by a body of six thousand English, under sir John Wallop, he sat down before Landrecy, and covered the siege with an army of above forty thousand men. Francis advanced at the head of an army not much inferior; as if he intended to give the emperor battle, or oblige him to raise the siege: but while these two rival monarchs were facing each other, and all men were in expectation of some great event, the French king found means of throwing succour into Landrecy, the garrison of which place, consisting of veteran troops, was commanded by De la Lande and Dessè, two officers of reputation; and having thus effected his purpose, he skilfully made a retreat. Charles, finding the season far advanced, despaired of success in his enterprize, and found it necessary to go into winter quarters.

Henry's vanity was flattered by the figure which he made in the great transactions on the continent; but the interests of his kingdom were more deeply concerned in the event of affairs in Scotland. Arran, the governor, was of an indolent and unambitious character, so that, had he not been stimulated by his friends, he never had aspired to any share in the administration; and when he found himself overpowered by the party of the queen-dowager, the cardinal, and the earl of Lenox, he gladly accepted of terms of accommodation. He even gave them a sure pledge of his sincerity, by renouncing the principles of the reformers, and reconciling himself to the Romish communion in the Franciscan church at Stirling. By this weakness he lost his credit with the nation, and rendered the Protestants, who were hitherto the chief support of his power, his inveterate enemies. The cardinal now acquired an entire ascendant in the kingdom: the queen-dowager placed implicit confidence in him: the governor was obliged to yield to him in every pretension: Lenox alone was become an obstacle to his measures, and reduced him to some difficulty.

The enmity which had taken place between the families of Lenox and Arran made the interests of these two noblemen entirely incompatible; and as cardinal Beaton and the French party, in order to engage Lenox the more in their cause, had flattered him with the hopes of succeeding to the crown after the death of their infant sovereign, this rivalship had tended still farther to rouse the animosity of the Hamiltons. Lenox too had been encouraged to aspire to the marriage of the queen-dowager, which would have given him some pretensions to the regency; and as he was become assuming on account of the services which he had rendered the party, the cardinal found that since he must chuse between the friendship of Lenox and that of Arran, the latter nobleman, who was more easily governed, and who was invested with present authority, was in every respect preferable. Lenox, finding that he was not likely to succeed in his pretensions to the queen-dowager, and that Arran, favoured by the cardinal, had acquired the ascendancy, retired to Dunbarton, the governor of which was entirely at his devotion: he entered into a secret correspondence with the English court, and summoned his vassals and partizans to attend him. All those who were inclined to the Protestant religion, or were discontented with the cardinal's administration, now regarded Lenox as the head of their party; and readily made him a tender of their services. In a short time he had collected an army of ten thousand men, and threatened his enemies with immediate destruction. The cardinal had no equal force to oppose to him; but he foresaw that Lenox could not long subsist so great an army, and endeavoured to gain time by opening a negociation with him. He seduced his followers by various artifices; he prevailed on the Douglasses to change party; he represented to the nation the danger of civil wars and commotions; and Lenox, observing the unequal contest in which he was engaged, was at last obliged to lay down his arms, and to accept of an accommodation with the governor and the cardinal. Peace was again restored; but no confidence took place between the parties. Lenox, fortifying his castles, and putting himself in a posture of defence, waited the arrival of English succours, upon whose assistance he relied, and expected to obtain the superiority over his enemies by their co-operation with him.

On the 14th of January, 1544, Henry summoned a new parliament; in which a law was passed, such as he was pleased to dictate, concerning the succession of the crown. After declaring that the prince of Wales or any of the king's male issue, were first and immediate heirs to the crown, the parliament restored the two princesses, Mary and Elizabeth, to their right of succession (v). Another act was passed, which declared, that the king's usual style should be "King of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith (w), and on earth the supreme head of the church of England and Ireland." An act also passed for the remission of the debt which the king had lately contracted by a general loan, levied upon the people. It will easily be believed, that after the former act of this kind, the loan was not entirely voluntary (x). But there was a peculiar circumstance attending the present statute, which none but Henry would have thought of; namely, that those who had already gotten payment, either in whole or in part, should refund the money to the exchequer. The oaths which Henry imposed for the security of his ecclesiastical model, were not more reasonable than his other measures. All his subjects, of every denomination, had been obliged to renounce the pope's supremacy; but as the clauses to which they swore had not been deemed entirely satisfactory, another oath was imposed; and it was added, that all those who had taken the former oaths should be understood to have taken the new one (y). A strange supposition! to represent men as bound by an oath which they had never taken! The most commend-

(t) It is remarkable that lord Mountjoy—to the disgrace of the nation, but to his own unspeakable honour—was the only nobleman who had sufficient spirit and honesty to enter a protest against this law; and it is equally remarkable, that that protest is the only one entered against any public bill during the whole of this ignominious reign. Burnet, p. 322.

(v) This, says Hume, seemed a reasonable piece of justice, and corrected what the king's former violence had thrown into confusion; but it was impossible for Henry to do any thing, how laudable soever, without betraying, in some circumstance, his usual extravagance and caprice: though he opened the way for these two princesses to mount the throne, he would not allow the acts to be reversed which had declared those princesses illegitimate; he made the parliament confer on him a power of still excluding them, if they refused to submit to any conditions which he should be pleased to impose; and he required them to enact, that, in default of his own issue, he might dispose of the crown as he pleased, by will or letters patent. He did not probably foresee, that, in proportion as he degraded the parliament, by rendering it the passive instrument of his variable and violent inclinations, he taught the people to regard all its acts as invalid, and thereby defeated even the purposes which he was so bent to attain.

(w) It seemed a palpable inconsistency to retain the title of Defender of the Faith, which the court of Rome had conferred on him, for maintaining its cause against Luther; and yet subjoin his ecclesiastical supremacy in opposition to the claims of that court.

able law to which the parliament gave their sanction, was that by which they mitigated the law of the six articles, and enacted, that no person should be put to his trial upon an accusation concerning any of the offences comprised in that sanguinary statute, except on the oath of twelve persons, before commissioners authorized for that purpose; and that no person should be arrested or committed to ward for any such offence before he was indicted. And any preacher accused of speaking in his sermon contrary to these articles, was by this law to be indicted within forty days.

The king always experienced the limits of his authority whenever he demanded subsidies, however moderate, from the parliament; and therefore, not to hazard a refusal, he made no mention on the present occasion of a supply: but as his wars both in France and Scotland, as well as his usual prodigality, had involved him in great expences, he had recourse to other methods of filling his exchequer. Notwithstanding the former abolition of his debts, he yet required new loans from his subjects; and he enhanced gold from forty-five shillings to forty-eight shillings an ounce; and silver from three shillings and nine pence to four shillings. His pretence for this innovation was to prevent the money from being exported; as if that expedient could anywise serve the purpose. He even coined some base money, and commanded it to be current by proclamation. He named commissioners for levying a benevolence, and extorted about seventy thousand pounds by this expedient. Read, alderman of London, a man somewhat advanced in years, having refused to contribute, or his contribution not coming up to the expectation of the commissioners, was inrolled as a foot-soldier in the Scottish wars, and was there taken prisoner. Roach, who had been equally refractory, was thrown into prison, and did not obtain his liberty but by paying a large composition. These powers of the prerogative, the compelling of any man to serve in any office, and the imprisoning of any man during pleasure, not to mention the practice of extorting loans, rendered the sovereign in a manner absolute master of the persons and properties of all his subjects.

In the early part of this year the king sent a fleet and an army to invade Scotland. The fleet consisted of near two hundred vessels, and carried on board ten thousand men. John Dudley, lord Lisle, commanded the sea forces; Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, the land. The troops were disembarked near Leith; and, after dispersing a small body which opposed them, they took that town without resistance, which they sacked and burnt, and then marched to Edinburgh. The gates were soon beaten down, and the English first pillaged, and then set fire to the city. As the regent and cardinal were not prepared to oppose so great a force, they fled to Stirling. The earl of Hertford marched eastward; and being joined by a new body under Evers, warden of the east marches, he laid waste the whole country, burned and destroyed Haddington and Dunbar, and then retreated into England; having lost only forty men in the whole expedition. The earl of Arran collected some forces; but finding that the English were already departed, he turned them against Lenox, who was justly suspected of a correspondence with the enemy. That nobleman, after making some resistance, was obliged to fly into England; where Henry settled a pension on him, and even gave him his niece, lady Margaret Douglas, in marriage. In return, Lenox stipulated conditions by which, had he been able to execute them, he must have reduced his country to total subjection (z).

Henry's policy was blamed in this sudden and violent incursion; by which he inflamed the passions of the Scots, without subduing their spirit; and it was commonly asserted, that he did too much if he intended to solicit an alliance, and too little if he meant a conquest (a). But the reason of his recalling the troops so soon, was his eagerness to carry on an enterprize which he had projected against France, in which he intended to employ the whole force of his kingdom. He had concerted a plan with the emperor, which threatened the ruin of that monarchy, and must, as a necessary consequence, have involved the ruin of England. These two princes had agreed to invade France with forces, amounting to above a hundred thousand men: Henry engaged to set out from Calais; Charles from the Low Countries: they were not to enter on any siege; but leaving all the frontier towns behind them, to march directly to Paris, where they were to join their forces, and thence to proceed to the entire conquest of the kingdom. At this time Francis could not oppose to these formidable preparations much above forty thousand men.

Henry, having appointed the queen regent during his absence, went over to Calais, on the 24th of July, with thirty thousand men, accompanied by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, Fitzalan earl of Arundel, Vere earl of Oxford, the earl of Surrey, Paulet lord St. John, lord Ferrers of Chartley, lord Mountjoy, lord Grey of Wilton, sir Anthony Brown, sir Francis Bryan, and the most flourishing nobility and gentry of his kingdom. The English army was soon joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thousand foot and four thousand horse; and the whole composed an army which nothing on that frontier was able to resist. The chief force of the French armies was drawn to the side of Champagne, in order to oppose the Imperial forces.

The emperor Charles, with an army of near sixty thousand men, had taken the field much earlier than Henry; and, not to lose time, while he waited for the arrival of his confederate, he sat down before Luxembourg, which soon after surrendered to him: he thence proceeded to Commercy, on the Meuse, which he likewise took: Ligny met with the same fate: he next laid siege to St. Disier, on the Marne, which, though a weak place, made a brave resistance, under the count of Sancerre, the governor, and the siege was protracted beyond the expectation of the besiegers.

Charles was employed before this town at the time the English forces were assembled in Picardy. Henry, either tempted by the defenceless condition of the French frontier, or apprehending that the emperor had first broken his engagement, by forming sieges, or perhaps foreseeing at last the dangerous consequences of entirely subduing the French monarchy, instead of marching forward to Paris, sat down before Montreuil and Boulogne. The duke of Norfolk commanded the army before Montreuil: the king himself that before Boulogne. Vervin was governor of the latter place, and under him Philip Corse, a brave old soldier, who encouraged the garrison to defend themselves to the last extremity against the English. He was killed during the course of the siege, on the 14th of September, and the town was immediately surrendered to Henry by the cowardice of Vervin; who was afterwards beheaded for his dishonourable conduct.

During the course of this siege Charles had taken St. Disier; and finding the season much advanced, began to hearken to a treaty of peace with France, since all his schemes for subduing that kingdom were likely to prove abortive. That he might have a pretence for deserting his ally, he sent a messenger to the English camp, requiring Henry immediately to fulfil his engagements, and to meet him with his army before Paris. Henry replied, that he was too far engaged in the siege of Boulogne to raise it with honour, and that the emperor himself had first broken the concert, by besieging St. Disier. This answer served Charles as a sufficient reason for concluding a peace with Francis, at Crepy, on the 18th of September, where no mention was made of the English. He stipulated to give Flanders as a dowry to his daughter, whom he agreed to marry to the duke of Orleans, Francis's second son; and Francis in return withdrew his troops from Piedmont and Savoy, and renounced all claim to Milan, Naples, and other territories in Italy, to which he had pretensions. This peace, so advantageous to Francis, was procured partly by the decisive victory obtained in the beginning of the campaign by the count of Anguyen over the Imperialists, at Cerisolles, in Piedmont, and partly by the emperor's great desire to turn his arms against the protestant princes in Germany. Charles ordered his troops to separate from the English in Picardy; and Henry, finding himself obliged to raise the siege of Montreuil, returned into England about the 30th of the same month. This campaign did not redound much to the honour of the English, though it served the populace as matter of great triumph; but all men of sense concluded that the king had, as in all his former military enterprizes, made, at a great expence, an acquisition which was of no importance.

During the king's absence the war with Scotland was conducted feebly, and with various success. Sir Ralph Evers, now lord Evers, and sir Bryan Latoun, made an inroad into that kingdom; and having laid waste the counties of Tiviotdale, Lauderdale, and the Merse, they proceeded to the abbey of Coldingham, which they took possession of, and fortified. The governor assembled an army army of eight thousand men, in order to dislodge them from this post; but he had no sooner opened his batteries before the place than a sudden panic seized him; he left the army, and fled to Dunbar. He complained of the mutiny of his troops, and pretended apprehensions lest they should deliver him into the hands of the English; but his own unwarlike spirit was generally believed to have been the motive of this dishonourable flight. The Scottish army, upon the departure of their general, fell into confusion; and had not Angus, with a few of his retainers, brought off the cannon, and protected their rear, the English might have gained great advantages over them. Evers, elated with this success, boasted to Henry that he had conquered all Scotland to the Forth; and he claimed a reward for this important service. The duke of Norfolk, who knew with what difficulty such acquisitions would be maintained against a warlike enemy, advised the king to grant him, as his reward, the conquests of which he boasted so highly. The next inroad made by the English shewed the vanity of Evers's hopes. In the beginning of 1545, this general led about five thousand men into Tiviotdale, and was employed in ravaging that country, when intelligence was brought him that some Scottish forces appeared near the abbey of Melross. Angus had roused the governor to more activity; and a proclamation being issued for assembling the troops of the neighbouring counties, a considerable body had repaired thither to oppose the enemy. Norman Lesly, son of the earl of Rothes, had also joined the army with some volunteers from Fife; and he inspired courage into the whole, as well by this accession of force, as by his own personal bravery and intrepidity. In order to bring their troops to the necessity of a steady defence, the Scottish leaders ordered all their cavalry to dismount; and they resolved to wait, on some high grounds near Ancram, the assault of the English. The English, who despised the enemy, thought, when they saw the Scottish horses led off the field, that the whole army was retiring; and they made an attack upon them on the 17th of February. The Scots received them in good order; and being favoured by the advantage of the ground, as well as by the surprize of the English, who expected no resistance, they soon put them to flight and pursued them with considerable slaughter. Evers and Latoun were both killed, and above a thousand men were made prisoners. In order to support the Scots in this war, Francis some time after sent over a body of auxiliaries, to the number of three thousand five hundred men, under the command of Montgomery, lord of Lorges. Reinforced by these succours, the governor assembled an army of fifteen thousand men at Haddington, and marched thence to ravage the east borders of England. He laid all waste wherever he came; and then retired into his own country, and disbanded his army. The earl of Hertford, in revenge, committed ravages on the middle and west marches; and the war on both sides was signalized rather by the ills inflicted on the enemy, than by any considerable advantage gained by either side.

The war likewise between France and England was not distinguished this year by any memorable event. Francis had equipped a fleet of one hundred and sixty large ships, sixty smaller vessels, ten Genoese auxiliaries, and twenty-five gallies; which he placed under the command of admiral Annebant; and having embarked some land forces on board, he sent them to make a descent on the coast of England. They sailed to the Isle of Wight, where they arrived on the 18th of July, 1545, and found the English fleet lying at anchor in the road of St. Helen's. It consisted not of above a hundred sail; and the admiral thought it most advisable to remain in that road, in hopes of drawing the French into the narrow channels and the rocks, with which the French were unacquainted. But the French admiral, being convinced of the danger there would be to follow the English, contented himself for the present, with landing in three places on the island, where he burnt some villages; from whence he steered and made a descent near Brighthelmstone and Newhaven, on the coast of Sussex, where he found the coast so well guarded, that he, without doing much damage, retired; and finding the English fleet, considerably increased, endeavoured to regain his own shore. But after some days, the French fleet being driven back to the coast of England, by a south wind, and put into a little confusion, the English admiral gave them battle for two hours; when they parted without much loss on either side, except the sinking of the Mary Rose, one of the largest of the English ships.

Francis's chief intention in equipping so great a fleet, was to prevent the English from throwing succours into Boulogne, which he resolved to besiege; and for that purpose he ordered a fort to be built, by which he intended to block up the harbour. After a considerable loss of time and money, the fort was found so ill constructed, that he was obliged to abandon it; and though he had assembled on that frontier an army of near forty thousand men, he was not able to effect any considerable enterprize. Henry, in order to defend his possessions in France, had levied fourteen thousand Germans; who having marched to Fleurines, in the bishopric of Liege, found that they could advance no farther. The emperor would not allow them a passage through his dominions: they received intelligence of a superior army on the side of France ready to intercept them: want of occupation and of pay soon produced a mutiny among them; and having seized the English commissaries as a security for arrears, they retreated into their own country.

By reason of his expences in carrying on these two wars, Henry was obliged to summon a new parliament, which met on the 23rd of November; when the commons granted him a subsidy, payable in two years, of two shillings in the pound on land (b): the convocation voted him six shillings in the pound. But the parliament, apprehensive lest more demands should be made upon them, endeavoured conscientiously to save themselves by a very extraordinary liberality of other people's property: by one vote they bestowed on the king all the revenues of the universities, as well as of the chauntries, free chapels (c), and hospitals. Henry was doubtless pleased with this infamous concession, because it increased his power; but he had no intention to rob learning of all her endowments; and he soon took care to inform the universities that he meant not to touch their revenues. Thus these ancient and celebrated establishments owe their existence to the generosity of the king, not to the protection of this servile and prostituted parliament!

The prostitute spirit of the parliament farther appeared in the preamble of a statute (d), in which they recognize the king to have always been, by the word of God, supreme head of the church of England; and acknowledge that archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, have no manner of jurisdiction but by his royal mandate: "To him alone," say they, "and such persons as he shall appoint, full power and authority is given from above to hear and determine all manner of causes ecclesiastical, and to correct all manner of heresies, errors, vices, and sins whatsoever." No mention is here made of the concurrence of a convocation, or even of a parliament. His proclamations are, in effect, acknowledged to have not only the force of law, but the authority of revelation; and by his royal power he might regulate the actions of men, control their words, and even direct their inward sentiments and opinions.

On the 24th of December, the king made, in person, a speech to the parliament, on proroguing them; in which, after thanking them for their loving attachment to him, which, he said, equalled what was ever paid by their ancestors to any king of England, he complained of their dissensions, disputes, and animosities in religion. He told them, that the several pulpits were become a kind of batteries against each other; and that one preacher called another heretic and anabaptist, which was retaliated by the opprobrious appellations of papist and hypocrite: that he had permitted his people the use of the scriptures, not in order to furnish them with materials for disputing and railing, but that he might enable them to inform their consciences, and instruct their children and families: that it grieved his heart to find how that precious jewel was prostituted, by being introduced into the conversation of every alehouse and tavern, and employed as a pretence for decrying the spiritual and legal pastors: and that he was sorry to observe that the word of God, while it was the (c) A chauntry was a little church, chapel, or particular altar in some cathedral church, &c. endowed with lands or other revenues for the maintenance of one or more priests, daily to say mass, or perform divine service, for the use of the founders, or such others as they appointed: free chapels were independent on any church, and endowed for much the same purpose as the former. Jacob's Law Dictionary.

object of so much anxious speculation, had very little influence on their practice; and that, though an imaginary knowledge so much abounded, charity was daily going to decay (e). Thus we find, that the king, like every hypocrite, could give good advice; but his own example, by encouraging speculation and dispute, was ill fitted to promote that peaceable submission of opinion which he here recommended.

Henry employed the money which had been granted by parliament in military preparations; and he sent over the earl of Hertford and lord Lisle, the admiral, to Calais, with a body of nine thousand men, two-thirds of which consisted of foreigners. Some skirmishes of a trifling nature ensued with the French; and no hopes of any considerable progress could be entertained by either party. Henry, whose animosity against Francis was not violent, had given sufficient vent to his humour by this short war; and finding that from his great increase of corpulence and gradual decay of strength, he could not hope for much longer life, he was desirous of ending a quarrel which might prove dangerous to his kingdom during a minority. Francis likewise, on his part, was not averse to peace with England; because having lately lost his son the duke of Orleans, he revived his ancient claim upon Milan, and foresaw that hostilities were soon likely, on that account, to break out between him and the emperor. Commissioners, therefore, having met at Campe, a small place between Ardres and Guisnes, on the 7th of June, 1546, the articles were soon agreed on, and the peace signed by them (f).

The king, now freed from foreign wars, began to turn his thoughts towards the settlement of his domestic affairs; he paid particular attention to the establishment of uniformity in opinion, which he so much desired. Though he allowed an English translation of the Bible, he had hitherto been very careful to keep the mass in Latin; but he was at last prevailed on to permit that the litany, a considerable part of the service, should be celebrated in the vulgar tongue; and, by this innovation, he excited anew the hopes of the reformers, who had been somewhat discouraged by the severe law of the six articles. One petition of the new litany was a prayer to save us "from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and from all his detestable enormities." Cranmer employed his credit to draw Henry into farther innovations; and he took advantage of Gardiner's absence, who, together with the bishop of Westminster (g), was sent on an embassy to the emperor: but Gardiner having written to the king, that if he carried his opposition against the catholic religion to greater extremities, Charles threatened to break off all commerce with him, the success of Cranmer's projects was for some time retarded. Cranmer lost this year the most sincere and powerful friend that he possessed at court, Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk (h): the queen-dowager of France, consort to Suffolk, had died some years before.

Cranmer, when bereft of this support, was greatly exposed to those cabals of the courtiers, which the opposition in party and religion, joined to interested motives, rendered so frequent among Henry's ministers and counsellors. The catholics took hold of the king by his passion for orthodoxy; and they represented to him, that if his laudable zeal for enforcing the truth met with no better success, it was altogether owing to the primate, whose example and encouragement were, in reality, the secret supports of heresy. Henry, seeing the point at which they aimed, feigned a compliance, and desired the council to make inquiry into Cranmer's conduct; promising that, if he were found guilty, he should be committed to prison, and brought to condign punishment. Every body now considered the primate as lost; and his old friends, from interested views, as well as the opposite party, from animosity, began to show him marks of neglect and disregard. He was obliged to stand several hours among the lacqueys at the door of the council-chamber, before he could gain admittance; and when he was at last called in, he was told, that they had determined to send him to the Tower. Cranmer said, that he appealed to the king himself; and finding his appeal disregarded, he produced a ring, which Henry had taken from his own finger and given to the archbishop, as a pledge of favour and protection. The council were confounded; and when they came before the king, he reproved them in the severest terms; and told them that he was as well acquainted with Cranmer's merit, as with their malignity and envy; but he was determined to crush all their cabals, and to teach them by the severest discipline, since gentle methods were ineffectual, a more dutiful concurrence in promoting his service. He turned Gardiner out of his council immediately, struck him out of his will, erased his name from the list of his son Edward's counsellors during his minority. But the duke of Norfolk, who was Cranmer's capital enemy, apologized for their conduct, and said, that their only intention was to set the primate's innocence in a full light, by bringing him to an open trial; and Henry obliged them all to embrace him as a sign of their cordial reconciliation. The mild temper of Cranmer rendered this agreement more sincere on his part, than is usual in such forced compliances.

Notwithstanding Henry's favour for Cranmer rendered all accusations against him abortive, his pride and peevishness, irritated by his declining state of health, impelled him to punish with additional severity all those who presumed to entertain a different opinion from himself, particularly in the point of the real presence. Anne Ascue, a young woman of good birth, great beauty, and uncommon talents, who had great connexions with the chief ladies at court, and with the queen herself, was accused of dogmatising on that delicate article; and Henry, instead of shewing indulgence to the weakness of her sex and age, was but the more provoked that a woman should dare to oppose his theological sentiments. She was prevailed on by Bonner's menaces to make a seeming recantation; but she qualified it with some reserves, which did not satisfy that zealous prelate (i). She was therefore sent to prison, and she there employed herself in composing prayers and discourses, by which she fortified her resolution to endure the utmost extremity rather than relinquish her religious principles. She even wrote to the king, and told him, that as to the Lord's supper, she believed as much as Christ himself had said of it, and as much of his divine doctrine as the catholic church had required; but while she could not be brought to acknowledge an assent to the king's explications, this declaration availed her nothing, and was rather regarded as a fresh insult. The chancellor Wriothesley, who had succeeded Audley, and who was much attached to the catholic system, was sent to examine her with regard to her patrons at court, and the great ladies who were in correspondence with her; but she maintained a laudable fidelity to her friends, and would not make any confession to their detriment. She was put to the torture in the most barbarous manner, and continued resolute in preserving secrecy. Some authors (k) add an extraordinary circumstance: that the chancellor, who stood by, ordered the lieutenant of the Tower to stretch the rack still farther; but that officer refused compliance: the chancellor menaced him; but met with a fresh refusal: upon which that (f) The chief conditions of the peace were, that Henry should retain Boulogne during eight years, or till the former debt due by Francis should be discharged. This debt was settled at two millions of livres, besides a claim of five hundred thousand livres, which was afterwards to be adjusted. Francis took care to comprehend Scotland in the treaty. Thus all that Henry obtained by a war, which cost him above one million three hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling, was a bad and a chargeable security for a debt which was not a third of the value. See Herbert. Stowe.

(g) Henry the Eighth erected Westminster into a bishopric, and appointed Dr. Thomas Thirlby to the see. The bishopric lasted about nine years; for Thirlby having wasted the patrimony of the see, was removed to Norwich. The abbot was restored by queen Mary, and her foundation being dissolved by queen Elizabeth, she made it a collegiate church of a dean and twelve prebendaries, as it still continues.

(h) This nobleman is one instance that Henry was not altogether incapable of a cordial and steady friendship; and Suffolk seems to have been worthy of the favour which, from his earliest youth, he had enjoyed with his master. The king was sitting in council when informed of Suffolk's death; and he took the opportunity both to express his own sorrow for the loss, and to celebrate the merits, of the deceased. He declared, that during the whole course of their friendship, his brother-in-law had never made one attempt to injure an adversary, and had never whispered a word to the disadvantage of any person. "Is there any of you, my lords, who can say as much?" When the king subjoined these words, he looked round in all their faces, and saw that confusion which the consciousness of secret guilt naturally threw upon them. Coke's Inst. cap. 99.

(i) When she was first examined she was asked by the lord mayor of London, "Whether the priests cannot make the body of Christ?" To which she shrewdly and wittily replied, "I have read that God made man; but that man made God I never yet read."

magistrate, who was intoxicated with religious zeal, put his own hand to the rack, and drew it so violently that he almost tore her body asunder. Her constancy still surpassed the barbarity of her persecutors, and they found all their efforts to be baffled. She was then condemned to be burned alive; and being so dislocated by the rack that she could not stand, she was carried to the stake in a chair. Together with her were conducted Nicholas Belenian, a priest, John Lascelles, of the king's household, and John Adams, a taylor, who had been condemned for the same crime to the same punishment. They were all tied to the stake; and in that dreadful situation the chancellor sent to inform them that their pardon was ready drawn and signed, and should instantly be given them, if they would merit it by a recantation. They only regarded this offer as a new ornament to their crown of martyrdom; and they saw with tranquillity the executioner kindle the flames, which consumed them.

Though by the secrecy and fidelity of Anne Ascue the queen escaped from this peril, that princess soon after fell into a new danger, from which she was saved with difficulty. An ulcer had broken out in the king's leg, which, added to his corpulency, and his bad habit of body, began both to threaten his life, and to render him even more than usually peevish and passionate. The queen attended him with the most tender and dutiful care, and endeavoured, by every soothing art and compliance, to allay those gusts of passion to which he was become so subject. His favourite topic of conversation was theology; and Catherine was frequently engaged in the argument; and being secretly inclined to the principles of the reformation, she unwarily betrayed too much of her mind on these occasions. Henry, highly incensed that she should presume to differ from him, complained of her obstinacy to Gardiner, who gladly seized the opportunity to inflame the king's mind. He praised the king's anxious concern for preserving the orthodoxy of his subjects; and represented, that the more elevated the person was who was chastised, and the more near to his person, the greater would be the terror which such an example would strike into every one, and the more glorious would the sacrifice appear to posterity. The chancellor Wriothesley, being consulted, was engaged by religious zeal to second these topics; and Henry, hurried on by his own impetuous temper, and encouraged by his counsellors, even proceeded to order articles of impeachment to be drawn up against his consort. Wriothesley executed his commands with alacrity; and soon after brought the paper to him to be signed; for as it was high treason to throw slander upon the queen, he might otherwise have been questioned for his temerity. By some means this important paper fell into the hands of one of the queen's friends, who immediately carried the intelligence to her. She was sensible of the danger to which she was exposed; but did not despair of being able, by her prudence and address, still to elude the efforts of her enemies. She paid her usual visit to the king, and found him in a more serene disposition than she had reason to expect. He artfully entered on the subject of theology, which was so familiar to him; and seemed to challenge her to an argument. She gently declined the conversation, and remarked, that such profound speculations were ill suited to the natural weakness of her sex. Women, she said, by their first creation, were made subject to men: the male was created after the image of God; the female after the image of the male: it belonged to the husband to chuse principles for his wife; the wife's duty was, in all cases, to adopt implicitly the sentiments of her husband; and as to herself, it was doubly her duty, being blessed with a husband who was qualified, by his judgement and learning, not only to chuse principles for his own family, but for the most wise and knowing of every nation. "Not so! by St. Mary," replied the king; "you are now become a doctor, Kate; and better fitted to give than receive instruction." She replied, with all possible respect and meekness, that she was sensible how little she was entitled to the praises which the king bestowed upon her; that though she usually declined not any conversation, however sublime, when proposed by his majesty, she well knew, that her conceptions could serve to no other purpose than to give him a little momentary amusement; that she found the conversation apt to languish, when not revived by some opposition, and she had ventured sometimes to feign a contrariety of sentiments, in order to give him the pleasure of refuting her; and that she also purposed by this innocent artifice, to engage him in topics whence she had observed by frequent experience that she reaped profit and instruction. "And is it so, sweetheart?" replied the king, "then we are perfect friends again." He embraced her with the greatest affection, and sent her away with assurances of his protection and kindness. Her enemies, who knew nothing of this sudden change in Henry's volatile temper, prepared the next day to convey her to the Tower, pursuant to the king's warrant, which was in their possession. Henry and Catherine were conversing amicably in the garden when the chancellor appeared with forty of the pursuivants. The king spoke to him at some distance from her; and seemed to expostulate with him in terms of the most severe reproach. She even overheard the appellations of knave, fool, and beast, which he liberally bestowed upon that magistrate; and then ordered him to depart his presence: she afterwards interposed to mitigate his anger; when, as if actuated by remorse for the rash step he had taken in ordering a warrant to be made out for her apprehension, he said to her, "Poor soul! you know not how ill entitled this man is to your good offices." Thenceforth the queen, having narrowly escaped so great a danger, was careful not to offend Henry's humour by any contradiction; and Gardiner, whose malice had endeavoured to widen the breach, could never afterwards regain the favour and good opinion of the king (l).

Henry's tyrannical disposition burst out soon after to the destruction of the duke of Norfolk and his father, who during this whole reign, and even a part of that of Henry the Seventh, had been regarded as the greatest subjects in the kingdom, and had rendered considerable service to the crown. The duke himself had in his youth acquired reputation by naval enterprizes: he had much contributed to the victory gained over the Scots at Flodden: he had suppressed a dangerous rebellion in the North; and he had always done his part with honour in all the expeditions against France. Fortune seemed to conspire with his own industry, in raising him to the greatest elevation. From the favours heaped on him by the king he had acquired an immense estate: his majesty had successively been married to two of his nieces; and the king's natural son, the duke of Richmond, had married his daughter Mary: besides his descent from the ancient family of the Mowbrays, by which he was allied to the throne, he had espoused a daughter of the duke of Buckingham, who was descended by a female from Edward III.; and as he was believed still to adhere to the catholic religion, he was regarded, both abroad and at home, as the head of that party. But all these circumstances, in proportion as they exalted the duke, provoked the jealousy of Henry; and he foresaw danger, during his son's minority, both to the public tranquillity and to the new ecclesiastical system, from the attempts of so powerful a subject. Indeed nothing tended more to expose Norfolk to the king's displeasure, than the prejudices which Henry had entertained against the earl of Surrey, son of that nobleman.

Surrey was a young man of the most promising hopes, and had distinguished himself by every accomplishment which became a scholar, a courtier, and a soldier. He excelled in all military exercises which were then in request: he encouraged the fine arts by his patronage and example: he had made some successful attempts in poetry; and being smitten with the romantic gallantry of the age, he celebrated the praises of his mistress, by his pen and his lance, in every masque and tournament. His spirit and ambition were equal to his talents and his quality; and he did not always regulate his actions by the caution and reserve which his situation required. He had been left governor of Boulogne when that town was taken by Henry; but though his personal bravery was unquestioned, he had been unfortunate in some rencounters with the French. The king, somewhat displeased with his conduct, had sent over the earl of Hertford to command in his place; and Surrey was so imprudent as to drop some menacing expressions against the ministers, on account of this affront which was put upon him. And as he had refused to marry Hertford's daughter, and even waved every other proposal of marriage, Henry imagined that he had entertained views of espousing the lady Mary; and he was instantly determined to repress, by the most severe expedients, so dangerous an ambition.

Henry, actuated by these prejudices, and perhaps influenced by that old disgust with which the ill conduct of Catherine Howard had inspired him against her whole family, gave private orders to arrest Norfolk and Surrey; and and they were on the 12th of December committed to the Tower. Surrey being a commoner, his trial was the more expeditious; and as to proofs, neither parliaments nor juries seem ever to have given the least attention to them in any cause of the crown during the whole reign of this imperious and tyrannical monarch. He was accused of entertaining in his family some Italians who were suspected to be spies; a servant of his had paid a visit to cardinal Pole in Italy, whence he was suspected of holding a correspondence with that prelate; he had quartered the arms of Edward the Confessor on his escutcheon, which made him be suspected of aspiring to the crown, though both he and his ancestors had openly, during the course of many years, maintained that practice, and the heralds had even justified it by their authority. These were the crimes for which a jury, notwithstanding his eloquent and spirited defence, condemned the earl of Surrey, on the 19th of January, 1547, for high treason; and their sentence was executed on him a few days after.

The duke of Norfolk's innocence was still, if possible, more apparent than that of his son; and his services to the crown had been greater. His duchess, with whom he lived on bad terms, and from whom he had been separated four years, had basely carried intelligence to his enemies of all she knew against him: Elizabeth Holland, a mistress of his, had been equally subservient to the designs of the court: yet with all these advantages his accusers discovered no greater crime than his once saying that the king was sickly, and could not hold out long; and the kingdom was likely to fall into disorders, through the diversity of religious opinions. He wrote a pathetic letter to the king, pleading his past services, and protesting his innocence; soon after, he embraced a more proper expedient for appeasing Henry, by making a submission and confession, such as his enemies required; but nothing could mollify the unrelenting temper of the tyrant. He assembled a parliament on the 14th of January, as the surest and most expeditious instrument of his arbitrary disposition, and the house of peers, without examining the prisoner, without trial or evidence, passed a bill of attainder against him, and sent it to the commons. Archbishop Cranmer, though engaged for many years in an opposite party to the duke of Norfolk, and though he had received many and great injuries from him, would have no hand in so unjust a prosecution; and he retired to his seat at Croydon (m). The king was now fast approaching towards his dissolution; and fearing lest Norfolk should escape him, he sent a message to the commons, by which he desired them to hasten the bill, on pretence that Norfolk enjoyed the dignity of earl mareschal, and it was necessary to appoint another, who might officiate at the ensuing ceremony of installing his son prince of Wales. The obsequious commons obeyed the directions of the tyrant, though founded on so frivolous a pretence; and the king, having affixed the royal assent to the bill by commissioners, issued orders for the execution of that nobleman on the morning of the 29th of January. But news being carried to the Tower that the king himself had expired the night before the duke was to have been executed, the lieutenant deferred obeying the warrant; and it was not thought advisable by the council to begin a new reign by the death of the greatest nobleman in the kingdom, who had been condemned by a sentence so unjust and arbitrary.

Henry had long been in a declining state of health; but for several days those who were about his person plainly perceived his end approaching. He was become so froward, that no one durst to inform him of his condition; and as some persons during this reign had suffered as traitors for foretelling the king's death (n), every one was afraid lest in the transports of his fury he might on this pretence punish capitally the author of such friendly intelligence. At last sir Anthony Denny ventured to disclose to him the fatal secret, and exhorted him to prepare for the fate which was awaiting him. He expressed his resignation; and desired that Cranmer might be sent for: but before the arrival of that prelate the king was speechless, though he still seemed to retain his senses. Cranmer desired him to give some sign of his dying in the faith of Christ: he squeezed the prelate's hand, and immediately expired, after a reign of thirty-seven years and nine months; and in the fifty-sixth year of his age.

The king had made his will near a month before his demise; in which he confirmed the destination of parliament, by leaving the crown first to prince Edward, then to the lady Mary, next to the lady Elizabeth: the two princesses he obliged, under the penalty of forfeiting their title to the crown, not to marry without consent of the council, which he appointed for the government of his minor son. After his own children, he settled the succession on Frances Brandon, marchioness of Dorset, elder daughter of his sister the French queen; then on Eleanor, countess of Cumberland, the second daughter. In passing over the posterity of the queen of Scots, his elder sister, he made use of the power obtained from parliament; but as he subjoined, that after the failure of the French queen's posterity the crown should descend to the next lawful heir, it afterwards became a question, whether these words could be applied to the Scottish line. It was thought that these princes were not the next heirs after the house of Suffolk, but before that house; and that Henry, by expressing himself in this manner, meant entirely to exclude them. The late injuries which he had received from the Scots, had greatly irritated him against that nation; and he maintained to the last that character of violence and caprice, by which his life had been so much distinguished. Another circumstance of his will may suggest the same reflection with regard to the same contrarieties of his temper and conduct: he left money for masses to be said for delivering his soul from purgatory; and though he destroyed all those institutions established by his ancestors and others for the benefit of their souls; and had even left the doctrine of purgatory doubtful in all the articles of faith which he promulgated during his later years; he was yet determined, when the hour of death was approaching, to take care at least of his own future repose, and to adhere to the safer side of the question (o).

The character of Henry, as delineated by Hume, we shall here lay before our readers. "It is difficult," says that celebrated historian, "to give a just summary of this prince's qualities: he was so different from himself in different parts of his reign, that, as is well remarked by lord Herbert, his history is his best character and description. The absolute uncontrolled authority which he maintained at home, and the regard which he acquired among foreign nations, are circumstances which entitle him, in some degree, to the appellation of a great prince; while his tyranny and barbarity exclude him from the character of a good one. He possessed, indeed, great vigour of mind, which qualified him for exercising dominion over men, courage, intrepidity, vigilance, inflexibility: and though these qualities lay not always under the guidance of a regular and solid judgement, they were accompanied with good parts and an extensive capacity; and every one dreaded a contest with a man who was known never to yield or to forgive, and who in every controversy was determined either to ruin himself or his antagonist. A catalogue of his vices would comprehend many of the worst qualities incident to human nature: violence, cruelty, profusion, rapacity, injustice, obstinacy, arrogance, bigotry, presumption, caprice: but neither was he subject to all these vices in the most extreme degree, nor was he at intervals altogether destitute of virtues: he was sincere, open, gallant, liberal, and capable at least of a temporary friendship and attachment. In this respect he was unfortunate, that the incidents of his reign served to display his faults in their full light: the treatment which he met with from the court of Rome provoked him to violence; the danger of a revolt from his (o) The executors to Henry's will were archbishop Cranmer; lord chancellor Wriothesley; the earl of Hertford, prince Edward's uncle; lord St. John; lord Russel, viscount Lisle; bishop Tunstal; sir Anthony Brown; sir Edward Montague; justice Bromley; sir Edward North; sir William Paget; sir Anthony Denny; sir William Harbard; sir Edward Wotton; and his brother Dr. Wotton; who were also nominated for the prince his successor's privy council, to be assisted by such other persons, whom he also appointed to be called in, on extraordinary occasions.

Having settled his will, it was ordered to be transcribed and engrossed with all convenient speed, but the advocates for the posterity of his eldest sister Margaret, apprehending they were very badly used therein, deny that it was ever signed by Henry; and though they frequently challenged the opposite party to prove this material fact, they have never yet been able to clear up the point. In the reign of queen Anne some gentlemen were deputed, by persons of the first rank in the kingdom, to go to the chapter house in Westminster Abbey, to search for the original will amongst the records of the Exchequer, and they found one consisting of several sheets of soft paper, tacked together with a braid of green ribband, written in a mean and slovenly character, and pretended to be signed with king Henry's own hand, on the top of the first and the end of the last page; upon comparing the same with his stamp, and his usual hand writing, it agreed with neither, being fairer than ever he could write, and stiff, like a counterfeit hand.

superstitious subjects, seemed to require the most extreme severity. But it must at the same time be acknowledged, that his situation tended to throw an additional lustre on what was great and magnanimous in his character: the emulation between the emperor and the French king rendered his alliance, notwithstanding his impolitic conduct, of great importance in Europe: the extensive powers of his prerogative, and the submissive, not to say slavish disposition of his parliaments, made it the more easy for him to assume and maintain that entire dominion, by which his reign is so much distinguished in the English history.

"It may seem a little extraordinary, that notwithstanding his cruelty, his extortion, his violence, his arbitrary administration, this prince not only acquired the regard of his subjects; but never was the object of their hatred: he seems even in some degree to have possessed to the last their love and affection (p). His exterior qualities were advantageous, and fit to captivate the multitude: his magnificence and personal bravery rendered him illustrious in vulgar eyes; and it may be said with truth, that the English in that age were so thoroughly subdued, that like eastern slaves they were inclined to admire those acts of violence and tyranny which were exercised over themselves, and at their own expence.

"With regard to foreign states, Henry appears long to have supported an intercourse of friendship with Francis, more sincere and disinterested than usually takes place between neighbouring princes. Their common jealousy of the emperor Charles, and some resemblance in their characters (though the comparison sets the French monarch in a very superior and advantageous light,) served as the cement of their mutual amity. Francis is said to have been affected with the king's death, and to have expressed much regret for the loss. His own health began to decline; he foretold that he should not long survive his friend (q): and he died in about two months after him."

By queen Catherine of Arragon, Henry had two sons, who lived but a short time; and Mary, born February 8, 1515, who afterwards ascended the throne. By Anne Boleyn, he had, 1. Elizabeth, born September 7, 1533, who succeeded her sister Mary in the government of the kingdom; and 1. a son still born, February 29, 1535. By Jane Seymour, he had prince Edward, who was born October 12, 1537, and who succeeded his father by the title of Edward the Sixth. By his three last queens, Anne of Cleves, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr, he had no issue. But by Elizabeth, daughter of sir John Blunt, Knt. and widow of sir Gilbert Tailbois, he had a natural son, named Henry Fitzroy, whom he made earl of Nottingham, duke of Richmond, high admiral, lieutenant of Ireland, &c. and who died July 24, 1536, aged seventeen years.

Miscellaneous Transactions and Political Remarks on the Reign of Henry the Eighth.

AS there were several transactions of a miscellaneous nature, which could not properly be brought in during the reign of Henry, we deem it necessary to insert an account of them in this place.

There were ten parliaments summoned by Henry VIII. and twenty-three sessions held. The whole time in which these parliaments sat during this long reign exceeded not three years and a half. It amounted not to a twelvemonth during the first twenty years. The innovations in religion obliged the king afterwards to call these assemblies more frequently; but though these were the most important transactions that ever fell under the cognizance of parliament, their devoted submission to the will of their arbitrary and tyrannical master, added to their earnest desire of soon returning to their country-seats, produced a quick dispatch of the bills, and made the sessions of short duration. All the king's caprices were indeed blindly complied with, and no regard was paid to the safety or liberty of the subject. Besides the violent prosecution of whatever he was pleased to term heresy, the laws of treason were multiplied beyond all former precedent. Even words to the disparagement of the king, queen, or royal issue, were subjected to that penalty; and so little care was taken in framing these rigorous statutes, that they contain obvious contradictions; insomuch that, had they been strictly executed, every man without exception must have fallen under the penalty of treason. By one statute (r), for instance, it was declared treason to assert the validity of the king's marriage, either with Catherine of Arragon, or Anne Boleyn: by another (s) it was treason to say any thing to the disparagement or slander of the princesses Mary and Elizabeth; and to call them spurious, would no doubt have been construed to their slander. Nor would even a profound silence, with regard to these delicate points, be able to save a person from such penalties. For by the former statute, whoever refused to answer upon oath to any point contained in that act, was subject to the pains of treason. The king, therefore, needed only propose to any one a question with regard to the legality of either of the first marriages: if the person was silent, he was a traitor by law: if he answered, either in the negative or in the affirmative, he was no less a traitor. So monstrous were the inconsistencies which arose from the furious passions of the king, and the slavish submission of his parliaments. It is difficult to say whether these contradictions were owing to Henry's precipitancy, or to a formed design of tyranny.

It may not be improper to recapitulate whatever is memorable in the statutes of this reign, whether with regard to government or commerce: nothing can better show the genius of the age than such a review of the laws.

The abolition of the catholic religion much contributed to the regular execution of justice. While the superstitions of the church of Rome subsisted, there was no possibility of punishing any crime in the clergy: the church would not permit the magistrate to try the offences of her members, and she could not herself inflict any civil penalties upon them. But Henry restrained these pernicious immunities: the privilege of the clergy was abolished for the crimes of petty treason, murder, and felony, to all under the degree of a subdeacon (t). But the former superstition not only protected crimes in the clergy; it exempted also the laity from punishment, by affording them shelter in the churches and sanctuaries. The parliament abridged these privileges. It was first declared, that no sanctuaries were allowed in cases of high treason (u); next, in those of murder, felony, rapes, burglary, and petty treason (v); and it limited them in other particulars (w). The farther progress of the reformation removed all distinction between the clergy and other subjects; and also abolished entirely the privileges of sanctuaries. These consequences were implied in the neglect of the canon law.

The only expedient employed to support the military spirit during this age, was the reviving and extending of some old laws enacted for the encouragement of archery, on which the defence of the kingdom was supposed much to depend. Every man was ordered to have a bow (x): butts were ordered to be erected in every parish (y): and every bowyer was ordered, for each bow of yew which he made, to make two of elm or wich for the service of the common people (z). The use of cross-bows and hand-guns was also prohibited (a). What rendered the English bowmen more formidable was, that they carried halberts with them, by which they were enabled upon occasion to engage in close fight with the enemy (b). Frequent musters or arrays were also made of the people, even during time of peace; and all men of substance were obliged to have a complete suit of armour or harness, as it was called (c). The martial spirit of the English, during that age, rendered this precaution, it was thought, sufficient for the defence of the nation; and as the king had then an absolute power of commanding the service of all his subjects, he could instantly, in case of danger, appoint new officers, and levy regiments, and collect an army as numerous as he pleased. When no faction or division prevailed among the people, there was no foreign power that ever thought of invading England. The city of London alone could muster fifteen thousand men (d). Discipline, however, was an advantage wanting to those troops; though the garrison of Calais was a nursery of officers; and Tournay first (e), Boulogne afterwards, served to increase the number. Every one who served abroad was allowed to alienate his lands without paying any fees (f). A general permission was granted to dispose of land by will (g). The parliament was so little jealous of its privileges (which indeed were at that time scarcely worth preserving,) that there is an instance of one Strode, who, because he had introduced into the lower house some bill regarding tin, was severely treated by the Stannery courts in Cornwall: heavy fines were imposed on him; and, upon his refusal to pay, he was thrown into a dungeon, loaded with irons, and used in such a manner as brought his life in danger: yet all the notice which the parliament took of this enormity, even in such a paltry court, was to enact, That no man could afterwards be questioned for his conduct in parliament (h). This prohibition, however, must be supposed to extend only to the inferior courts: for as to the king, and privy-council, and star-chamber, they were scarcely bound by any law.

There is a bill of tonnage and poundage, which shews what uncertain ideas the parliament had formed both of their own privileges and of the rights of the sovereign (i). This duty had been voted to every king since Henry IV. during the term of his own life only: yet Henry VIII. had been allowed to levy it six years without any law; and though there had been four parliaments assembled during that time, no attention had been given either to grant it to him regularly, or restrain him from levying it. At last the parliament resolved to give him that supply; but even in this concession they plainly show themselves at a loss to determine whether they grant it, or whether he has a right of himself to levy it. They say that the imposition was made to endure during the natural life of the late king, and no longer: they yet blame the merchants who had not paid it to the present king: they observe that the law for tonnage and poundage was expired; yet make no scruple to call that imposition the king's due: they affirm, that he had sustained great and manifold losses by those who had defrauded him of it; and to provide a remedy, they vote him that supply during his life-time, and no longer. It is remarkable that, notwithstanding this last clause, all his successors, for more than a century, persevered in the like irregular practice: if a practice may deserve that epithet in which the whole nation acquiesced, and which gave no offence. But when Charles I. attempted to continue in the same course, which had now received the sanction of many generations, so much were the opinions of men altered, that a furious tempest was excited by it; and historians, partial or ignorant, still represent this measure as a most violent and unprecedented enormity in that unhappy prince.

The king was allowed to make laws for Wales without consent of parliament (k). It was forgotten, that with regard both to Wales and England, the limitation was abolished by the statute which gave to the royal proclamations the force of laws.

The foreign commerce of England, during this age, was mostly confined to the Netherlands. The inhabitants of the Low Countries bought the English commodities, and distributed them into other parts of Europe. Hence the mutual dependance of those countries on each other; and the great loss sustained by both in case of a rupture. During all the variations of politics, the sovereigns endeavoured to avoid coming to this extremity; and though the king usually bore a greater friendship to Francis, the nation always leaned towards the emperor.

In 1528, hostilities commenced between England and the Low Countries; and the inconvenience was soon felt on both sides. While the Flemings were not allowed to purchase cloth in England, the English merchants could not buy it from the clothiers, and the clothiers were obliged to dismiss their workmen, who began to be tumultuous for want of bread. The cardinal, to appease them, sent for the merchants, and ordered them to buy cloth as usual: they told him, that they could not dispose of it as usual; and, notwithstanding his menaces, he could get no other answer from them (l). An agreement was at last made to continue the commerce between the states, even during the war.

It was not till the end of this reign that any sallads, carrots, turnips, or other edible roots were produced in England. The little of these vegetables that was used, was formerly imported from Holland and Flanders (m). Queen Catherine, when she wanted a sallad, was obliged to dispatch a messenger thither on purpose. The use of hops, and the planting of them, was introduced from Flanders about the beginning of this reign, or end of the preceding.

Foreign artificers, in general, much surpassed the English in dexterity, industry, and frugality: hence the violent animosity which the latter, on many occasions, expressed against any of the former who were settled in England. They had the assurance to complain, that all their customers went to foreign tradesmen; and, in the year 1517, being moved by the seditious sermons of one Dr. Bele, and the intrigues of Lincoln, a broker, they raised an insurrection. The apprentices, and others of the poorer sort, in London, began by breaking open the prisons, where some persons were confined for insulting foreigners. They next proceeded to the house of Meutas, a Frenchman, much hated by them; where they committed great disorders; killed some of his servants, and plundered his goods. The mayor could not appease them; nor sir Thomas More, late under-sheriff, though much respected in the city. They also threatened cardinal Wolsey with some insult; and he thought it necessary to fortify his house, and put himself on his guard. Tired at last with these disorders, they dispersed themselves; and the earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey seized some of them. A proclamation was issued, that women should not meet together to babble and talk, and that all men should keep their wives in their houses. Next day the duke of Norfolk came into the city, at the head of thirteen hundred armed men, and made inquiry into the tumult. Bele and Lincoln, and several others, were sent to the Tower, and condemned for treason. Lincoln and thirteen more were executed. The other criminals, to the number of four hundred, were brought before the king, with ropes about their necks, fell on their knees, and cried for mercy. Henry knew at that time how to pardon; and dismissed them without farther punishment (n).

So great was the number of foreign artizans in the city, that at least fifteen thousand Flemings alone were at one time obliged to leave it, by an order of council, when Henry became jealous of their favour for queen Catherine (o). Henry himself confesses, in an edict of the star-chamber, printed among the statutes, that the foreigners starved the natives; and obliged them, from idleness, to have recourse to theft, murder, and other enormities (p). He also asserts, that the vast multitude of foreigners raised the price of grain and bread (q). And to prevent an increase of the evil, all foreign artificers were prohibited from having above two foreigners in their house, either journeymen or apprentices. A like jealousy arose against the foreign merchants; and, to appease it, a law was enacted, obliging all denizens to pay the duties imposed upon aliens (r). The parliament had done better to have encouraged foreign merchants and artizans to come over in greater numbers to England; which might have excited the emulation of the natives, and have improved their skill. The prisoners in the kingdom for debts and crimes are asserted, in an act of parliament, to be sixty thousand persons and above (s); which is scarcely credible. Harrison asserts that seventy-two thousand criminals were executed during this reign for theft and robbery, which would amount nearly to two thousand a-year. He adds, that in the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, there were not punished capitally four hundred in a year: it appears that, in all England, there are not at present fifty executed for those crimes. If these facts be just, there has been a great improvement in morals since the reign of Henry VIII. and this improvement has been chiefly owing to the increase of industry and of the arts, which have given maintenance, and, what is almost of equal importance, occupation, to the lower classes.

There is a remarkable clause in a statute passed near the beginning of this reign (t), by which we might be induced to believe that England was extremely decayed from the flourishing condition which it had attained in preceding times. It had been enacted in the reign of Edward II. that no magistrate in town or borough, who by his office ought to keep assize, should, during the continuance of his magistracy, sell, either in wholesale or retail, any wine or victuals. This law seemed equitable, in order to prevent fraud or private views in fixing the assize: yet the law is repealed in this reign. The reason assigned is, that "since the making of that statute and ordinance, many, and the most part of all the cities, boroughs, and towns corporate, within the realm of England, are fallen in ruin and decay, and are not inhabited by merchants, and men of such substance as at the time of making that statute: for at this day, the dwellers and inhabitants of the same cities and boroughs are commonly bakers, vintners, fishmongers, and other victuallers, and there remain few others to bear the offices." Men have such a propensity to exalt past times above the present, that it seems dangerous to credit this reasoning of the parliament, without farther evidence to support it. So different are the views in which the same object appears, that some may be inclined to draw an opposite inference from this fact. A more regular police was established in the reign of Henry VIII. than in any former period, and a stricter administration of justice; an advantage which induced the men of landed property to leave the provincial towns, and to retire into the country. Cardinal Wolsey, in a speech to parliament, represented it as a proof of the increase of riches, that the customs had increased beyond what they were formerly (u).

But if there were really a decay of commerce, and industry, and populousness in England, the statutes of this reign, except by abolishing monasteries, and retrenching holidays, circumstances of considerable moment, were not in other respects well calculated to remedy the evil. The fixing of the wages of artificers was attempted (v): luxury in apparel was prohibited by repeated statutes (w); and probably without effect. The chancellor and other ministers were empowered to fix the price of poultry, cheese, and butter (x). A statute was even passed to fix the price of beef, pork, mutton, and veal (y). Beef and pork were ordered to be sold at a halfpenny a pound: mutton and veal at a halfpenny half a farthing, money of that age. The preamble of the statute says, that these four species of butcher's meat were the food of the poorer sort (z). This act was afterwards repealed (a).

The practice of depopulating the country, by abandoning tillage, and throwing the lands into pasturage, still continued (b); as appears by the new laws which were, from time to time, enacted against that practice. The king was entitled to half the rents of the land, where any farm houses were allowed to fall to decay (c). The unskilful husbandry was probably the cause why the proprietors found no profit in tillage. The number of sheep allowed to be kept in one flock was restrained to two thousand (d). Sometimes, says the statute, one proprietor, or farmer, would keep a flock of twenty-four thousand. It is remarkable, that the parliament ascribes the increasing price of mutton to this increase of sheep: because, say they, the commodity being gotten into few hands, the price of it is raised at pleasure (e). It is more probable that the effect proceeded from the daily increase of money: for it seems almost impossible that such a commodity could be engrossed.

In the year 1544, it appears that an acre of good land in Cambridgeshire was let at a shilling, or about fifteen pence of our present money (f). This is fifteen times cheaper than the usual rent at present. But commodities were not above six times cheaper: a presumption of the bad husbandry in that age.

Some laws were made with regard to beggars and vagrants (g); one of the circumstances in government which humanity would most powerfully recommend to a benevolent legislator; which seems, at first sight, the most easily adjusted; and which is yet the most difficult to settle in such a manner as to attain the end without destroying industry. The convents formerly were a support to the poor; but at the same time tended to encourage idleness and beggary.

In 1546, a law was made for fixing the interest of money at ten per cent.; the first legal interest known in England. Formerly, all loans of that nature were regarded as usurious. The preamble of this very law treats the interest of money as illegal and criminal: and the prejudices still remained so strong, that the law permitting interest was repealed in the following reign.

This reign, as well as many of the foregoing, and even subsequent reigns, abounds with monopolizing laws, confining particular manufactures to particular towns, or excluding the open country in general (h). There remain still too many traces of similar absurdities. In the subsequent reign, the corporations which had been opened by a former law, and obliged to admit tradesmen of different kinds, were again shut up by act of parliament; and every one was prohibited from exercising any trade who was not of the corporation (i).

Henry VIII. as he possessed himself some talent for letters, was an encourager of them in others. He founded Trinity College in Cambridge, and gave it ample endowments. Wolsey founded Christ Church in Oxford, and intended to call it Cardinal College: but upon his fall, which happened before he had entirely finished his scheme, the king seized all the revenues; and this violence, above all the other misfortunes of that minister, is said to have given him the greatest concern (k). But Henry afterwards restored the revenues of the college, and only changed the name. The cardinal founded in Oxford the first chair for teaching Greek; and this novelty rent that university into violent factions, which frequently came to blows. The students divided themselves into parties, which bore the names of Greeks and Trojans, and sometimes fought with as great animosity as was formerly exercised by those hostile nations. A new and more correct method of pronouncing Greek being introduced, it also divided the Grecians themselves into parties; and it was remarked that the catholics favoured the former pronunciation, the protestants gave countenance to the new. Gardiner employed the authority of the king and council to suppress innovations in this particular, and to preserve the corrupt sound of the Greek alphabet. So little liberty was then allowed of any kind! The penalties inflicted upon the new pronunciation were no less than whipping, degradation, and expulsion; and the bishop declared, that, rather than permit the liberty of innovating in the pronunciation of the Greek alphabet, it were better that the language itself were totally banished the universities. The introduction of the Greek language into Oxford excited the emulation of Cambridge (l). Wolsey intended to have enriched the library of his college at Oxford with copies of all the manuscripts that were in the Vatican (m). The countenance given to letters by this king and his ministers contributed to render learning fashionable in England: Erasmus speaks with great satisfaction of the general regard paid by the nobility and gentry to men of knowledge (n).

It is needless to be particular in mentioning the writers of this reign, or of the preceding. There is no man of that age who has the least pretension to be ranked among our classics. Sir Thomas More, though he wrote in Latin, seems to come the nearest to the character of a classical author.

IN the foregoing history of the reign of king Henry the Eighth, it appears that he came to the throne with very great advantages. Faction was grown weary, and, by the government of his father, Henry the Seventh, was deprived of all means to disturb the public tranquillity, which the nation were strangers to, during the long contests between the two houses of York and Lancaster, now centering in Henry the Eighth.

The earnest desire of the people was that they might be at peace; and for this blessing they were disposed to yield much to the arbitrary proceedings of the king, who had sheathed the sword, and in a reign of twenty years had extended the prerogatives of the crown very high against the liberties of the people. Having extended his prerogatives, Henry the Seventh's next step was to fill his coffers by extremely rigorous and oppressive measures. This practice gave the son (Henry VIII.) upon his accession to the throne, an opportunity of gaining upon the affections of the people, by disgracing and punishing those who had been the chief instruments of his father's extortionate proceedings, without diminishing any part of the royal prerogative, and without being under the necessity of demanding any money from his parliament. A masterpiece of policy this! for which the king was indebted to a wise and honest council, who, rightly placing the safety of the king in the affections of his subjects, advised him to throw Empson and Dudley, the most hated, and the most justly hated men of the whole kingdom, out of the sanctuary of the court, and to expose them to that national vengeance, under the weight of which they perished; whose blood atoned for the crimes of his father against a provoked people, which proved so effectual that they gratefully retained the impressions of this favour so long, that they even permitted him, in his turn, to commit the like, or even greater outrages upon their liberties and property.

The young king no sooner found himself in possession of the people's affections, than he gave way entirely to his innate vanity and presumption, which, in the former part of his reign, led him into several inconsistent engagements with neighbouring princes; and, in his latter days, to persecute such of his subjects as were bold enough to profess their belief in any point contradictory to his opinion.

He would often assist the strongest party to oppress the weakest. But this bad conduct is not to be attributed solely to the king. His foible being once discovered by the subtle minister Wolsey, the cardinal's private interest ought to be looked upon as the key to all the extravagant transactions, during his ministry, between England and foreign nations. Having the address to feed his royal master's vanity, he was at liberty to do as he pleased: and while the emperor, the king of France, and the Roman pontiff, fed the cardinal's ambition, there is no wonder that the king was the bubble of every prince with whom, or for whom, he negociated. Thus, it may be said without exaggeration, that the public affairs, for twenty years successively, veered about with the success or the disappointment of the cardinal's private schemes; for so long as he was able to soothe the king's vanity, so long was he able to gain his sanction in the midst of the universal disapprobation of his people. The king was led to acquiesce in the plans of his favourites by his presumption, which inclined him to believe himself infallible in the choice of his ministers; for a prince of such a temper as Henry may be easily persuaded by his minions to disregard the voice of the public, when he is convinced that he cannot be deceived, though the people may; or that it is beneath the dignity of a sovereign to alter his measures, or to withdraw his favours to please the will of his subjects.

This adherence, however, to the views of an ambitious minister too much, and his regard to the sense of his people too little, brought the king into many difficulties. Amongst which, the commons in parliament refusing to grant the king a supply in 1523, without knowing how the money was to be employed, and then proportioning their grants, agreeably to the judgement they formed of the necessity, is not of the least moment. This opposition to the measures of the court increased to such a height, that his majesty was at length obliged to retract, compound, excuse himself, and even to disavow his minister, who had insinuated to him, that he ought to consider the parliament only as an instrument to execute his will: which insinuation produced, in the latter half of Henry's reign, such bitter fruit as this nation never tasted of before nor since.

The next remark upon this reign begins at the divorce of Henry from his queen Catherine of Arragon: from which æra we find the king, who had distinguished himself in the defence of the pope, contemning his authority, and assuming the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England: a king whose whole attention had been employed abroad, applying himself wholly to his domestic affairs: a king, who had hitherto connived at seditions, and had temper enough to pardon insurrections, grown impatient of the least contradiction: a king, who had often yielded to his parliaments, usurping now so highly on their power, as to dictate all their proceedings; insomuch that in the end, we find the voice of the law become little else than the echo of the voice of the sovereign: a king, who had been led, amused, governed by his minister, now driving, overbearing, tyrannizing, and frequently butchering his servants, his wives, his nobility, and his commonalty.

This absolute power which the king at last exercised over the purses, the lives, the liberties, and the consciences of the people, must be placed to the account of corrupt parliaments, over which he had gained an entire influence; to which the divisions in the nation concerning religion did in a great measure contribute. For the party, which opposed all reformation, by a bigoted attachment to the discipline, as well as the doctrine of the church of Rome, furnished him with as many pretences for grasping at power, and for drawing money from his people, as ambition could wish, or profusion require. The other two parties concurred with the king, and unanimously led him to a certain point, namely, to throw off the papal yoke, and to lessen the power of the clergy: but here they separated, and took different courses. One of them strove to carry the reformation forward; while the other as strenuously endeavoured to stop it where it then stood. The king took care to serve himself by all parties, yet kept himself clear from any. By seizing upon the church lands, he was enabled to engage the body of the nation in one common interest against the Romish clergy, by selling a part of them at a low price; and by sometimes seeming to favour those whose principles led them to the Reformation, and at other times exercising his false zeal in persecuting the non-subscribers to his Six Articles of religion, he made each of them by turns entertain the idea that they should succeed in his favour, and thus dread the success of one another. When the motives of contending parties are founded on private ambition and avarice, the danger likely to result to a nation is exceedingly great; but how much greater must it be, when these motives are founded on religion; when the heads and hearts of both sides are heated even to enthusiasm; when this spirit mingles itself with the spirit of faction; so that some through folly, and others through knavery, are ready to sacrifice the public weal to their particular schemes of religion. We cannot help thinking that this was the case with those persons, who at one time gave up to Henry, in a great degree, the legislative authority, and permitted his proclamations, under some trifling restrictions, to be equivalent to acts of parliament: and at another time having loaded him with all the riches of the church without providing for the settled clergy in future times, (an evil severely felt by the established clergy at the present day,) they ascribed to him a kind of infallibility, empowering him, by letters patent under the great seal, to determine articles of faith, which men were to believe fully; and giving him the power to settle the doctrines, and fix on the rites and ceremonies, which they were to observe and practise under the severest penalties.

Such was the wretched state of the nation at the demise of Henry the Eighth; and if his plans had been improved by a successor equal in tyranny to himself, beyond doubt the liberties of the people must have been irretrievably subverted. But Providence, which had permitted these encroachments, for wise and better purposes, directed the course of things for our good, and, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, broke those chains, which an imprudent and factious people had forged for themselves.

CHAP. IV.

Affairs of the Church, and progressive History of the Reformation.

THE Ecclesiastical History of this period requires a particular consideration, and although some circumstances connected with it have been necessarily interwoven with the reign of Henry the Eighth, yet it would have been improper to have done otherwise than reserve our account of the principal events in the origin and progress of the Reformation for a separate chapter; in which we shall treat the subject with perspicuity and conciseness.

We have before observed (o), that Leo the Tenth, by his generous and enterprizing temper, had much exhausted his treasury, and was obliged to employ every invention which might yield money, in order to support his projects, pleasures, and liberalities. Among other projects for raising supplies, he had recourse to the sale of indulgences. According to the doctrine of the Romish church, all the good works of the saints, over and above those which were necessary for their own justification, are deposited, together with the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, in one inexhaustible treasury. The keys of this were committed to St. Peter, and to his successors, the popes, who may open it at pleasure; and, by transferring a portion of this superabundant merit to any particular person for a sum of money, may convey to him either the pardon of his own sins, or a release for any one in whom he is interested from the pains of purgatory. Such indulgences were first invented, in the eleventh century, by pope Urban the Second, as a recompence for those who went in person upon the meritorious enterprize of conquering the Holy Land from the Infidels. They were afterwards granted to those who hired a soldier for that purpose; and, in process of time, were bestowed, as we are told in Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, on such as gave money for accomplishing any pious work enjoined by the pope. Julius the Second had bestowed indulgences on all who contributed towards building the church of St. Peter at Rome; and, as Leo was carrying on that magnificent and extensive fabric, his grant was founded on the same pretence.

The right of promulgating these indulgences in Germany, together with a share in the profits arising from the sale of them, was granted to Albert, elector of Metz, and archbishop of Magdeburg; who employed, as his chief agent for retailing them in Saxony, one Tetzel, a Dominican frier, a man of licentious morals, but of an active spirit, and remarkable for his boisterous and popular eloquence. He, assisted by the monks of his order, executed the commission with great zeal and success, but with little discretion or decency; and though, by magnifying excessively the benefit of their indulgences, and by disposing of them at a very low price, they maintained for some time an extensive and lucrative traffic with the credulous multitude, the extravagance of their assertions, as well as the irregularities of their conduct, came at last to give general offence. The princes and the nobles were irritated at seeing their vassals drained of so much wealth, in order to replenish the treasury of an extravagant pontiff: men of piety regretted the delusion of the people; who, being taught to rely for the pardon of their sins on the indulgences which they purchased, did not think it incumbent on them either to abandon their faith, or to practise holiness: even the most unthinking were shocked at the scandalous behaviour of Tetzel and his associates, who often squandered in drunkenness, gaming, and low debauchery, those sums which were piously bestowed in hopes of obtaining eternal happiness; and all men began to wish that some check were given to this commerce, no less detrimental to society than destructive to religion.

It was at this favourable juncture, when the minds of men were thus disposed to listen to his discourses, that Martin Luther first began to question the efficacy of indulgences, and to declaim against the vicious lives and false doctrines of the persons employed in promulgating them (p). The terms in which Tetzel and his associates described the benefits of indulgences, and the necessity of purchasing them, are so extravagant as almost to exceed belief. "If any man," said they, "purchases letters of indulgence, his soul may rest secure with respect to its salvation." The souls confined in purgatory, for whose redemption indulgences are purchased, as soon as the money tinkles in the chest, instantly escape from that place of torment, and ascend to heaven; that the efficacy of indulgences was so great, that the most heinous sins, even if one should violate—which is utterly impossible—the Mother of God, would be remitted and expiated by them, and the person be freed both from punishment and guilt; that this was the unspeakable gift of God, in order to reconcile men to himself; that the cross erected by the preachers of indulgences was as efficacious as the cross of Christ itself. "Lo! the heavens are open: if you enter not now, when will you enter? For twelve pence you may redeem the soul of your father out of Purgatory; and are you so ungrateful, that you will not rescue your parent from torment? If you had but one coat, you ought to strip yourself instantly, and sell it in order to purchase such benefits! (q)"

But to return to Luther (r), who was a native of Eisleben, in Saxony; and, though born of poor parents, had received a learned education, during the progress of which he gave many indications of uncommon vigour and acuteness of genius. Being fond of the delights of solitude and devotion, he retired into a convent of Augustine friers; and assumed the habit of that order. He there acquired great reputation, as well for his piety as for his love of knowledge, and his unwearied application to study. He had been taught the scholastic philosophy and theology then in vogue by very able masters; but his sound mind could not rest satisfied with sciences so replete with subtilty, and barren of instruction; he therefore sought for a more solid basis of knowledge and piety in the only pure and inexhaustible source, the Holy Scriptures. Having found a copy of the Bible in the library of his convent, which had long been neglected, he abandoned all other pursuits, and devoted himself to the study of it with such eagerness and assiduity as astonished the monks, who were little accustomed to derive their theological notions from the Word of God. The great progress he made in this uncommon course of study so far increased the reputation of his sanctity and learning, that Frederic, elector of Saxony, having founded an university at Wittemberg, on the Elbe, the place of his residence, Luther was chosen first to teach philosophy, and afterwards theology at that seminary; both which offices he discharged with satisfaction and applause.

While Luther was at the height of his reputation and authority, Tetzel began to publish indulgences in the vicinity of Wittemberg, and to ascribe to them the same imaginary virtues which had, in other places, imposed on the credulity of the people. As Saxony was not more enlightened than the other provinces of Germany, Tetzel experienced prodigious success there. The artifices of (o) See above, p. 360.

(p) As the form and nature of these indulgences are at present very little known, or but imperfectly understood, even in many places where the Roman Catholic religion still prevails, we have thought it necessary to insert the following form of absolution used by Tetzel, translated from the first book of the Commentaries of Seckendorf: "May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, by that of his blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul, and of the MOST HOLY POPE, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they have been incurred; and then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the Holy See; and, so far as the Keys of the Holy Church extend, I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in Purgatory on their account; and I restore you to the holy sacraments of the church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism; so that when you shall die, the gates of Punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the Paradise of Delight shall be opened; and, if you shall not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when you are at the point of death. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—Our inclination would lead us to comment on this form of indulgence granted by the Roman See, but the glaring absurdity, folly, and wickedness, which appear in every line of it are so palpable, that we think the reader's own reflections, on the bare perusal of it, will be sufficient to give him an utter abhorrence of that church, whose ministers shall thus dare to insult their understandings with such futile offers of pardon for all their sins.

(q) These extravagant expressions are selected, from many others equally gross and blasphemous, out of Luther's works, in the "Examen Concilii Tridentini, by Chemnitius, who has published several of Tetzel's discourses, which prove that they were neither singular nor exaggerated.

(r) A full account of whose life may be seen in the "Evangelical Biography", vol. iii. p. 246, to which we refer the reader; where many particulars in the life of that eminent reformer are enumerated, which our plan would not permit us to insert.

those

those who sold, and the simplicity of those who purchased indulgences, excited the deepest concern in the mind of Luther, who had already rejected many of the absurd opinions of Thomas Aquinas and the other schoolmen, on which the doctrine of indulgences was founded; and the Scriptures, which he began to consider as the great standard of theological truth, afforded no countenance to a practice equally subversive of faith and of morals. The warmth and impetuosity of his temper speedily impelled him to reveal such important discoveries, and to revolt at the idea of continuing a silent spectator of the delusion of his countrymen. From the pulpit in the great church of Wittemberg, he inveighed bitterly against the irregularities and vices of the monks who published indulgences: he ventured even to examine the doctrines which they taught, and pointed out to the people the danger of relying for salvation upon any other means than those appointed by God in his Word. The boldness and novelty of these opinions attracted great attention; and, being recommended by the authority of Luther's personal character, and delivered with a popular and persuasive eloquence, they made a deep impression on all who heard him. Encouraged by the favourable reception of his doctrines among the people, he wrote to Albert, elector of Mentz, and archbishop of Magdeburg, to whose jurisdiction that part of Saxony was subject, and remonstrated warmly against the false opinions, as well as wicked lives of the preachers of indulgences; but he found that prelate too deeply interested in their success to correct their abuses. His next attempt was to gain the suffrages of men of learning; for which purpose he published ninety-five theses, containing his sentiments with regard to indulgences. These he proposed, not as points fully established, or of undoubted certainty, but as subjects of enquiry and disputation; fixing a day in which the learned were appointed to discuss their merits, either in person or by writing, and to the whole he subjoined solemn protestations of his high respect for the Apostolic See, and of his implicit submission to its authority. No opponent, however, appeared at the time prefixed: the theses, therefore, spread over Germany with wonderful rapidity; they were read with the utmost eagerness; and every one admired the boldness of the man who had ventured not only to call in question the plenitude of papal power, but to attack the Dominicans, armed with all the terrors of inquisitorial authority.

The monks of St. Augustine, Luther's own order, though no less obsequious to the papal see than the other monastic fraternities, gave no check to the publication of these uncommon opinions. Independent of the respect he commanded, from the energy and justice of his sentiments, Luther had, by his piety and learning, acquired extraordinary authority among his brethren: he had professed the highest regard for the authority of the pope; and as a secret enmity, excited by interest or emulation, subsists among all the monastic orders in the Romish church, the Augustine monks were highly pleased with his invectives against the Dominicans, and hoped to see them exposed to the hatred and scorn of the people. The elector of Saxony, Luther's sovereign, likewise secretly encouraged his opposition to the publication of indulgences, hoping that the dispute among the ecclesiastics themselves might give some check to the exactions of the court of Rome, which the secular clergy had long been endeavouring to thwart.

Many zealous champions, urged by interested motives, came forward in defence of opinions on which the wealth and power of the church were founded, against the attacks of Luther. In opposition to Luther's theses, Tetzel published counter-theses at Francfort on the Oder; Eccius, a celebrated divine of Augsburg, endeavoured to refute his notions; and Prierias, a Dominican frier, master of the sacred palace, and inquisitor-general, wrote against him with all the virulence of a scholastic disputant. But, as bad advocates must hurt even a good cause, it is no wonder that the manner in which these opponents conducted the controversy should prove prejudicial to the interests they meant to promote. Luther attempted to combat indulgences by arguments founded in reason, or derived from the Scriptures; whereas they produced nothing in support of them but the dogmas of schoolmen, the conclusions of the canon law, or the decrees of the popes. The decision of judges so partial and interested was inadequate to operate conviction on the minds of the people, who began to question the authority of those venerable guides, when they found them in direct opposition to the dictates of reason, and the determinations of the divine law.

While these novelties were promulgated by Luther, which interested all Germany, the court of Rome took no alarm. Pope Leo the Tenth, fond of elegant and refined pleasures, and intent on great political schemes, regarded with the utmost indifference the operations of an obscure frier, who in the heart of Germany maintained a scholastic disputation in a barbarous style. Little did he apprehend, or little indeed did Luther himself imagine, that the effect of this quarrel would prove so fatal to the papal see. At length, however, the solicitations of Luther's adversaries, exasperated by the rapid progress of his opinions, rouzed the attention of Leo, and compelled him to resist an attack that now appeared too serious to be treated with contempt. With this view he summoned Luther to appear at Rome, in the month of July, 1518, before the auditor of the chamber, and the same Prierias who had written against him, whom he empowered to examine, and decide on, the merits of his doctrines. The nomination of so partial and prejudiced a judge convinced Luther what sentence he might expect at Rome; he therefore expressed an earnest desire to have his cause tried in Germany, and before a less suspected tribunal. This request being seconded by the professors of the university of Wittemberg, as well as by the elector of Saxony, the pope was at length prevailed on to gratify him so far as to authorize his legate, cardinal Cajetan, a Dominican, eminent for scholastic learning, and passionately devoted to the Roman see, to hear and determine the cause.

Luther, though he had good reason to decline a judge chosen from among his avowed adversaries, did not hesitate about appearing before Cajetan; and, having obtained the emperor's safe conduct, repaired without delay to Augsburg. But he was not less surprized than disappointed, when he found that the cardinal, instead of affording him a patient hearing, and seeking to convince him by the force of reason, had recourse to his authority, and insisted on an immediate and unqualified retraction of his errors. To this peremptory demand Luther replied, with his usual firmness, that he could not, with a safe conscience, renounce opinions which he believed to be true; nor should any consideration ever induce him to do what would be so base in itself, and so offensive to God. At the same time he expressed his willingness to submit the whole controversy to certain universities which he named; and promised to observe a strict silence in future with respect to indulgences, provided a similar restraint were imposed on his adversaries. Cajetan, however, rejected his offers, and still insisted on a simple recantation; to induce which he employed threats, that rendered it prudent for Luther to comply with the earnest solicitations of his friends; and, retiring secretly from Augsburg, to return to his own country. But, previous to his departure, according to a form, of which there had been some examples, he prepared a solemn appeal from the pope, ill-informed at that time concerning his cause, to the pope, when he should have received more ample information on that subject.

The inflexible rigour of Cajetan, on this occasion, gave great offence to Luther's followers in that age, and has since been censured as imprudent by several popish writers: but it was impossible for the legate to adopt any other mode of proceeding; for the judges before whom Luther had been required to appear at Rome were so eager to display their zeal against his errors, that, without waiting for the expiration of the sixty days allowed him in the citation, they had already condemned him as a heretic. The pope too had, in several of his briefs and letters, stigmatized him as a Child of Iniquity, reprobate and incorrigible: nothing less, therefore, than a recantation could save the honour of the church, whose maxim it is never to give up the smallest point it has advanced, and whose preposterous pretensions to infallibility prove an effectual impediment to the retraction of errors.

As every step taken by the court of Rome, particularly the irregular sentence by which he had been so precipitately declared a heretic, convinced Luther that Leo would soon proceed to the most violent measures against him, he had recourse to the only expedient in his power, in order to prevent the effect of the papal censures. He appealed to a general council, which he affirmed to be the representative of the Catholic Church, and superior in power to the pope; who, being (as he said) a fallible man, might might err, as St. Peter, the most perfect of his predecessors, had erred.

The justice of Luther's apprehensions was speedily verified. A bull, of a date prior to his appeal, was issued by the pope; in which he magnifies the virtue and efficacy of indulgences in terms as extravagant as any of his predecessors had ventured to use in the most dark and superstitious times; and requires all Christians, under the pain of excommunication, to assent to what he delivered as the doctrine of the church, unqualified by the application of such palliatives, or the mention of such concessions, as the juncture evidently called for.

The effect of a bull, enforced by such dreadful penalties, might have proved fatal to the cause of Luther, but for the death of the emperor Maximilian, who was prompted, both by his principles and his interest, to support the authority of the holy see. In consequence of this event, the vicariat of that part of Germany which is governed by the Saxon laws devolved to the elector of Saxony; and, under the shelter of his friendly administration, Luther not only enjoyed tranquillity, but such a degree of protection as encouraged the growth and propagation of his opinions. But though the pope, from political views, suspended any further proceedings against Luther, yet negociations were carried on, in order to bring the controversy to an amicable issue. The manner in which these negociations were conducted having given Luther many opportunities of observing the corruption of the court of Rome; its obstinacy in adhering to established errors; and its indifference about truth, however clearly proposed or strongly proved; he expressed some doubts as to the divine origin of the papal authority. A public disputation was held upon this important question at Leipsic, between Luther and Eccius, in which both parties claimed the victory, and no progress was made towards deciding the point in controversy.

About this time too, a Reformer appeared in Switzerland. This was Zuinglius, who opposed the promulgation of indulgences, at Zurich, with the same zeal and intrepidity as had been exerted by Luther in Saxony. The appearance of such a vigorous auxiliary, and the rapid progress which he made, was at first a matter of great exultation to Luther; while his opponents, on the other hand, triumphed in the decisions of the universities of Cologne and Louvaine, which pronounced his opinions to be erroneous.

Luther's undaunted spirit, which acquired fresh vigour from opposition, induced him to push on his attacks from one doctrine to another, till he began to shake the firmest foundations of the power and riches of the church. The pope therefore listened to the solicitations of those who urged him to issue the severest ecclesiastical censures against such an incorrigible heretic. The college of cardinals was often assembled, in order to prepare the sentence with due deliberation; and the ablest canonists were consulted how it might be expressed with unexceptionable formality. At length, on the 15th of June, 1520, the bull, so fatal to the church of Rome, was issued (s). The sentence contained in this bull, which he had for some time expected, did not disconcert or intimidate Luther; who, after renewing his appeal to the general council, published remarks upon the bull of excommunication. Being now persuaded of the injustice and impiety of Leo's proceedings, he boldly declared the pope to be that Man of Sin, or Antichrist, whose appearance is foretold in the New Testament: he declaimed against the pope's tyranny and usurpations with greater violence than ever; he exhorted all Christian princes to shake off such an ignominious yoke; and boasted of his own felicity in being marked out as the object of ecclesiastical indignation, because he had dared to assert the liberty of mankind. Nor were his expressions of contempt for the papal power confined to mere words: Leo having, in execution of the bull, ordered Luther's books to be burned at Rome, he, by way of retaliation, assembled all the professors and students in the university of Wittemberg; and with great pomp, in presence of a vast multitude of spectators, cast the literary labours of the canonists, together with the bull of excommunication, into the flames; and his example was followed in many cities in Germany. The manner in which he justified this action was still more offensive to the catholics than the action itself. Having collected from the canon law some of the most extravagant propositions with regard to the plenitude and omnipotence of the pope's power, as well as the subordination of all secular jurisdiction to his authority, he published these with a commentary, which may be seen in the second volume of his works, pointing out the impiety of such tenets, and their evident tendency to subvert all civil government.

Students now flocked from every province of the empire to Wittemberg; and, under Luther himself, Melancthon, Carlostadius, and other masters then deemed eminent, imbibed opinions which, on their return, they propagated among their countrymen; who listened to them with that fond attention which truth, when accompanied with novelty, naturally commands. Though a perfect stranger to the maxims of human prudence, and incapable, from the impetuosity of his temper, of observing them, Luther was led, by the method in which he made his discoveries, to carry on his operations in a manner which contributed more to their success than if every step he took had been prescribed by the most artful policy. At the time when he set himself to oppose Tetzel, he was far from intending to promote that reformation which he afterwards effected, and would have trembled with horror at the thoughts of what, at last, he gloried in accomplishing. The knowledge of truth was not poured into his mind, all at once, by any special revelation; and his progress was, consequently, gradual. The doctrines of popery are so closely connected, that the exposure of one error naturally led him to the detection of others. In confuting the extravagant tenets concerning indulgences, he was obliged to enquire into the true cause of our justification and acceptance with God: the knowledge of that discovered to him the inutility of Pilgrimages and Penances; the vanity of relying on the Intercession of Saints; the impiety of worshipping them; the abuses of Auricular Confession; and the imaginary existence of Purgatory. The detection of so many errors led him, of course, to consider the character of the clergy who taught them; and their exorbitant wealth, the severe injunction of celibacy, together with the intolerable rigour of monastic vows, appeared to him the grand sources of their corruption. From thence it was but one step to call in question the Divine original of the papal power, which authorized and supported such a system of errors. As the unavoidable result of the whole, he disclaimed the infallibility of the pope, the decisions of schoolmen, or any other human authority; and appealed to the Word of God, as the only standard of theological truth. To this gradual progress Luther owed his success. His hearers were not shocked at first by any proposition too repugnant to their ancient prejudices, or too remote from established opinions. They were conducted, insensibly, from one doctrine to another; and their faith and conviction were thus enabled to keep pace with his discoveries.

Among the principal causes which contributed to facilitate the progress of Luther, the immoral lives of the clergy was not the least conspicuous. The corrupt state of the church prior to the Reformation, is acknowledged by an author who was both a competent judge of the matter, and not over anxious to confess it. "For some years," says cardinal Bellarmine, "before the Lutheran and Calvinistic heresies were published, there was not—as contemporary writers testify—any severity in ecclesiastical judicatories, any discipline with regard to morals, any knowledge of sacred literature, any reverence for divine things. There was scarcely any religion remaining." In short, the superior clergy were more addicted to pleasure than inclined to a faithful discharge of their religious duties; while the lower class was rendered odious and contemptible from their gross ignorance and low debauchery. The scandal of these crimes was also greatly increased by the facility with which such as committed them obtained pardon. The court of Rome, always attentive to the means of augmenting its revenues, granted its pardons to such transgressors as were able and willing to purchase them with a sum of money. As the idea of a composition for crimes was then familiar, this strange traffic was so far from shocking mankind, that it soon became general; and, in order to prevent any imposition in carrying it on, the officers of the Roman Chancery published a book (t), containing the precise sum to be exacted for the pardon of every particular sin. A deacon, guilty of murder, was absolved for twenty crowns. A bishop or abbot might assassinate for three hundred livres. If a person took a false oath, he obtained absolution for nine shillings. If a layman murdered a layman, he obtained his pardon for seven shillings and six pence. If a person killed his father, or his mother, or his wife, or his sister, or his kinswoman, if they be of the laity, he received a pardon for ten shillings and six pence! Even such shocking crimes, as modesty obliges us to wave the recital of, which occur seldom in human life, and perhaps exist only in the impure imagination of a casuist, were taxed at a very moderate rate. When mankind had acquired more accurate notions of religion and morality, the conditions on which the court of Rome bestowed its pardons appeared impious, and were considered as one great source of ecclesiastical corruption.

(s) Forty-one propositions, extracted from the works of Luther, are therein condemned as heretical, scandalous, and offensive to pious ears; all persons are forbidden to read his writings, upon pain of excommunication; such as had any of them in their custody are commanded to commit them to the flames; he himself, if he did not, within sixty days, make a public recantation of his errors, and burn his books, is pronounced an obstinate heretic, is excommunicated, is delivered unto Satan for the destruction of his flesh; and all secular princes are required, under pain of incurring the same censure, to seize his person, that he might be punished as his crimes deserved.

Independent of this important consideration, which made great impression on the minds of men, and favoured the reception of Luther's doctrine, the invention of the art of printing, and the revival of learning, tended greatly to promote the rapidity of the progress of the Reformation. The revival of learning had roused mankind from the lethargy in which it had been sunk for several centuries, and they now began to exercise their reasoning faculties with great boldness upon all subjects. Instead of being startled when the daring hand of Luther had drawn aside the veil which covered established errors, the genius of the age applauded and aided the attempt. The principal promoters of the Reformation were generally men of erudition, and their learning enabled them to carry on the contest, at first, with great superiority; for erudition, industry, accuracy of sentiment, purity of composition, even wit and raillery, were wholly on their side; and these enabled them to triumph with ease over illiterate monks, whose rude arguments, expressed in a perplexed and barbarous style, were found insufficient for the defence of a system, the errors of which all the art and ingenuity of its later and more learned advocates have not been able to palliate.

On the accession of Charles the Fifth to the imperial throne, that prince, compelled to court the alliance of the pope from the hostile preparations of Francis the First, king of France, treated Luther with great severity. He issued an edict, stigmatizing him as an obstinate and excommunicated heretic, and commanding every one to join in attempts to seize his person. But this rigorous decree had no considerable effect; the execution of it being prevented, partly by the emperor's various occupations, and partly by a prudent device of the elector of Saxony, Luther's faithful patron. As Luther, on his return from the diet at Worms, (which he had attended in compliance with the mandate, and under the faith of a safe conduct, of the emperor), was passing near Altenstein, in Thuringia, a number of horsemen, masked, rushed suddenly out of a wood, where the elector had appointed them to lie in wait for him; and, surrounding his company, carried him, after dismissing his attendants, to Wartsburg, a strong castle not far distant. There the elector ordered him to be supplied with every article of necessity and convenience; but carefully concealed the place of his retreat, until the fury of the present storm against him began to abate, upon a change in the political state of affairs in Europe.

During his confinement in this castle, Luther received intelligence of the solemn condemnation of his opinions by the university of Paris, at that time the most respectable of the learned societies in Europe. Henry the Eighth too, being ambitious of acquiring glory of every kind, as well as zealously attached to the Romish church, was highly exasperated against Luther, who had treated Thomas Aquinas, Henry's favourite author, with all the contempt he merited, did not think it sufficient to exert his royal authority in opposing the opinions of the Reformer, but resolved likewise to combat them with scholastic weapons. With this view he published his treatise on the Seven Sacraments, (in answer to Luther's book on the Babylonish Captivity), which was presented to the pope with the greatest formality in full consistory, where the sovereign pontiff spoke of it in such high terms, as if it had been dictated by immediate inspiration; and, as a testimony of the gratitude of the church for his extraordinary zeal, conferred on him the title of Defender of the Faith; an appellation which Henry soon forfeited in the opinion of those from whom he derived it, and which is still retained by his successors, though the avowed enemies of those opinions, by contending for which he procured that honourable distinction. Luther, who was not overawed by the authority of the university, nor by the dignity of the monarch, soon published his animadversions on both, no less vehement and severe than he would have used in confuting the meanest antagonist. The king, by his acrimony, became still more incensed against his doctrine; but the public, who naturally favour the weaker party, inclined to ascribe to Luther the victory in the dispute: and, as the controversy was rendered more illustrious, if not more interesting, by the engagement of Henry as a champion in the contest, it attracted in a still greater degree, the attention of mankind; and the Lutheran doctrine daily acquired new partizans in every quarter of Europe.

At this juncture Leo the Tenth died, in the flower of his age, soon after he received the king's book against Luther. Great discord prevailed in the conclave which was held after his death: and all the arts natural to men grown old in intrigue, when contending for a prize so valuable, were exerted. Wolsey's name, notwithstanding the solemn promises of the emperor to favour his pretensions, of which that prelate did not fail to remind him, was scarcely mentioned in the conclave. Julio, cardinal de Medici, Leo's nephew, who was more eminent than any other member of the sacred college for his abilities, wealth, and experience, in the transaction of important affairs, had already secured fifteen voices; a number sufficient, according to the forms of a conclave, to exclude any other candidate, though not to carry its own election. All the old cardinals combined against him, without being united in favour of any other person. While these factions endeavoured to gain, to corrupt, or to weary out each other, Medici and his adherents voted one morning at the scrutiny—which, according to form, was made every day—for cardinal Adrian of Utrecht, who at that time governed Spain in the name of the emperor: this they did merely to protract time. But the adverse party instantly closing with them, to their own astonishment, and that of all Europe, a stranger to Italy, unknown to the persons who gave their suffrages in his favour, and unacquainted with the manners of the people, or the interest of the state, the government of which they thus conferred upon him, was unanimously raised to the papal throne, at a juncture so delicate and critical, as would have demanded all the sagacity and experience of one of the ablest prelates in the sacred college. The cardinals themselves, unable to alledge any reason for this strange choice (on account of which, as they marched in procession from the conclave, they were loaded with the insults and maledictions of the Roman people,) ascribed it to an immediate impulse of the Holy Ghost. It may be imputed with greater certainty to the influence of Don John Manuel, the imperial ambassador, who, by his address and intrigues, facilitated the election of a person devoted to his master's service, from gratitude, from interest, and from inclination.

The religious divisions in Germany excited the attention of the emperor Charles; for he perceived that, in the end, they would prove extremely hurtful to the imperial authority. To remedy this, as far as he could, he had appointed a diet to be held at Spires, on the 15th of March, 1529, in order to take into consideration the state of religion. But the great progress which the doctrines of Luther had made in the empire, the unremitting zeal of that steady Reformer, and the number and power of his converts, rendered the adoption of any violent measure a matter of extreme danger: all, therefore, that the archduke, and the other commissioners appointed by the emperor, demanded of the diet, was to enjoin those states of the empire which had hitherto obeyed the decree issued against Luther at Worms, in 1524, to persevere in the observation of it; and to prohibit the other states from attempting any farther innovation in religion, particularly from abolishing the mass, before the meeting of a general council. After much dispute, a decree to that effect was approved by a majority of voices.

The elector of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburgh, the landgrave of Hesse, the dukes of Lunenburgh, the prince of Anhalt, together with the deputies of fourteen imperial or free cities, entered a solemn protest, on the 19th of April, against this decree, as unjust and impious; and, on that account, they received the appellation of PROTESTANTS, by which they were ever afterwards distinguished. Not satisfied with this declaration of their dissent from the decree of the diet, the Protestants sent ambassadors into Italy, where the emperor then was, to lay their grievances before him: but Charles, being now closely united to the pope, gave them the most discouraging reception; and, urged by Clement to make every possible exertion to extirpate Heretics, whom the interested pontiff declared to be equally dangerous to the civil and ecclesiastical powers, he returned to Germany, (having previously appointed a diet of the empire to be held at Augsburg, on the 12th of March, 1530,) with a determination to adopt the most rigorous measures against the Protestants, in case more lenient methods should prove unsuccessful.

The diet was unusually crowded: but, though religious disputes were destined to be the chief objects of discussion, the presence of the emperor prevented the display of any improper heat, and seems to have inspired all parties with an extraordinary spirit of moderation and love of peace. The elector of Saxony would not permit Luther to accompany him to the diet, lest he should offend Charles, by bringing into his presence a person excommunicated by the pope, and the author of all those dissensions which it now appeared so difficult to compose. At the emperor's desire, all the Protestant princes forbade the divines who accompanied them to preach in public during their residence at Augsburg. For the same reason they employed Melancthon, a man of the greatest learning, as well as of the most pacific and gentle spirit, among the Reformers, to draw up a confession of their faith, expressed in terms as little offensive to the Roman Catholics, as a regard for truth would permit. Melancthon, who seldom suffered the rancour of controversy to envenom his style, even in writings purely polemical, executed a task so agreeable to his natural disposition with great moderation and success. The creed which he composed, known by the name of The Confession of Augsburg, from the place where it was presented, was read publicly in the diet; some popish divines were appointed to examine it; they brought in their animadversions; and a dispute ensued between them and Melancthon, seconded by some of his brethren; but, though Melancthon softened some articles, made concessions with regard to others, and put the least exceptionable sense upon all,—(even the emperor himself laboured, with great earnestness, to reconcile the contending parties,)—so many marks of distinction were now established, and such inseparable barriers placed between the two churches, that all hopes of effecting a coalition seemed entirely thrown aside.

The emperor having in vain tried every method he could devise, either to gain or disunite the Protestant party, at length resolved to pursue some vigorous measures towards asserting the doctrines and authority of the established church. These Campeggio, the papal nuncio, had always recommended as the only proper and effectual mode of proceeding with such obstinate Heretics. In compliance with his opinion and remonstrances, the diet issued a decree, condemning most of the peculiar tenets held by the Protestants; forbidding any person to protect or tolerate such as taught them; enjoining a strict observance of the established rites; and prohibiting any further innovation under severe penalties. All orders of men were required to assist, with their persons and fortunes, in executing this decree; and such as refused to obey it were declared incapable of acting as judges, or of appearing as parties in the Imperial Chamber, the supreme court of judicature in the empire. To all which was subjoined a promise, that an application should be made to the pope, requiring him to call a General Council within six months, in order to terminate all controversies by its sovereign decisions.

The severity of this decree, which they considered as a prelude to the most violent persecution, alarmed the Protestants, and convinced them that the emperor was resolved on their destruction. The dread of those calamities which were ready to fall on the church oppressed the timid spirit of Melancthon; but Luther, who during the meeting of the diet had endeavoured to confirm and animate his party by several treatises which he addressed to them, was neither disconcerted nor discouraged at the prospect of this new danger. He comforted his desponding disciples, and exhorted the princes not to abandon those truths which they had lately asserted with such laudable boldness. His exhortations made a deeper impression upon them, as they were greatly alarmed at that time by the account of a combination among the Popish princes of the empire for the maintenance of the established religion, to which Charles himself had acceded. This convinced them that it was necessary to stand on their guard; and that their own safety, as well as the success of their cause, depended on unanimity. Filled with this dread of the adverse party, and impressed with those sentiments on the line of conduct which it would be proper for themselves to pursue, they assembled at Smalcalde. They there concluded, on the 22nd of December, 1530, a league of mutual defence against all aggressors: by which they formed the Protestant states of the empire into one regular body; and, beginning already to consider themselves as such, they resolved to apply to the kings of France and England, and to implore them to patronize and assist their new confederacy.

After the prorogation of the English parliament which met November 3, 1534, a proclamation was published by the king, for the suppression of title of pope, and for its erasure from all books and writings; and all the prelates renounced obedience to the bishop of Rome, for an absolute breach with whom the nation seemed now to be fully prepared. But though Henry had found it expedient, for the gratification of his passions, to encourage this breach with the sovereign pontiff, he was, nevertheless inimical to the cause and principles of the Reformers. He had early declared his sentiments against Luther (u); and, having once entered the field of polemical disputation, and acquired that applause which as a king he could not fail to command, he had become so elated with his imaginary success, and was so blinded by a natural arrogance and obstinacy of temper, that he entertained the most extravagant opinions of his own erudition, and received any contradiction to his sentiments with the most contemptuous impatience. Thus disposed, the severity which he had experienced from the uncourtly pen of Luther had inspired him with sentiments of hatred to the person and doctrines of that Reformer, which a subsequent apology for the vehemence of his expressions was wholly inadequate to efface. The idea of heresy still appeared detestable as well as formidable to Henry; and whilst his resentment against the see of Rome had corrected one considerable part of his early prejudices, he had made it a point of honour never to relinquish the remainder. Separate as he stood from the catholic church, and from the Roman pontiff, the head of it, he still valued himself on maintaining the catholic doctrine, and on guarding by fire and sword the imagined purity of his speculative principles.

In fact, Henry's conduct appeared so extremely ambiguous, that some Englishmen, particularly Tindal, Joye, Constantine, and others, in dread of the king's authority, had fled to Antwerp (v), where the great privileges possessed by the Low Country provinces served, during some time, to give them protection. These persons employed themselves in writing English books against the corruptions and superstitions of the church of Rome; against images, reliques, pilgrimages; and they excited the curiosity of men with regard to that question, the most important in theology, the terms of acceptance with the Supreme Being. In conformity with the Lutherans and other Protestants, they asserted the omnipotence of Faith for the purpose of Salvation; and that the most infallible road to perdition (w) was a reliance on good works; by which terms they understood as well the moral duties as the ceremonial and monastic observances. The defenders of the ancient religion, on the other hand, maintained the efficacy of good works; by which they principally meant those superstitious practices which were productive to the church. The books composed by these fugitives, being secretly brought over to England, began to make converts every where; but it was a translation of the Scriptures by Tindal that was esteemed the most dangerous to the established faith. So true it is, that, in a good cause, the simple exhibition of plain truth is infinitely more persuasive than all the studied arguments of rhetorical declaimers. The first edition of this work was found liable to considerable objections, on the score of inaccuracy; and Tindal, who was poor, and could not afford to lose a great part of the impression, was longing for an opportunity of correcting his errors, of which he had been made sensible. Cuthbert Tonstal, (then bishop of London, from which he was soon after translated to Durham,) a man of great moderation, being desirous to discourage in the gentlest manner these innovations, which he apprehended were pregnant with danger to the church, gave private orders for buying up all the copies that could be found at Antwerp; and he burned them publicly in Cheapside. By this measure he supplied Tindal with money, enabled him to print a new and correct edition of his work, and gave great scandal to the people in thus committing to the flames the Oracles of Truth (x).

The disciples of the reformation experienced but little severity during the administration of Wolsey, who, though himself a cardinal, bore so small a regard to the ecclesiastical order, and whose worldly pursuits were so near to his heart, that he was a very unfit person to serve as an instrument of their tyranny: It was even made an article of impeachment against him (y), that, by his connivance, he had encouraged the advancement of heresy, and that he had protected and acquitted some notorious offenders. Sir Thomas More, who succeeded Wolsey as chancellor, is at once an object deserving our compassion, and an instance of the usual progress of men's sentiments during that age (z). His chancellorship was far from being distinguished by a spirit of equal toleration with that of cardinal Wolsey.

Many were brought into the bishops' courts for offences in themselves trivial, but deemed important in their consequences, from betraying symptoms of hostility to the established faith. Some for teaching their children the Lord's Prayer in their mother tongue; others for reading the New Testament in that language, or for speaking against pilgrimages. To harbour the preachers of the doctrines of the Reformation, to neglect the fasts of the church, to declaim against the vices of the clergy, were judged capital offences. Thomas Bilney, a priest who had been converted to the new doctrine, had been terrified into an abjuration; but was so haunted by remorse that his friends dreaded some fatal effects of his despair. At last his mind seemed to be more relieved; but this appearing calm proceeded only from the resolution which he had taken of expiating his past offence by an open confession of the truth, and dying a martyr to it. He went through Norfolk, teaching the people to beware of idolatry, and of trusting for their salvation either to pilgrimages, or to the cowl of St. Francis, to the prayers of the saints, or to images. He was soon seized, tried in the bishops' court, and condemned as a relapsed heretic; and the writ was sent down to burn him. When brought to the stake, he discovered such patience, fortitude, and devotion, that the spectators were much affected with the horrors of his punishment; and some mendicant friers who were present, fearing that his martyrdom would be imputed to them, and make them lose those alms which they received from the charity of the people, desired him publicly to acquit them of having any hand in his death. He willingly complied; and by this meekness gained the more on the sympathy of the people (a). Another person, still more heroic, being brought to the stake for denying the real presence, seemed almost in a transport of joy; and he tenderly embraced the faggots destined to reduce him to ashes, as the means of procuring him eternal rest. In short, the tide turning towards the new doctrine, those severe executions, which, in another disposition of men's minds, would have sufficed to suppress it, now served only to diffuse it the more among the people, and to inspire them with horror against the unrelenting persecutors.

Although Henry neglected not to punish the protestant doctrine, which he deemed heresy, his most formidable enemies he knew, were the zealous adherents to the ancient religion, chiefly the monks, who, having their immediate dependence on the Roman pontiff, apprehended their own ruin to be the certain consequences of abolishing his authority in England. Peyto, a frier, preaching one day before the king, had the assurance to tell him, "That many lying prophets had deceived him; but he, as a true Micaiah, warned him, that the dogs would lick his blood, as they had done Ahab's (b)." The king took no notice of the insult, but allowed the preacher to depart in peace. On the next Sunday he employed Dr. Corren to preach before him; who justified the king's proceedings, and gave Peyto the appellations of a rebel, a slanderer, a dog, and a traitor. Elston, another frier of the same house, interrupted the preacher, and told him that he was one of the lying prophets, who sought to establish by adultery the succession of the crown; but that he himself would justify all that Peyto had said. Henry silenced the petulant frier: but showed no other mark of resentment than ordering Peyto and him to be summoned before the council, and to be rebuked for their offence (c). He even here bore patiently some new instances of their obstinacy and arrogance: when the earl of Essex, a privy counsellor, told them, that they deserved for their offence to be thrown into the Thames; Elston replied, that the road to heaven lay as near by water as by land (d).

In the parliament which met on the 4th of February, 1536, a measure of great importance was agitated. Henry the Eighth had long looked with an eye of avidity on the possessions of the religious orders; and many of his courtiers, prompted by the same spirit of rapacity, wished for a participation of these valuable spoils. Much has been said, by the different writers, of the benefits as well as of the disadvantages attendant on the monastic institutions. On the one hand, they furnished convenient retreats for persons of a pious and contemplative turn of mind; they were long the repositories of the little learning that prevailed; they were useful to the community as seminaries of education; they furnished the solace of hospitality, and dispensed the blessings of charity. On the other hand, the seclusion of such a number of individuals proved no small detriment to the public, by consigning to a life of indolence those who might otherwise have been active and industrious members of the state; the retirement of a monastic life cherished that spirit of superstition, which a more enlarged converse with the world might have corrected; and the dependence of the monks on the popes, who had always encouraged their order, and had favoured them with considerable privileges, diminished their loyalty to their natural sovereign.

When Henry had established his claim to the supremacy of the church of England, the monks being then subjected to his jurisdiction, were alarmed with the fears of losing their ancient rights and privileges. They apprehended, that the abolition of the authority which their papal protector had enjoyed in this country, would speedily be followed by their depression, and perhaps their total ruin. They were acquainted with the inclinations of many of the nobility for reducing their power and circumscribing their possessions; and some of them conceived, that the most effectual way of checking the rapacious eagerness of the king and his courtiers for their spoils, would be to strike a terror into the leaders of the administration by the arts of clamour and sedition. Hence they had warmly opposed Henry's desire of a divorce, supported by the imposture of Elizabeth Barton, the holy maid of Kent (e), and openly inveighed against the changes in ecclesiastical affairs enacted by parliament. But the more prudent members of their order, perceiving the inutility of opposing a government which seemed to be firmly established, calmly watched the approaching storm, with a resolution of quietly submitting to such measures as they should find themselves unable to prevent.

(z) This man, whose elegant genius and familiar acquaintance with the noble spirit of antiquity had given him very enlarged sentiments, and who had in his early years advanced principles which even at present would be deemed somewhat too free, had, in the course of events, been so irritated by polemics, and thrown into such a superstitious attachment to the popish faith, that few inquisitors have been guilty of greater violence in their prosecution of heresy. Though adorned with the gentlest manners as well as the purest integrity, he carried to the utmost height his aversion to heterodoxy; and James Bainham, in particular, a gentleman of the Temple, experienced from him the greatest severity. Bainham, accused of favouring the new opinions, was carried to More's house; and having refused to discover his accomplices, the chancellor ordered him to be whipped in his presence, and afterwards sent him to the Tower, where he himself saw him put to the torture. The unhappy gentleman, overcome by all these severities, abjured his opinions; but, feeling afterwards the deepest compunction for his apostacy, he openly returned to his former tenets, and even courted the crown of martyrdom. He was condemned as an obstinate and relapsed heretic, and was burned in Smithfield. See Fox's Martyrology; and Burnet, vol. i. p. 165.

Orders had been lately issued, by virtue of a particular statute, for a general visitation of the religious houses; and Thomas Cromwell, secretary of state, and master of the rolls, who, since his able defence of cardinal Wolsey, had been gradually rising to power and eminence, had been appointed the king's vicegerent in ecclesiastical affairs. This minister employed a number of commissioners to act under him in the proposed visitation (f); and they received from him a long list of instructions, comprehending eighty-six articles, by which their enquiries were to be regulated (g). The occupants of some convents in which the traces of vice were more conspicuous than in others, were prevailed on by the visitors to surrender their houses to the king, rather than expose themselves to the disgrace of a public inquisition into their conduct, which would terminate in their expulsion, if not in the exemplary punishment of their misdeeds. Those who thus resigned their houses received from Henry a small pension for life; and, in the other monasteries that were now visited, all persons, whether male or female, who were desirous of quitting the habit, were permitted by the inspectors to renounce their vows, and some of them were gratified with a present at their departure (h).

When the parliament was assembled, the result of the visitation was communicated to the two houses; and a bill was brought in for the confirmation of all the late surrenders which had been made of religious houses, and the suppression of the smaller foundations of that kind. In recommendation of this spirited measure, it was stated, that the application of the revenues of these foundations to the service of the state, would be more generally beneficial than the practice of employing them in the maintenance of useless devotees, and in the encouragement of disgraceful indolence; that a diminution of imposts would be the consequence of such a transfer; and that the abuses discovered in the management of these institutions were so scandalous, as to justify the dissolution of them, particularly when the necessary support of the royal dignity, and the demands of national advantage, suggested the expediency of the proposal. The odium which the late discoveries had excited against the monks, the progress of the Lutheran tenets among the members, the general wishes of the laity for the reduction of the ecclesiastical possessions, and the hopes which the nobility and principal commoners had conceived of a share in the spoils of the monasteries, procured the enactment of a statute agreeable to the inclinations of the king, who was content for the present with the acquisition of the smaller monasteries (i).

The proceedings of the convocation which met in the year 1536, were of sufficient importance to merit our notice. Cromwell, the vicegerent, communicated to the upper house the king's orders, that the rites and ceremonies of the church should be reformed by the rules of Scripture, as nothing ought to be practised or maintained without the sanction of that paramount authority. Alexander Ales, a Scottish divine, had been brought to the place of meeting by the vicegerent, who desired him to deliver his opinion respecting the sacraments of the church. He therefore addressed the assembly in a long harangue, in which he endeavoured to prove, that only two sacraments, baptism and the eucharist, were instituted by Christ. He was answered by the bishop of London, and other prelates of the Catholic party; and defended by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, and Edward Fox, bishop of Hereford. After warm debates, the majority of the convocation agreed to certain articles, in which the Reformers prevailed so far as to procure the insertion of some of their doctrines, though their influence could not exclude transubstantiation, auricular confession, the use of images, or prayers to saints. These articles, corrected and revised by Henry, were signed by the principal clergy, and published by the royal authority (k). The establishment of a set of doctrines, which neither satisfied the Catholics nor the Protestants, and which, therefore, were not sincerely adopted in toto by any individual in the realm, strongly proved the uncommon influence which the king had obtained over the people, even in the most delicate points of religious opinion.

To facilitate the introduction of genuine religion among the people, the king, with the assent of the convocation, had already given orders for a translation of the Scriptures into the English language. This point was strenuously promoted by the Reformers, who represented it as a striking instance of absurdity and injustice to deny the people the use of the Scriptures, which ought to be open to universal inspection, that the public might know the foundation of the doctrines inculcated by their spiritual instructors. They also affirmed, that the studious concealment of the revealed will of the Almighty argued, in the clergy who countenanced it, a consciousness of the great difference between the doctrines which they taught, and the true dictates of Holy Writ.

To these arguments the Catholics replied, that, as questions of theology were, for the most part, too elevated for vulgar comprehension, the publication of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue would, instead of enlightening the minds of men, lead them into a multiplicity of errors, arising from the weakness of illiterate judgement; that such obscurities and seeming contradictions occurred in the sacred volumes, as required the profound attention of the ablest critics and most erudite divines to explain the mystery; that the multitude would be so distracted with the variety and discordancy of numerous passages, as to be unable to derive any real instruction from scriptural study; and that the measure so warmly supported by the pretended Reformers would tend only to open the floodgates of heresy, and deluge the world with heterogeneous notions, for each of which the authority of Scripture, perverted and misconstrued, would be alleged. These sophistical reasonings, however, lost their effect, and the proposed work was quickly commenced, and completed in about three years, with greater accuracy than had appeared in the version of Tindal, an English Protestant, who had some years before published the Scriptures in his native language, to the great indignation of the bigotted clergy, who had procured a prohibition of the use of his translation in this country.

While the Reformation was thus gaining ground in England, it continued to make a greater progress in Germany, notwithstanding all the efforts of the emperor. The elector of Saxony, and other German princes who had united for the defence of the new religion, had courted the assistance of Henry against the emperor Charles; but he was not inclined to enter into an unnecessary war with that potentate. Indeed his attention was called to the affairs of his own kingdom, which exhibited some alarming appearances of commotion.

Although great abuses prevailed in many of the monasteries, it was the opinion of many, that a reformation of those abuses would have been a more just measure than their total suppression: but the political utility of their suppression, though interested views appear to have prevailed in the minds of the chief promoters of it, counterbalanced its iniquity. The ejected monks did not consider it in any other light than as an act of rapine. They loudly complained of the injustice of a legislature which had so obsequiously gratified the sacrilegious avidity of the king; and they urged the people to rise in the cause of religion, which had suffered in the persons of its professors. They exclaimed against the innovations which had been introduced (f) These were Layton, London, Price, Gage, Petre, Bellasis, and others.

(g) If we may give credence to the accounts sent by these officers to the vicegerent, (and there is little reason to suppose the writers guilty of more than occasional exaggeration,) great disorders and enormities prevailed in the monasteries. They asserted that there were whole convents of women abandoned to lewdness: signs of abortion procured, of infants murdered, and of unnatural lusts between persons of the same sex. They mentioned also vast numbers of pious frauds which the monks made use of, to increase the devotion and liberality of the people, whose ignorance and superstition readily fell in with the views of the ecclesiastics.

(h) See Lord Herbert's Life of Henry VIII. p. 186.

(i) In the preamble of this act it was affirmed, that such religious houses as contained fewer than twelve individuals, had been long disgraced by "vicious and abominable living;" that every attempt made for above two hundred years past to reform the prevailing abuses had been ineffectual; and that, unless the smaller houses should be dissolved, and the religious removed into the greater ones, no reformation could be expected. It was therefore enacted, that all monasteries which had a revenue of two hundred pounds per annum, or less, should be suppressed, for the appropriation of their produce to better uses. By another statute, all the houses thus dissolved, with the lands, churches, and goods belonging to them, were granted to the king and his heirs. For the management of the revenues arising from these acquisitions, a new court was erected, under the name of the court of augmentations. The monasteries which were thus suppressed, as above mentioned, were three hundred and seventy-six in number; and their revenues amounted to thirty-two thousand pounds per annum.

duced into the creed by some of the late articles, representing to the multitude the impiety of abolishing four out of seven sacraments, and prognosticating that those which were retained (baptism, the eucharist, and penance) would soon follow the fate of the rest, to the utter destruction of the faith of the holy church. By these and other insinuations, they endeavoured to kindle the flames of sedition; and they brought over many of the laity to a concurrence in their resentment.

When the king heard of the rising discontents, he re-established thirty-two convents (l), (fifteen of men, and seventeen of women), on pretence of the superior regularity of these societies. To appease those provincial gentlemen who had testified an inclination for encouraging the clamours of the monks, he sold some of the estates belonging to the religious houses to them at very easy rates; and, as he imposed on these purchasers an obligation of continuing that hospitality which had so highly recommended the conventual houses to the indigent, he allayed the disaffection of those who had formerly participated of the monastic bounty (m). But, though these measures of the court pacified many discontented persons, an insurrection was not prevented. The secular ecclesiastics who were attached to the doctrines of the church of Rome, were disgusted not only at several of the late articles enacted by the convocation, but at a code of instructions which had been since promulgated by Cromwell, in the king's name, without the concurrence either of that assembly or of the parliament. They were also displeased at the promotion of that minister to the office of spiritual vice-gerent. Both parties were disgusted with him, though his encouragement of the reformed religion rendered his authority less invidious to the Protestants, than to the abettors of Popery.

As the secular clergy were thus dissatisfied with the government, it was reasonable to suppose that they would countenance and support the complaints of the ruined monks. The superiors of the greater monasteries likewise fomented the disturbance, which they wished to bring to such a height as to deter the king from the completion of his scheme of seizing the religious foundations. Apprehensive of their encouragement of the intrigues of the mal-contents, Henry sent circular letters to the remaining convents, contradicting the rumour which had been propagated of his intention of dissolving all the monasteries in his realm. This intimation, however, rather increased the jealousy which the abbots had conceived of his views, than removed their fears of suppression. An insurrection therefore broke out in the county of Lincoln, headed by Dr. Mackrel, who appeared as the leader of twenty thousand men; an account of which has been already given in the history of the reign of Henry, to which we refer the reader.

The rebellion just alluded to being suppressed, and negociations being set on foot on the continent, Henry was desirous of cementing an union with the German Protestants; and for that purpose he sent Christopher Mount to a congress which they held at Brunswick; but that minister made no great progress in his negociation. The princes wished to know what were the articles in their confession which Henry disliked; and they sent new ambassadors to him, who had orders both to negociate and to dispute. They endeavoured to convince the king that he was guilty of a mistake in administering the eucharist in one kind only, in allowing private masses, and in requiring the celibacy of the clergy (n). Henry would by no means acknowledge any error in these particulars; and was displeased that they should pretend to prescribe rules to so great a monarch and theologian. He found arguments and syllogisms enough to defend his cause; and he dismissed the ambassador without coming to any conclusion. He became jealous also, lest his own subjects should become such theologians as to question his tenets, and therefore used great precaution in publishing that translation of the scripture which was finished this year (o).

There was only one particular in which Henry was quite decisive; because he was there impelled by his avarice, or, more properly speaking, his rapacity, the consequence of his profusion: this measure was, as the monks had apprehended, the entire destruction of the monasteries. The present opportunity seemed favourable for that great enterprize, and as some of the abbots were suspected of having encouraged the insurrection in the northern counties, and of corresponding with the rebels, the king's resentment was farther incited by that motive. A new visitation was appointed of all the monasteries in England; and a pretence only being wanted for their suppression, it was easy for a prince, possessed of such unlimited power, and seconding the present humour of a great part of the nation, to find or feign one. The abbots and monks knew the danger to which they were exposed; and having learned, by the example of the lesser monasteries, that nothing could withstand the king's will, they were most of them induced, in expectation of better treatment, to make a voluntary resignation of their houses. Where promises failed of effect, menaces, and even extreme violence, were employed; and as several of the abbots since the breach with Rome had been named by the court with a view to this event, the king's intentions were the more easily effected. Some also, having secretly embraced the doctrine of the reformation, were glad to be freed from their vows; and on the whole, the design was conducted with such success, that in less than two years the king had got possession of all the revenues belonging to the various monasteries.

In several places, particularly in the county of Oxford, great interest was made to preserve some convents of women, who, as they lived in the most irreproachable manner, justly merited, it was thought, that their houses should be saved from the general destruction (p). There appeared also great difference between the case of nuns and that of friers; and the one institution might be laudable, while the other was exposed to much blame. The males of all ranks, if endowed with industry, might be of service to the public; and none of them could want employment suited to his station and capacity. But a woman of family who failed of a settlement in the marriage state, an accident to which such persons were more liable than women of lower station, had really no rank which she properly filled; and a convent was a retreat both honourable and agreeable, from the inutility and often want which attended her situation. But the king was determined to abolish monasteries of every denomination; and probably thought that these ancient establishments would be the sooner forgotten, if no remains of them of any kind were allowed to subsist in the kingdom. In order to reconcile the people to this great innovation, stories were propagated of the detestable lives of the friers in many of the convents; and great care was taken to defame those whom the court had determined to ruin (q). The reliques also, and other superstitions, which had so long been the object of the people's veneration, were exposed to their ridicule; and the religious spirit, now less bent on exterior observances and sensible objects, was encouraged in this new direction (r).

(o) He would only allow a copy of it to be deposited in some parish churches, where it was fixed by a chain: and he took care to inform the people by proclamation, "That this indulgence was not the effect of his duty, but of his goodness and his liberality to them; who therefore should use it moderately, for the increase of virtue, not of strife: and he ordered that no man should read the Bible aloud, so as to disturb the priest while he sang mass, nor presume to expound doubtful places without advice from the learned." In this measure, as well as in the rest, he halted half way between the Catholics and the Protestants.

John Staunton, the abbot, was incontinent both with a single and a married woman; and John Braunston with five married women.—Thurgarton, a priory. The prior has six sons; and he thanks God he never meddled with married women, but always made choice of maidens, the fairest that could be gotten."—Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials, vol. i.

(r) It is needless to be prolix in an enumeration of particulars: Protestant historians mention on this occasion, with great triumph, the sacred repositories of convents; the parings of St. Edmund's toes; some of the coals that roasted St. Laurence; the girdle of the Virgin, shewn in eleven several places; two or three heads of St. Ursula; the felt of St. Thomas of Lancaster, an infallible cure for the head-ach; part of St. Thomas à Becket's shirt, much reverenced by big-bellied women; some reliques, an excellent preventive against rain; others, a remedy to weeds in corn.

There were also discovered, or said to be discovered, in the monasteries, some impostures of a more artificial nature. At Hales in the county of Gloucester there had been shewn, during several ages, the blood

It appears on the whole, that the king at different times suppressed six hundred and forty-five monasteries: of which twenty-eight had abbots that enjoyed a seat in parliament. Ninety colleges were demolished in several counties; two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries and free chapels; a hundred and ten hospitals. The whole revenue of these establishments amounted to one hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred pounds (s). It is worthy of observation, that all the lands and possessions and revenue of England had a little before this period been rated at four millions a year; so that the revenues of the monks, even comprehending the lesser monasteries, did not exceed the twentieth part of the national income: a sum vastly inferior to what is commonly apprehended. The lands belonging to the convents were usually let at very low rents; and the farmers, who regarded themselves as a species of proprietors, took always care to renew their leases before they expired (t). Great murmurs were every where excited on account of these violences; and men much questioned whether priors and monks, who were only trustees or tenants for life, could, by any deed, however voluntary, transfer to the king the entire property of their estates. In order to reconcile the people to such mighty innovations, they were told that the king would never thenceforth have occasion to levy taxes, but would be able, from the abbey lands alone, to bear, during war as well as peace, the whole charges of government (u). While such topics were employed to appease the populace, Henry took an effectual method of interesting the nobility and gentry in the success of his measures (v): he either made a gift of the revenues of convents to his favourites and courtiers, or sold them at low prices, or exchanged them for other lands on very disadvantageous terms (w). He also settled pensions on the abbots and priors, proportioned to their former revenues or to their merits; and gave each monk a yearly pension of eight marks: he erected six new bishoprics, Westminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester; of which five subsist at this day: and by all these means of expence and dissipation the profit which the king reaped by the seizure of church lands fell much short of vulgar opinion. As the ruin of convents had been foreseen some years before it happened, the monks had taken care to secrete most of their stock, furniture, and plate; so that the spoils of the great monasteries bore not in these respects any proportion to those of the lesser.

Exclusive of the lands possessed by the monasteries, the regular clergy enjoyed a considerable part of the benefices of England, and of the tithes annexed to them; and these were also at this time transferred to the crown, and by that means passed into the hands of laymen: an abuse which many zealous churchmen regarded as the most criminal sacrilege. The monks were formerly much at their ease in England, and enjoyed revenues which exceeded the regular and stated expence of the house (x).

It is easy to imagine the indignation with which the intelligence of all these acts of violence was received at Rome; and how much the ecclesiastics of that court, who had so long kept the world in subjection by high sounding epithets, and by holy execrations, would now vent their rhetoric against the character and conduct of Henry. The pope was at last incited to publish the bull which had been passed against that monarch; and in a public manner he delivered over his soul to the devil, and his dominions to the first invader. Libels were dispersed, in which he was anew compared to the most furious persecutors in antiquity; blood of Christ brought from Jerusalem; and it is easy to imagine the veneration with which such a relique was regarded. A miraculous circumstance also attended this miraculous relique; the sacred blood was not visible to any one in mortal sin, even when set before him; and till he had performed good works sufficient for his absolution, it would not deign to discover itself to him. At the dissolution of the monastery the whole contrivance was detected. Two of the monks who were let into the secret had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week: they put it in a phial, one side of which consisted of thin and transparent crystal, the other of thick and opaque. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were sure to shew him the dark side of the phial, till masses and offerings had expiated his offences; and then finding his money, or patience, or faith, nearly exhausted, they made him happy by turning the phial. Herbert, p. 431, 432. Stowe, p. 575. To these precious relics may be added, several pieces of the Holy Cross; Christ's coat; the Virgin Mary's chemise, and some of her milk.

A miraculous crucifix had been kept at Boxley in Kent, and bore the appellation of the Rood of Grace. The lips, and eyes, and head of the image moved on the approach of its votaries. Hilsey, bishop of Rochester, broke the crucifix at St. Paul's Cross, and shewed to the whole people the springs and wheels by which it had been secretly moved. A great wooden idol revered in Wales, called Darvel Gatherin, was also brought to London, and cut in pieces: and, by a cruel refinement in vengeance, it was employed as fuel to burn frier Forest, who was punished for denying the supremacy, and for some pretended heresies.—Goodwin's Annals. Stowe, p. 575. Herbert. Baker, p. 286. A finger of St. Andrew, covered with a thin plate of silver, had been pawned by a convent for a debt of forty pounds; but as the king's commissioners refused to pay the debt, people made themselves merry with the poor creditor on account of his pledge.

But of all the instruments of ancient superstition no one was so zealously destroyed as the shrine of Thomas à Becket. This saint owed his canonization to the zealous defence which he had made for clerical privileges; and on that account also the monks had extremely encouraged the devotion of pilgrimages towards his tomb; and numberless were the miracles which they pretended his reliques wrought in favour of his devout votaries. They raised his body once a year; and the day on which this ceremony was performed, which was called the day of his translation, was a general holiday: every fiftieth year there was celebrated a jubilee to his honour, which lasted fifteen days: plenary indulgences were then granted to all that visited his tomb; and a hundred thousand pilgrims have been registered at a time in Canterbury. The devotion towards him had quite effaced in that place the adoration of the Deity; nay, even that of the Virgin. At God's altar, for instance, there were offered in one year three pounds two shillings and six pence; at the Virgin's, sixty-three pounds five shillings and six pence; at St. Thomas's, eight hundred and thirty-two pounds twelve shillings and three pence. But next year the disproportion was still greater: there was not a penny offered at God's altar; the Virgin's gained only four pounds one shilling and eight pence; but St. Thomas had got, for his share, nine hundred and fifty-four pounds six shillings and three pence. Burnet, vol. i. p. 244. Lewis VII. of France had made a pilgrimage to this miraculous tomb, and had bestowed on the shrine a jewel, esteemed the richest in Christendom. It is evident how noxious to Henry a saint of this character must appear, and how contrary to all his projects for degrading the authority of the court of Rome. He not only pillaged the rich shrine dedicated to St. Thomas: he made the saint himself be cited to appear in court, and be tried and condemned as a traitor: he ordered his name to be struck out of the calendar; the office for his festival to be expunged from all breviaries; his bones to be burned, and the ashes to be thrown in the air. *Burnet. (t) There is a curious passage with regard to the suppression of monasteries to be found in Coke's Institutes, 4th Inst. chap. i. p. 44. It is worth transcribing, as it shews the ideas of the English government, entertained during the reign of Henry VIII. and even in the time of sir Edward Coke, when he wrote his Institutes. It clearly appears that the people had then little notion of being jealous of their liberties, were desirous of making the crown quite independent, and wished only to remove from themselves, as much as possible, the burthens of government. A large standing army, and a fixed revenue, would on these conditions have been regarded as great blessings; and it was owing entirely to the prodigality of Henry, and to his little suspicion that the power of the crown could ever fail, that the English owe all their present liberty. The title of the chapter in Coke is, Advice concerning new and plausible Projects and Offers in Parliament. "When any plausible project," says he, "is made in parliament, to draw the lords and commons to assent to any act (especially in matters of weight and importance), if both houses do give upon the matter projected and promised their consent, it shall be most necessary, they being trusted for the commonwealth, to have the matter projected and promised (which moved the houses to consent) to be established in the same act, lest the benefit of the act be taken, and the matter projected and promised never performed, and so the houses of parliament perform not the trust reposed in them, as it fell out (taking one example for many) in the reign of Henry the Eighth: on the king's behalf, the members of both houses were informed in parliament, that no king or kingdom was safe but where the king had three abilities: 1. To live of his own, and able to defend his kingdom upon any sudden invasion or insurrection. 2. To aid his confederates, otherwise they would never assist him. 3. To reward his well-deserving servants. Now the project was, that if the parliament would give unto him all the abbies, priories, friaries, nunneries, and other monasteries, that for ever in time then to come, he would take order that the same should not be converted to private uses; but first, that his exchequer, for the purposes aforesaid, should be enriched; secondly, the kingdom strengthened by a continual maintenance of forty thousand well-trained soldiers, with skilful captains and commanders; thirdly, for the benefit and ease of the subject, who never afterwards (as was projected,) in any time to come, should be charged with subsidies, fifteenths, loans, or other common aids; fourthly, lest the honour of the realm should receive any diminution of honour by the dissolution of the said monasteries, there being twenty-nine lords of parliament of the abbots and priors (that held of the king per baroniam, whereof more in the next leaf,) that the king would create a number of nobles, which we omit. The said monasteries were given to the king by authority of divers acts of parliament, but no provision was therein made for the said project, or any part thereof."

(u) Coke's 4th Inst. fol. 44. (v) Dugdale's Warwickshire, p. 800.

(w) Fuller informs us, that he was so profuse in these liberalities, that he is said to have given a woman the whole revenue of a convent, as a reward for making a pudding which happened to gratify his palate.

(x) We read of the abbey of Chertsey, in Surrey, which possessed seven hundred and forty-four pounds a year, though it contained only fourteen monks: that of Furnese, in the county of Lincoln, was valued at nine hundred and sixty pounds a year, and contained about thirty. Burnet, vol. i. p. 237. In order to dissipate their revenues, and support popularity, the monks lived in a hospitable manner; and besides the poor maintained from their offals, there were many decayed gentlemen, who passed their lives in travelling from convent to convent, and were entirely subsisted at the tables of the friers. By this hospitality, as much as by their own inactivity, did the convents prove nurseries of idleness; but the king, not to give offence by too sudden an innovation, bound the new proprietors of abbey lands to support the ancient hospitality. But this engagement was fulfilled in very few places, and for a very short time.

and the preference was now given to their side: he had declared war with the dead, whom the pagans themselves respected; was at open hostility with heaven; and had engaged in professed enmity with the whole host of saints and angels. Above all, he was often reproached with his resemblance to the emperor Julian, whom it was said he imitated in his apostacy and learning, though he fell short of him in morals. Henry could distinguish in some of these libels the style and animosity of his kinsman Pole; and he was thence incited to vent his rage by every possible expedient on that famous cardinal.

Reginald de la Pole, or Reginald Pole, was descended from the royal family, being fourth son of the countess of Salisbury, daughter of the duke of Clarence. He gave, in early youth, indications of that fine genius and generous disposition by which during his whole life he was so much distinguished; and Henry, having conceived great friendship for him, intended to raise him to the highest ecclesiastical dignities; and, as a pledge of future favours, he conferred on him the deanery of Exeter (y), the better to support him in his education. Pole was carrying on his studies in the university of Paris at the time when the king solicited the suffrages of that learned body in favour of his divorce; but though applied to by the English agent, he declined taking any part in the affair. Henry bore this neglect with more temper than was natural to him; and he appeared unwilling, on that account, to renounce all friendship with a person whose virtues and talents he hoped would prove useful as well as ornamental to his court and kingdom. He allowed him still to possess his deanery, and gave him permission to finish his studies at Padua: he even paid him some court, in order to bring him into his measures; and wrote to him while in that university, desiring him to give his opinion freely with regard to the late measures taken in England for abolishing the papal authority. Pole had now contracted an intimate friendship with all persons eminent for dignity or merit in Italy, Sadolet, Bembo, and other revivers of true taste and learning; and he was moved by these connections, as well as by religious zeal, to forget in some respect the duty which he owed to Henry, his benefactor and his sovereign. He replied, by writing a treatise of The Unity of the Church, in which he inveighed against the king's supremacy, his divorce, his second marriage; and he even exhorted the emperor to revenge on him the injury done to the Imperial family, and to the Catholic cause. Henry, though provoked beyond measure at this outrage, dissembled his resentment; and he sent a message to Pole, desiring him to return to England, in order to explain certain passages in his book, which he found somewhat obscure and difficult. Pole was on his guard against this insidious invitation; and was determined to remain in Italy, where he was universally beloved.

The pope and emperor thought themselves obliged to provide for a man of Pole's eminence and dignity, who in support of their cause had sacrificed all his pretensions to fortune in his own country. He was created a cardinal; and though he took not higher orders than those of a deacon, he was sent legate into Flanders about the year 1536 (z). Henry was sensible that Pole's chief intention, in chusing that employment, was to foment the mutinous disposition of the English Catholics; and he therefore remonstrated in so vigorous a manner with the queen of Hungary, regent of the Low Countries, that she dismissed the legate, without allowing him to exercise his functions. The enmity which he bore to Pole was now as open as it was violent; and the cardinal on his part kept no farther measures in his intrigues against Henry. He is even suspected of having aspired to the crown, by means of a marriage with the lady Mary; and the king was every day more alarmed by informations which he received of the correspondence maintained in England by that fugitive. Courtney, marquis of Exeter, had entered into a conspiracy with him; sir Edward Nevil, brother to the lord Abergavenny; sir Nicholas Carew, master of horse and knight of the garter; Henry de la Pole, lord Montacute; and sir Geoffrey de la Pole, brothers to the cardinal. These persons were indicted and tried and convicted before lord Audley, who presided in the trial as high steward: they were all executed except sir Geoffrey de la Pole, who was pardoned, in consequence of his having dishonourably betrayed his friends, by carrying to the king secret intelligence of the conspiracy. We know little concerning the justice or iniquity of the sentence pronounced against these men: we only know, that the condemnation of a man who was at that time prosecuted by the court forms no presumption of his guilt; though, as no historian of credit mentions in the present case any complaint occasioned by these trials, we may presume that sufficient evidence was produced against the marquis of Exeter and his associates. Two priests and a seaman were likewise tried for their concern in the treasonable proceedings of the Poles; and being condemned, suffered the punishment of treason in its full rigour (a).

Henry was well adapted to rend asunder those bands by which the ancient superstition had fastened itself on the kingdom; and though, after renouncing the pope's supremacy, and suppressing monasteries, most of the political ends of reformation were already attained, few people expected that he would stop at those innovations. The spirit of opposition, it was thought, would carry him to the utmost extremities against the church of Rome, and lead him to declare war against the whole doctrine and worship, as well as discipline, of that hierarchy. He had formerly appealed from the pope to a general council; but now, when a general council was summoned to meet at Mantua, he renounced all submission to it, as summoned by the pope, and lying entirely under subjection to that spiritual usurper. He engaged his clergy to make a declaration to the like purpose; and he had prescribed to them many other deviations from ancient tenets and practices. Cranmer took advantage of every opportunity to carry him on in this course; and while queen Jane lived, who favoured the reformers, he had, by means of her insinuation and address, been successful in his endeavours. After her death, Gardiner, who was returned from his embassy to France, kept the king more in suspense; and, by feigning an unlimited submission to his will, was frequently able to guide him to his own purposes. Fox, bishop of Hereford, had supported Cranmer in his schemes for a more thorough reformation; but his death had made way for the promotion of Bonner, who, though he had hitherto seemed a furious enemy to the court of Rome, was determined to sacrifice every thing to present interest, and had joined the confederacy of Gardiner, and the partizans of the Romish faith. Gardiner himself, it was believed, had secretly entered into measures with the pope, and even with the emperor; and in concert with these powers he endeavoured to preserve, as much as possible, the ancient faith and mode of worship.

Henry was so much governed by passion, that nothing could have retarded his animosity and opposition against Rome, but some other passion which stopped his career, and raised him new objects of animosity. Though he had gradually, since the commencement of his scruples with regard to his first marriage, been changing the tenets of that theological system in which he had been educated, he was no less positive and dogmatical in the few articles which remained to him, than if the whole fabric had continued entire and unshaken. And though he stood alone in his opinion, the flattery of courtiers had so inflamed his tyrannical arrogance, that he thought himself entitled to regulate, by his own particular standard, the religious faith of the whole nation. The point on which he chiefly rested his orthodoxy happened to be the real presence; that very doctrine in which, among the numberless victories of superstition over common sense, her triumph is the most signal and egregious. All departure from this principle he held to be heretical and detestable; and nothing, he thought, would be more honourable for him, than while he broke off all connexions with the Roman pontiff, to maintain in this essential article the purity of the catholic faith.

There was one John Nicholson, called also Lambert (b), a schoolmaster in London, who had been questioned and confined for unsound opinions by archbishop Warham; but upon the death of that prelate, and the change of counsels at court, he had been released. Not terrified with the danger which he had incurred, he still continued to promulgate his tenets; and having heard Dr. Taylor, afterwards bishop of Lincoln, defend in a sermon the corporal presence, he could not forbear expressing to Taylor his dissent from that doctrine; and he drew up his objections under ten several heads. Taylor communicated the paper to Dr. Barnes, who happened to be a Lutheran, and who maintained, that though the substance of bread and wine remained in the sacrament, yet the real body and blood of Christ were there also, and were in a certain mysterious manner incorporated with the material elements. By the present laws and practice Barnes was no less exposed to the stake than Lambert; yet such was the persecuting rage which prevailed, that he determined to bring this man to condign punishment; because in their common departure from the ancient faith he had dared to go one step farther than himself. He engaged Taylor to accuse Lambert before Cranmer and Latimer, who, whatever their private opinion might be on these points, were obliged to conform themselves to the standard of orthodoxy established by Henry. When Lambert was cited before these prelates, they endeavoured to bend him to a recantation; and they were surprised when, instead of complying, he ventured to appeal to the king.

(a) See Lord Herbert's Henry VIII. and Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 358.—Besides a correspondence with Pole, reproachful expressions against the king were imputed to some of these sufferers. Lord Montacute had been heard to say, that "Cardinal Wolsey would have been an honest man, if he had had an honest master." Sir Edward Nevil was charged with having said, that "the king was a beast, and worse than a beast." One of the priests had prophesied, that, "the king would hang in hell one day, for the plucking down of abbeys."

The king, not displeased with an opportunity where he could at once exert his supremacy, and display his learning, accepted the appeal; and resolved to mix, in a very unfair manner, the magistrate with the disputant. Public notice was given that he intended to enter the lists with the schoolmaster: scaffolds were erected in Westminster-hall for the accommodation of the audience: Henry appeared on his throne, accompanied with all the ensigns of majesty: the prelates were placed on his right hand; the temporal peers on his left: the judges and most eminent lawyers had a place assigned them behind the bishops; the courtiers of greatest distinction behind the peers: and in the midst of this splendid assembly was produced the unhappy Lambert, who was required to defend his opinions against his royal antagonist (c).

The bishop of Chichester opened the conference, by saying, "that Lambert, being charged with heretical pravity, had appealed from his bishop to the king; as if he expected more favour from this application, and as if the king could ever be induced to protect a heretic: that though his majesty had thrown off the usurpations of the see of Rome; had disincorporated some idle monks, who lived like drones in a bee-hive; had abolished the idolatrous worship of images; had published the Bible in English, for the instruction of all his subjects; and had made some lesser alterations, which every one must approve of; yet was he determined to maintain the purity of the catholic faith, and to punish with the utmost severity all departure from it: and that he had taken the present opportunity, before so learned and grave an audience, of convincing Lambert of his errors; but if he still continued obstinate in them, he must expect the most condign punishment (d)".

After this preamble, which was not very encouraging, the king asked Lambert, with a stern countenance, what his opinion was of Christ's corporal presence in the sacrament of the altar; and when Lambert began his reply with some compliment to his majesty, he rejected the praise with disdain and indignation. He afterwards pressed Lambert with arguments drawn from scripture and the schoolmen: the audience applauded the force of his reasoning and the extent of his erudition: Cranmer seconded his proofs by some new topics: Gardiner entered the lists as a support to Cranmer: Tonstal took up the argument after Gardiner: Stokesley brought fresh aid to Tonstal: six bishops more appeared successively in the field after Stokesley: and the disputation, if it deserves the name, was prolonged for five hours; till Lambert, fatigued, confounded, brow-beaten, and abashed, was at last reduced to silence. The king then, returning to the charge, asked him whether he were convinced? and he proposed, as a concluding argument, this interesting question, Whether he were resolved to live or to die? Lambert, who possessed that courage which consists in obstinacy, replied, that he cast himself wholly on his majesty's clemency: the king told him that he would be no protector of heretics; and therefore if that were his final answer, he must expect to be committed to the flames. Cromwell, as vicegerent, pronounced the sentence against him (e).

Lambert, whose vanity had probably incited him the more to persevere on account of the greatness of this public appearance, was not daunted by the terrors of the punishment to which he was condemned. His executioners took care to make the sufferings of a man who had personally opposed the king, as cruel as possible: he was burned at a slow fire; his legs and thighs were consumed to the stumps; and when there appeared no end to his torments, some of the guards, more merciful than the rest, lifted him on their halberts, and threw him into the flames, where he was consumed. While they were employed in this friendly office, he cried aloud several times, "None but Christ, none but Christ;" and these words were in his mouth when he expired (f). A prince of magnanimity would have pardoned this man; but Henry very rarely exercised that generous quality.

Some few days before the execution of Lambert, four Dutch anabaptists, three men and a woman, had faggots tied to their backs at Paul's Cross, and were burned in that manner. And a man and a woman of the same sect and country were burned in Smithfield (g).

By an act which was passed by the parliament, assembled in 1539, the king's authority, as head of the church was greatly increased, by the infliction of additional severities in cases of religion. Henry had been reprobated as an heretic and an apostate by some of the princes of the continent; and these reflexions he pretended so hurt his feelings, that he resolved to disprove the calumny by evincing his attachment to the chief doctrines of the Romish church. The chancellor having acquainted the peers with his majesty's desire of establishing an unity of religious sentiments, a committee was appointed to examine controverted opinions, and frame such articles as were most consistent with the genuine faith. Violent debates ensued among the members of the committee; insomuch that, after a discussion of ten days, they came to no agreement. The duke of Norfolk, who had been tutored by the king, now proposed six articles for the deliberation of the whole house; and when some days had been employed in the examination of them, the king himself assisting in a debate so congenial with his talents, a bill was prepared, and carried through both houses by the royal influence. It was entitled "An Act for abolishing Diversity of Opinion in certain Articles concerning the Christian Religion." The points which it enforced were these: that, in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, no substance of bread and wine remained; but under these forms, the natural body and blood of Christ were present: that the communion, in both kinds, (that is, both in the bread and wine,) was not necessary for salvation to all persons: that priests were prohibited by the law of God from marrying: that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that the use of private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession was expedient and necessary. It was enacted, that whoever should speak, preach, or write, against the first article, should be adjudged an heretic, and burned alive, without even the privilege of abjuration; that all who should obstinately persist in opposing the other articles should suffer death as felons, without benefit of clergy; that the mere declaration of an opinion against them should be punished, in the first instance, with imprisonment and forfeiture, and, in the second, with death; that the marriages of priests were null, and that such as should still continue to cohabit with the women whom they had married, should suffer death as felons; that, if they should be guilty of fornication or adultery, they should forfeit their property and be imprisoned on the first conviction, and, on the second, be put to death, the women being punished in the same manner; that all who should abstain from confession, or from the eucharist, at the accustomed times, should forfeit and be confined on the first proof of neglect, and be put to death for the second. Commissioners were appointed to superintend the execution of this act in the different counties; and the delinquents were to have the benefit of a jury. To make it generally known, and impress it on the minds of the people, it was ordered to be read once a quarter in every church throughout the kingdom (h).

(e) Collier, in his Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 152. has preserved an account which Cromwell gave of this conference, in a letter to sir Thomas Wyat, the king's ambassador in Germany. "The king's majesty," says Cromwell, "for the reverence of the holy sacrament of the altar, did sit openly in his hall, and there presided at the disputation, process and judgement of a miserable heretic sacramentary, who was burned the 20th of November, [1538.] It was a wonder to see how princely, with how excellent gravity and inestimable majesty his highness exercised there the very office of supreme head of the church of England. How benignly his grace essayed to convert the miserable man: how strong and manifest reasons his highness alleged against him. I wish the princes and potentates of Christendom to have had a meet place to have seen it. Undoubtedly they should have much marvelled at his majesty's most high wisdom and judgement, and reputed him no otherwise after the same, than in a manner the mirror and light of all other kings and princes in Christendom." It was by such flatteries that Henry was engaged to make his sentiments the standard to all mankind; and was determined to enforce, by the severest penalties, his strong and manifest reasons for transubstantiation.

Archbishop Cranmer strenuously opposed this infamous act in its progress through the house of peers; and, as the king had a great esteem for that prelate, he did not resent his conduct. The primate had married the niece of Osiander, an eminent German Protestant divine; but, as the act had rendered it capital for him to keep his wife, he dismissed her without hesitation. Latimer and Shaxton, bishops of Worcester and Salisbury, resigned their sees, that they might not be obliged to enforce a statute which they detested. Having ventured to express their objections to some of the articles, they were committed to prison, where they remained for a considerable time. About five hundred persons are said to have been apprehended for an infringement of this act; but the remonstrances of Cranmer and Cromwell procured an order from the king for the release of those noxious individuals, who thus, for a time, escaped the malice of their Popish accusers. It does not appear that this statute was executed with rigour before the ruin of the vicar-general, whose attachment to the reformed doctrines, and whose moderation of character, prompted him to mitigate the severity of his sovereign's zeal (i).

It is well known that the clergy have commonly made a concern for their temporal interests go hand in hand with a jealousy for orthodoxy; and both these passions have been regarded by the people, ignorant and superstitious, as proofs of zeal for religion: but the violent and headstrong character of Henry now disjoined these objects. Indeed it is difficult to say whether Henry derived greater satisfaction from the gratification of his rapacity by plundering the church, or from that of his bigotry and arrogance by the persecution of those whom he was pleased to term heretics. Though he engaged the parliament to mitigate the penalties of the Six Articles, so far as regarded the marriage of priests, which was now only subjected to a forfeiture of goods, chattels, and lands, during life; he was still bent on maintaining a rigid purity in speculative principles. He had appointed a commission, consisting of the two archbishops, of Canterbury and York, with the bishops of both provinces, together with a considerable number of doctors of divinity; and by virtue of his ecclesiastical supremacy, he had given them in charge to choose a religion for his people. Before the commissioners had made any progress in this arduous undertaking, the parliament, in 1541, had passed a law, by which they ratified all the tenets which these divines should thereafter establish with the king's consent: and they were not ashamed of declaring that they took their religion upon trust, and had no other rule, in spiritual as well as temporal concerns, than the arbitrary will of their tyrannical master. There is only one clause of the statute which may seem at first sight to savour somewhat of the spirit of liberty: it was enacted, That the ecclesiastical commissioners should establish nothing repugnant to the laws and statutes of the realm. But in reality this proviso was inserted by the king, to serve his own purposes. By introducing a confusion and contradiction into the laws, he became more master of every one's life and property. And as the ancient independence of the church still gave him jealousy, he was well pleased, under cover of such a clause, to promote appeals from the spiritual to the civil courts. It was for a like reason that he would never promulgate a body of canon law; and he encouraged the judges on all occasions to interpose in ecclesiastical causes, wherever they thought the law of royal prerogative concerned.

The king, armed by the authority of parliament, or rather by their acknowledgement of that spiritual supremacy which he believed inherent in him, employed his commissioners to select a system of tenets for the assent and belief of the nation. A small volume was soon after published, called "The Institution of a Christian Man," which was received by the convocation, and voted to be the standard of orthodoxy. All the delicate points of Justification, Faith, Free-will, Good Works, and Grace, are there defined, with a leaning towards the opinion of the Reformers: the sacraments, which a few years before were only allowed to be three, were now increased to the number of seven, conformably to the sentiments of the Catholics. The king's caprice and folly is discernible throughout the whole, and the book is in reality to be regarded as his composition; for Henry, while he made his opinion a rule for the nation, would tie his own hands by no canon or authority, not even by any which he himself had formerly established.

The people had occasion, soon after, to see a farther instance of the king's inconstancy. He was not long satisfied with his "Institution of a Christian Man;" and therefore ordered a new book to be composed, called the "Erudition of a Christian Man;" and, without asking the assent of the convocation, he published, by his own authority, and that of the parliament, this new model of orthodoxy. It differs from the Institution (k); but the king was no less positive in his new creed than he had been in the old; and he required the belief of the nation to veer about at his signal. In both these compositions he was particularly careful to inculcate the doctrine of passive obedience; and he was equally careful to retain the nation in the practice of that doctrine.

While Henry was spreading his own books among the people, he seems to have been extremely perplexed, as were also the clergy, what course to take with the Scriptures. A review had been made by the synod, of the new translation of the Bible; and Gardiner had proposed, that instead of employing English expressions throughout, several Latin words should still be preserved; because they contained, as he pretended, such peculiar energy and significance, that they had no correspondent terms in the vulgar tongue (l). Among these were, ecclesia, pœnitentia, pontifex, contritus, holocausta, sacramentum, elementa, ceremonia, mysterium, presbyter, sacrificium, humilitas, satisfactio, peccatum, gratia, hostia, charitas, &c. But as this mixture would have appeared extremely barbarous, and was plainly calculated for no other purpose than to retain the people in their ancient ignorance, the proposal was rejected. The knowledge of the people, however, at least their disputative turn, seemed to be an inconvenience still more dangerous; and the king and the parliament, which met on the 22nd of January, 1543, soon after the publication of the Scriptures, retracted the concession which they had formerly made; and prohibited all but gentlemen and merchants from perusing them (m). Even that liberty was not granted without an apparent hesitation, and a dread of the consequences: these persons were allowed to read, "so it be done quietly and with good order." And the preamble to the act sets forth, "That many seditious and ignorant persons had abused the liberty granted them of reading the Bible, and that great diversity of opinion, animosities, tumults, and schisms, had been occasioned by perverting the sense of the Scriptures." It seemed very difficult to reconcile the king's model for uniformity with the permission of free inquiry.

The mass-book also passed under the king's revisal; and little alteration was as yet made in it: some doubtful or fictitious saints only were struck out; and the name of the pope was erazed. This latter precaution was likewise used with regard to every new book that was printed, or even old book that was sold; the word Pope was carefully omitted or blotted out (n); as if that precaution could abolish the term from the language, or as if such a persecution of it did not rather imprint it more strongly in the memory of the people.

The king took care about this time to clear the churches from another abuse which had creeped into them. Plays, interludes, and farces were there often acted in derision of the former superstitions; and the reverence of the multitude for ancient principles and modes of worship was thereby gradually effaced (o). We do not hear that the catholics attempted to retaliate, by employing this powerful engine against their adversaries, or endeavoured by like arts to expose that fanatical spirit by which it appears

There were but five hundred copies printed of this first authorized edition of the Bible; a book of which there are now several millions of copies in the kingdom, and which is always reprinting at Oxford, Cambridge, or Edinburgh.

the reformers were frequently actuated. Perhaps the people were not disposed to relish a jest on that side: perhaps the greater simplicity and the more spiritual abstract worship of the Protestants, gave less hold to ridicule, which is commonly founded on sensible representations. It was, therefore, a very agreeable concession which the king made to the Catholic party, to suppress entirely these religious comedies.

Thus Henry laboured incessantly, by arguments, creeds, and penal statutes, to bring his subjects to a uniformity in their religious sentiments: but as he entered himself with the greatest earnestness into all those scholastic disputes, he encouraged the people, by his example, to apply themselves to the study of theology; and it was in vain afterwards to expect, however present fear might restrain their tongues or pens, that they would cordially agree in any set of tenets prescribed to them by any king, or by any set of men appointed by him.

In the year 1543, it was enacted, (34 and 35 Henry VIII. cap. 1.) that any spiritual person, who preached or taught contrary to the doctrine contained in the king's book, called "The Erudition of a Christian Man," or contrary to any doctrine which he should thereafter promulgate, was to be admitted, on the first conviction, to renounce his error: on the second, he was required to carry a faggot; which, if he refused to do, or fell into a third offence, he was to be burned. But the laity, for the third offence, were only to forfeit their goods and chattels, and be liable to perpetual imprisonment. Indictments were to be laid within a year after the offence; and the prisoner was allowed—a wonderful indulgence!—to bring witnesses for his exculpation. These penalties were higher than those which were formerly imposed on those who denied the real presence of Christ in the sacramental elements. It was, however, subjoined in this statute, that the act of the Six Articles was still in force. But in order to render the people still greater slaves to their tyrant, it was enacted, that the king might hereafter, at his pleasure, change this act, or any provision in it. By this clause the king was invested, so far as religion was concerned, with the sole legislative authority in this kingdom; and all his subjects were, under the severest penalties, expressly bound to receive the dictates of his capricious and arrogant temper as law.

CHAP. V.

EDWARD VI.

THIS youthful monarch was the only son of Henry VIII. and his third queen Jane Seymour; and was born at Hampton Court, on the 17th of October, 1537. Being of a delicate and sickly constitution, he was tenderly nursed by women till he was six years old; when he was placed under the care of sir Anthony Cook; Dr. Cox, of Eton, was to teach him politeness, philosophy, and divinity; sir John Cheeke, professor of Greek at Cambridge, was to instruct him in Latin and Greek; and Mr. John Belman, was to teach him French, Spanish, and Italian. His progress in learning was so rapid, having an excellent memory, that at eight years of age he wrote Latin letters to his father; spoke French as fluently as English; and was afterwards even able to converse in Latin, Greek, Spanish, and Italian. At the age of fifteen he had made so great a progress in the arts of logic, music, astronomy, and other liberal sciences, that Cardan, the celebrated Italian philosopher, called him the wonder of his age, and a "miracle of nature."

At the death of his tyrannical father, Edward was only nine years and three months old; at which time great preparations were making to declare him Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Count Palatine of Chester. At this juncture he was with his sister the princess Elizabeth, at Hertford, where the deputies and messengers on his father's death, (Edward, earl of Hertford, and sir Anthony Brown,) were sent by the privy council to bring the young king to London. They did not, however, inform him of the nature of their mission till they were arrived at Enfield, in their way to the metropolis, when they mentioned the king's death to him, and paid their homage to him as their sovereign. On the following day, January 31, 1547, they arrived in London, and conducted him to the Tower, where the council in a body received him, and proclaimed him king of England the same day.

We have before mentioned that Henry, by virtue of an act of parliament, had not only settled the succession of the crown on this prince, by will, but that he had also appointed him a privy council. In pursuance of this act these counsellors met on the first of February, and opened the will; when they found, that the king had nominated Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury; lord Wriothesley, lord high chancellor; lord St John, master of the household; lord Russel, privy seal; Edward, earl of Hertford, chamberlain; viscount Lisle, lord admiral; Cuthbert Tunstal, bishop of Durham; sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse; sir William Paget, secretary of state; sir Edward North, chancellor of the court of augmentations; sir Edward Montague, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas; judge Bromley, sir Anthony Denny, and sir William Herbert, chief gentlemen of the privy chamber; sir Edward Wotton, treasurer of Calais; and Dr. Wotton, dean of Canterbury and York; to be regents of the kingdom, and governors of his son, till he should attain the age of eighteen years. These with twelve more assistants, who were likewise named in the will, to be called in, as need required, to the privy council, took upon them to settle the form of government during the king's minority; which was no sooner done, than a proposal was made to nominate and constitute one of their body, to be their head and president, with the title of Protector of the King's Realm, and Governor of his Person. How reasonable soever this change seemed to the majority of the council for the dispatch of business, the lord chancellor Wriothesley fearing, as indeed it happened, that the choice would fall on the king's uncle, Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, who was not his friend, which would absolutely deprive him of that sway in the government, which otherwise he might have expected from his high office, it being next under the archbishop of Canterbury, (a prelate who did not much attend to secular affairs,) opposed this proposal with all his might, as an alteration not warranted by the king's will, and contrary to the meaning of the act of parliament. To this it was answered, that such a necessary promotion of one of their own body would by no means change the form of government then established; for that whoever should be raised over the rest, should be obliged "to do nothing without the consent of the other regents." The choice, as Wriothesley dreaded, fell upon the earl of Hertford, who was accordingly proclaimed Protector of the Realm, and Governor of the King's Person, until he should arrive at the age of eighteen years; and on the 6th of the same month (February), he exercised the first act of his high power and authority, by conferring the dignity of knighthood upon the king himself, in the presence of the lord mayor of London, and many other lords and gentlemen: and the king, rising up under his cloth of state, conferred the same honour on Henry (Burnet say John) Hoblethorn, the lord mayor of London; which also appears to be the first act of sovereignty done by king Edward the Sixth.

The next care of the council was (according to an ancient manuscript) not to take care of their own promotions, but of the funeral of their late king, which was performed with great solemnity at Windsor, where king Henry the Eighth was interred on the 15th of February, in the midst of the choir of that stately church. Two days after the funeral, and previous to the coronation of Edward, the regents and counsellors, received their respective titles, and pensions to support their new dignities, conformable to a promise and plan that had been laid down by the late king just before his departure from this life. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, and Protector, was created duke of Somerset; William Parr, earl of Essex, marquis of Northampton; lord Dudley, viscount Lisle, earl of Warwick; lord chancellor Wriothesley, earl of Southampton; Thomas Seymour, brother to the protector, and one of the council, was created lord Sudley; and sir Edward Rich, sir William Willoughby, and sir Edmund Sheffield, also of the council, were advanced to the dignity of barons of the realm. At the same time the protector procured for himself the high offices of lord treasurer and earl marshal, vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk, then under sentence of death; and the office of lord high admiral of England for his brother Thomas. Lord Russel was empowered by patent to exercise the office of lord high steward, on the approaching day of the king's coronation; and Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by another patent, was constituted high constable for the services of the same day.

Two days after these promotions were settled, king Edward ward was conducted from the Tower, (where he had remained,) in great state through the city of London, to his palace at Westminster; where the day following he was crowned king of England, by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by other bishops, and all the chief nobility of the realm. Upon this occasion his majesty made forty knights of the Bath, and fifty-five knights of the Garter: and a free pardon was granted and proclaimed throughout all his dominions, for all persons that were guilty of any crimes, except the duke of Norfolk, cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldest son of the marquis of Exeter, (lately beheaded,) Mr. Throgmorton, Mr. Fortescue, and Dr. Richard Pate; who having been bishop of Worcester in his father's reign, had some years before withdrawn to Rome, rather than acknowledge the king's supremacy over the church of England.

The coronation was solemnized with the greatest demonstrations of joy by the people, as well as by the regents and counsellors: but the secret enmity which had taken place between the protector's family, and that of the lord chancellor Wriothesley, in a few days broke out in a violent flame; which soon after ruined the affairs of the latter, and, in the end, proved the ruin of the protector also. The chancellor, who was a restless, obstinate, proud, imperious person, could not bear the least controul of a fellow subject; and from the time of the protector's elevation, he had formed the resolution of making him uneasy in that high station, and determined to oppose all his measures. That he might give himself up entirely to the affairs of the cabinet, he, without any warrant from the king, the lord protector, or other regents, did, on the 18th of February, put the Great Seal to a commission, directed to the master of the rolls, and three masters in Chancery, empowering them to execute the lord chancellor's office in the court of Chancery, in as ample a manner as if he himself were present. This arbitrary act was declared illegal by the judges, who gave it as their opinion, that he had thereby forfeited his place, and was liable to fine and imprisonment at the king's pleasure. This was sufficient for his enemies to get clear of so disagreeable a competitor in power: and when the opinion of the judges was communicated to him in full council, he behaved with so much passion towards the judges, and indecency and haughtiness to the council, regents, and protector, defending his own power, and calling their's and the protectorship in question, that he provoked them to use him with the greater severity. Accordingly he was committed to custody in his own house, and commanded not to stir from thence till further orders. The council then came to this resolution: To deprive him of the chancellorship, and to keep him under arrest, to prevent his attendance in the regency, from which they did not presume to displace him, as he sat there by the same authority by which they themselves acted. The seals were given to sir William Pawlet, lord St. John, till another chancellor should be appointed: and the earl of Southampton was not released from his confinement, till the 29th of June; when he entered into a recognizance of four thousand pounds to pay what fine they should think fit to impose upon him,

How grateful soever the disgrace and removal of this great man was to the protector, it proved a stumbling block to himself: for, believing now he was at full liberty to controul the council of his sovereign, he thought of nothing less than to engross the sole management of affairs into his own power; which first drew upon him the resentment of the nation, and, at last, of the king and regency in general. Being elated with the success of his first attempt against the enemies of his house, he had the address to make use of the late chancellor's objection to the authority of his protectorship, to settle himself the more firmly in it, and to extend his power; for soon after (March 13) he reminded the council, that several persons doubted whether the regents could, by their own authority, name a protector: he further alleged, that a similar thing had been insinuated by the French ambassador; and therefore he desired they would allow him to prepare letters patent, under the great seal, to establish him Protector of the Realm, and Governor of the King. He obtained their leave, as most reasonable in appearance; but the wording of the patent being left to his own management, it is thought that he, contrary to the first conditional clause of doing nothing without the consent of the regents, craftily engaged the king to give him full power to do every thing, as he in his wisdom should think for the honour, good, and prosperity of his person and realm; and to assign him a peculiar council that should have a negative upon all cases debated and passed in the privy council; with a restraining clause for this new council, to act only by the protector's advice and consent: but some are of opinion that this was fairly passed by the regency, through the interest of those, who hoped thereby to promote the great work of reformation, of which the protector declared himself the patron.

While these commotions and revolutions in the regency were settling, they were not so forgetful of the public weal, but we find two new treaties concluded with France: one was to renew ancient alliances between the king of England and Francis I. and the other to explain the articles of the peace which king Henry had lately made with him, relating to the bounds and territories of Boulogne, and the fortifications the two kings were making near that place. Both these treaties were signed at London the 11th of March, but were never ratified by Francis, who died at the close of the same month; nor could his successor, Henry II. who was ruled by the pernicious counsels of the cardinal Lorrain, and his brother the duke of Guise, be ever prevailed upon to confirm the same; who being both zealous champions for the authority of the pope, and his religion, and resolved at all events to prevent Edward's marriage with Mary, queen of Scots, their neice, persuaded their sovereign to recover Boulogne at any rate; to reject the treaties; and even to disown the ambassador sent by Francis to London, to conclude them. However, king Edward, not forgetting the friendship which the deceased Francis had shewn to his father; for whom, notwithstanding he died excommunicated by the pope, he ordered a solemn service to be performed to his honour, in the cathedral church of Notre Dame at Paris, soon after he received the news of his death; returned the compliment by ordering a very magnificent funeral solemnity to be performed at the cathedral of St. Paul, London, in commemoration of Francis, on the 19th of June following.

While the affairs of state were settling under the new government in England, the Reformation, which had been greatly favoured by many of the courtiers, but durst not be openly espoused by any during the life-time of Henry the Eighth, who reformed only some things, and left the most material untouched; and was so tyrannical that he would not so much as suffer his subjects to differ in opinion from him, or, at least, not to shew it; was publicly countenanced by them, as soon as his death was made known; and evening prayers began to be read in English in the king's chapel on Easter Monday, though the laws made in the late reign were still in force; the lord protector and archbishop Cranmer being at the head of the reformers, there could be no doubt of the young king's consent, who had been carefully educated by Dr. Cox in the gospel principles of the Reformation.

In the council, the protector and the archbishop of Canterbury declared in favour of the Reformation, and was powerfully seconded without by Dr. Holgate, archbishop of York; Holbeach, bishop of Lincoln; Goodrick, bishop of Ely; Dr. Ridley, and Dr. Latimer, who was discharged from his confinement. They were opposed in this great work by Wriothesley, earl of Southampton; Tunstal, bishop of Durham; Bonner, bishop of London; Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; and many other bishops and ecclesiastics, or friers, who had been recommended to livings at the dissolution of their respective monasteries in the reign of Henry the Eighth.

But the protector, being sure of the sanction of the king, and the countenance of the majority of the council, and having obtained the power abovementioned, he resolved to improve a conjuncture so favourable to the protestant interest. The first step was to appoint visitors of all the churches in every diocese, which were divided on that occasion into six circuits, with power to abolish certain gross abuses introduced into the divine service, and to take down and destroy all images. This may be said to be the first effectual and sincere step taken in England by the crown, for a thorough reformation. While this commission was making out, the good archbishop Cranmer composed a book of homilies, which was published twice this same year (1547,) and appointed to be read in churches, for the edification of the people, and their instruction in the doctrines of the gospel, instead of the legendary sermons, &c. with which an ignorant and superstitious clergy had before captivated their understandings. All these acts of council, and pious endeavours of the good archbishop bishop and his associates in the glorious work of the Reformation, had their desired effect.

The protector, who is to be considered the chief actor in all, both civil, ecclesiastical, and military affairs at this period, was the eldest son of sir John Seymour, of Wolf Hall, in Wiltshire, by the daughter of sir Henry Wentworth, of Nettleshed, in Suffolk. He was educated at Oxford, and left the university to accompany the duke of Suffolk in his expedition into France, in 1533, by whom he was knighted November 1, that year; but his further promotion, though he did not want sufficient recommendations to his prince's favour, by his martial achievements, which Henry the Eighth greatly encouraged, were owing to his sister's marriage with that monarch. Immediately after lady Jane Seymour was married to the king, her brother, Edward Seymour was created viscount Beauchamp, being descended from that house in the female line; earl of Hertford, on the 12th of October, 1537; knight of the Garter in 1540; lord great chamberlain for life in 1542; lieutenant general of the north in 1544; and was appointed by king Henry one of the sixteen to govern the kingdom during the minority of his son Edward. Being so highly in favour with Henry, and being uncle to Edward, there is no reason to be astonished at his being appointed protector of the realm, and his being advanced to the dukedom of Somerset, and of his obtaining an enlargement of his power as protector. In August, 1548, he took a commission to be general or commander in chief, in the expedition against Scotland; which he executed so much to the satisfaction of the nation, that nothing seemed to be able to prejudice him in their favour, but the unnatural contests between him and his brother Thomas, lord high admiral of England. The death of this admiral, in March, 1548, drew great censures on the protector. These were industriously circulated to his disadvantage by his enemies in church and state. Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, and Dudley, earl of Warwick, headed a faction against him in 1549: besides, his partiality to the commons provoked the gentry; and his palace in the Strand (called Somerset House,) erected on the ruins of several churches, and other religious buildings, in a time of war and pestilence, disgusted the clergy and the people; who likewise abhorred his consent to the execution of his brother. To which may be added, his adherence to the Reformation, and his enjoying some of the best manors of the bishops, were crimes never to be forgiven by the bigotted clergy of the age in which he lived. His entertaining German and Italian troops, although it was by the consent and with the approbation of the council, was used as an argument to ruin him in the esteem of the nation in general. His arbitrary proceedings in the state drew upon him the hatred of all the privy counsellors, except archbishop Cranmer, sir William Paget, and sir Thomas Smith, secretary of state. So that after the desperate attempt to secure to himself the king's person, whom he removed, first to Hampton Court, then to Windsor, he was forced to submit to the council, who, on the 14th of October, 1549, committed him to the Tower, and in the January following, deprived him of all his offices; confiscated all his goods, and fined him two thousand pounds per annum. He obtained a full pardon on the 16th of February, and managed his affairs so artfully with the king, as to be brought both to the court and the council in the ensuing April: and that a thorough reconciliation might be effected between him and the earl of Warwick, the duke's daughter was married to viscount Lisle, the earl's son, on the 3rd of June, 1550; and the ambition of the earl of Warwick was tempted by the gilded toy of a ducal coronet. He was therefore made duke of Northumberland; yet, so great was his hatred against the duke of Somerset, that he accused him of a design to raise the people, and to kill him (Dudley), the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, in the way to, or at dinner with the lord Paget, in so aggravating a manner, that the king, who did not so easily penetrate into the designing views of the duke of Northumberland as a more subtle courtier would certainly have done, gave up his uncle entirely to their resentment: he was accordingly committed to the Tower in October 1551; was tried on the 1st of December; found guilty of felony, in intending to imprison the duke of Northumberland; and on the 22nd of January, 1552, he was beheaded on Tower Hill. Although it is generally believed that the conspiracy for which he suffered was a mere forgery, he died with great serenity; but his four friends, who were executed for the same offence, protested their innocence with their last breath (p).

Henry the Eighth had determined to force the Scots to give their young queen Mary to be consort to his son Edward; and this marriage appearing to be most advantageous to the crown of England, Henry, before his death, had given positive directions to execute this project at all events: therefore the protector, having put the affairs of the Reformation upon a good footing, raised an army, and was ready to march against Scotland, not to conquer the country, but to harrass them so, as to bring the Scots to the terms of union, to which they had before consented in parliament. This army, which consisted of thirty thousand foot, and six thousand horse, beside a large fleet of thirty-five men of war, and thirty vessels with ammunition and provisions, to guard the coast, so alarmed the French ministry, who dreaded the marriage and union of England and Scotland, that when the protector was ready to set out on the expedition, the French ambassador at the court of London desired him to consent to a negociation; to which the protector agreed, provided the Scotch commissioners were empowered to assent to the marriage. In consequence,

(p) The character of the duke of Somerset is thus given by a late impartial historian: "He was a person of very great virtues, eminent for his piety, courteous and affable in his greatness, sincere and candid in all his transactions, a patron of the poor and oppressed, but a better general than a counsellor. And though he was not without his faults, yet they were only such as human infirmity exposes most men to when they are advanced to a high station. He had indeed a tincture of vanity, and a fondness for his own notions; and being a man of no extraordinary parts, was too much at the disposal of those, who by flatteries and submissions insinuated themselves into his esteem and confidence. He made likewise too great haste to raise a great estate to be altogether innocent. But to balance these defects, he was never charged with personal vices, nor guilty of falsehood, of perverting public justice, of cruelty, or of oppression."

After this view of the character of the protector, which is far from being unamiable, let us take a retrospective glance at the characters of his two most inveterate enemies, the earl of Southampton and the duke of Northumberland.

Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, was extremely ambitious, very conceited of his own merits, haughty, imperious, arbitrary, superstitious, cruel; and his religious principles, being entirely repugnant to the reformation, his language was always bitter and offensive, hot, and passionate, when the affairs of religion were the subject of debate. It is true he had made his conscience temporize with the innovations during the reign of Henry the Eighth; but his attachment to the superstitions of the church of Rome had been sufficiently evident in the affair of Anne Askew, in his project to ruin queen Catherine Parr, and on many other occasions. Which circumstances were undoubted proofs that the reformers had nothing to expect from him, but continual opposition in religious matters; which made him capable of any attempt to ruin every bar to his project of wresting the government into his own hands, and restoring the ecclesiastical power to the pope and his adherents. The loss of the chancellorship, and other disgraces he met with from the protector's party at the beginning of Edward the Sixth's reign, were never to be pardoned. But his malignant mind was even on the rack to discover methods of the keenest revenge on the duke of Somerset, the supposed author of all his misfortunes; and therefore he no sooner perceived his antagonist decline in his popularity, than he strengthened his power by engaging the earl of Warwick to enter into a plot to cut off the protector, whom this nobleman also looked upon as an obstacle to his own preferment.

The earl of Warwick was John Dudley, son of Edmund Dudley, the notorious evil counsellor to Henry the Seventh, who was put to death in the beginning of the reign of Henry the Eighth, who was pleased, after he had sacrificed the father to the resentment of the people, to dignify this his son John with the title of lord Dudley, and afterwards with that of viscount Lisle. The young favourite improved on this happy revolution of his affairs by a diligent observance of the king's pleasure. He made a considerable figure in those employments at court with which he was entrusted, to the king's satisfaction; and distinguished himself so remarkably by his conduct and bravery in the wars, that he was first made governor of Boulogne, and afterwards admiral of the fleet fitted out against France. He was both a brave soldier and an artful courtier; but of very indifferent morals. He was excessively addicted to his pleasures, and would sometimes run into extravagant debaucheries: nor was he less scrupulous with regard to honour and virtue; for, as his ambition was boundless, he did not stop at the worst means to accomplish his ends; from whence we may infer, that he was not over nice with regard to the affairs of religion. While Henry the Eighth reigned he kept strictly within the bounds prescribed by that prince; and he no sooner saw the majority of king Edward's council for the Reformation, than he declared openly on their side, as the only way to please the king, and to advance his own fortune: but as his scheme to make religion only a mean to raise himself, was easily discovered by the Protestant party, they never put any confidence in him; nor would consent to his promotion to the Chancery, as he expected, upon the disgrace of Wriothesley. Therefore, from this disappointment we may date his disgust to the protector, and his determination to do every thing in his power to effect the ruin of that nobleman, though he had obtained by his means the titles of earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland; and had even gained his daughter in marriage for his son, viscount Lisle. So implacable is hatred founded on ambition, that neither the ties of gratitude nor affinity are able to reconcile it.

The characters of these men, well considered, may furnish a proper clue to the several revolutions in the ministry during the reign of Edward the Sixth; and were therefore necessary to be inserted in this place.

sequence Tunstal, bishop of Durham, and sir Thomas Bowes, were appointed on the part of England, and met the Scotch commissioners on the 4th of August, 1547; but they having no instructions relating to the marriage, this conference proved ineffectual; and the protector departed in August, and entered Scotland on the 2nd of September, with his army, taking the earl of Warwick with him as lieutenant general. The protector secured his retreat by taking and garrisoning several castles; and having forced his way within sight of the Scottish army, consisting of thirty-six thousand men, and thirty pieces of cannon, expecting him on the field of Pinkey, near Musselburgh, he wrote to the earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, proposing to retire, on condition the Scots would agree that the young queen should be bred up in Scotland till she became of age, and give security that she should not till then be contracted to any foreign power, rather than be the cause of shedding so much innocent blood as must otherwise shortly be the case. The French faction, however, so completely prevailed in the council of Scotland, that this moderate proposal was absolutely rejected; and the Scotch seemed so certain of victory, that they attacked the English, who were advantageously entrenched, with their artillery commanding the plain, and their fleet near enough, on the other side, to fire upon the enemy in flank; which had its desired success: for although the Scots advanced in good order, and fought obstinately, they were so galled from every quarter, that they were entirely routed, leaving fourteen thousand on the field of battle, and fifteen hundred prisoners, (eight hundred of whom were gentlemen), in the hands of the English. By this victory obtained by the English, Scotland was thrown into the utmost confusion. The regent retired to Edinburgh; and, after he had garrisoned the castle, shut himself and the queen up in Stirling, with the remains of his army. The protector marched directly to Leith, and took it; and entered Edinburgh without opposition, and plundered it; while the fleet, under lord Clinton, burnt several sea-port towns in the county of Fife, and all the ships in their harbours. There is no doubt but the duke of Somerset, so great was his success, would have forced the young queen out of the regent's hands, had he not been obliged to hasten his return to London, where his brother Thomas was taking measures against him, having employed but sixteen days in this glorious expedition. He departed for England on the 18th of September; and taking his route through the counties of March and Tiviotdale, he left a garrison in the castle of Hume, and made sir Ralph Palmer governor of Roxburgh, which he ordered to be repaired. The great success of this campaign raised the popularity of the protector; and, on his return to London on the 8th of October, the lord mayor and aldermen went out to meet him in Finsbury Field, now called the Artillery Ground, or Bunhill Field.

In the mean time the reformation also proceeded with great advances; for not any of the bishops, except Gardiner, of Winchester, and Bonner, of London, were hardy enough to obstruct the commission granted to visit the churches; and these prelates were for that offence committed to the Fleet Prison. The princess Mary on this occasion wrote to the protector, signifying her dislike of all the changes which were making in religion. He replied to her in very strong terms, that he did not think himself obliged to conform to her sentiments. Accordingly we find, that from this period, all images and statues were thrown out of the churches: the clergy were permitted to marry; an English Liturgy or Common Prayer was established to be used in public churches; the sacrament of the Lord's Supper ordained to be administered in both kinds; masses for souls departed were forbidden; &c. but these alterations could not be complied with by the superstitious devotees of the Romish church, without several tumults, which at length broke out in rebellion.

When the protector was arrived at London, he found that his brother Thomas had not only caballed with his enemies, but had run great lengths to supplant him in the government of the king. Therefore to account for this opposition between the brothers, so as to be able to lay the blame where it ought to be fixed, it may be necessary to advert to the character of Thomas Seymour, the protector's brother. The lord high admiral was a hot, proud, and haughty person; and being also uncle to the king, he could not bear the distinction made between him and the duke of Somerset, by their royal nephew; thinking himself, by his birth and natural endowments, as worthy as his brother Edward, of having a share in the administration of affairs; but perceiving by the late king's will that he was excluded therefrom, he immediately paid his addresses to the princess Elizabeth, hoping, by that mean, to be able on a future day to get possession even of the throne itself. This project, however, not being likely to succeed, he changed his plan, and married the queen-dowager before her royal consort had been dead a month; which he kept private, till he found means, without the knowledge of his brother the protector, to procure a letter from the king, recommending him to the queen for a husband. The marriage was now openly declared; and from this event may be dated the disagreement between the protector and the lord high admiral, which was never made up; though the protector, who was a person of moderation, did every thing in his power to hinder the quarrel from breaking out. The admiral, who was of a very different disposition, looked upon every promotion of his brother, as a lessening of his own birth and affinity to the crown, and gave way to all the means that passion, envy, and malice, could invent to supplant him. He joined with the discontented nobles, and endeavoured to corrupt the king against the duke. So early as Easter, he gained some of the king's servants to his interest, and they took every opportunity that presented itself to sound his praise in the ears of their royal master. Having succeeded thus far, he engaged him frequently to visit his mother-in-law at his house. He gained the affections of the young king, by furnishing him with money for his privy purse, and for small presents to his domestics, that he might not lie under the necessity of applying to his governor, the duke, for every trifling supply he might stand in need of. The protector soon received intelligence of this plan; and notwithstanding the haughty behaviour of his brother, when the affair was mentioned to him, he suppressed his resentment and hoped to reclaim him. The admiral, however, no sooner heard that his brother was in Scotland, than he renewed his cabals with more boldness: he corrupted almost every person about the king; from whom he obtained a new and more ample patent for the office of lord high admiral, with the addition of two hundred marks per annum to the salary. It was this circumstance that obliged the protector to return from Scotland: but it was now too late; for his presence was not able to interrupt the admiral's plans. Nothing short of the government of the king's person would now serve his turn; and by insinuating to the king, that it was too great a power to place in the hands of any one person, the two offices of protector and governor; and by soothing and caressing the child, (for the young king was nothing more,) with greater complaisance and flattery than had been shewn him by the protector, he obtained a message, under the king's own hand, to the house of commons, desiring them to make the admiral governor of his person. The admiral had the effrontery to propose to carry this message himself; but the council being informed thereof, sent certain lords to dissuade him from so gross a procedure. When these nobles returned with a report that he was confirmed in his resolution to carry it himself, they, on the following day, sent an order for him to appear before them in council. This he positively refused to do; and they threatened to deprive him of all his offices, commit him to the Tower, and to prosecute him upon the statute, which made it death for any person to disturb the government. He was now brought to consider the danger he should run by disobeying the council, and, at least, to pretend a reconciliation with his brother, and submission to the lords of the regency: but notwithstanding this pretended reconciliation, he never ceased privately to incense the king against the protector and his other ministers; which being observed by the spies set over him by the protector, he considered him in the light of a very dangerous enemy.

While the protector was thus employed in the field and the cabinet, archbishop Cranmer, in the name of the king, invited into England the famous Peter Martyr, born at Florence; Ochinus, who was made a canon of Canterbury, with a dispensation of residence; Fagius, who was made Hebrew professor at Cambridge, with a pension of a hundred pounds per annum; Bucer, who was seated in the divinity chair at Oxford, as Peter Martyr was at Cambridge, with a salary of a hundred pounds per annum each.

The chancellorship being vacant ever since the disgrace of Wriothesley, a few days before the meeting of parliament, lord Rich, one of the privy counsellors, was made chancellor (q). On the 3rd of November, the day before the meeting of parliament, the council ordered the great seal to be affixed to a patent to warrant the protector in parliament to take precedence of all the nobility, and to sit under the cloth of state, on the right hand of the throne, whether the king were present or absent; which created him a great many enemies, and furnished such as were so before, with an argument to accuse him of aspiring too high, and of an intention to destroy the form of government established by Henry the Eighth.

The parliament met on the 4th of November, 1547, and, being totally influenced by the protector, enacted, amongst other things, that the king's proclamations should be of equal authority with acts of parliament; that private masses should be abolished, and the cup should be given to the laity in the communion; confirmed the king's supremacy, gave him all the lands designed for the maintenance of chantries, chapels, and colleges, which were not possessed by Henry the Eighth, and all revenues given for obits, anniversaries, lights in the churches, together with all Guild lands, which any fraternity enjoyed on the same account, provided they should be applied to the maintenance of grammar schools and preachers. This parliament also gave the king power to nominate to the vacant sees by his letters patents; by which they abolished the method of choosing bishops by congè d'elire, which they looked upon only as a mockery, because those pretended elections were all made by the direction of the court: it repealed several acts relating to treason, made during the contests between the two contending houses of York and Lancaster; and in the reign of the late king Henry the Eighth. It likewise abrogated all acts that declared that felony since the 23rd of April, of 1 Henry VIII. the acts of 5 Richard II. and 2 Henry V. touching the Lollards; the law of the Six Articles, which served the tyrannical Henry to scourge the people during the latter part of his reign. And it ended December 24, with a general pardon, or Act of Grace, by which Gardiner, the furious catholic bishop, was discharged from the Fleet, none being excepted but such prisoners as were confined in the Tower of London.

The affairs of religion seem at this time to have been the principal object of the care of the regency: for in the beginning of the year 1548, we find several acts of council for completing the reformation from Popery. On the 25th of January, the superstitious blessing of candles on the day of Purification on February 2; the blessing of ashes on the first day of Lent, and of palms on the Sunday next before Easter; all wakes and Plough Monday days were forbidden and ordered to be suppressed. A few days afterwards they approved of the people's zeal in pulling down images, and ordered that they should all be removed from the churches. They also did what laid in their power to abolish auricular confession, that badge of Popish slavery, which kept the deceived multitude in eternal subjection to the tricks and impositions of the priests. But these great points against Popery were not carried without opposition, though confirmed by the king's proclamation in virtue of his supremacy. Gardiner, though so lately released from confinement, once more attempted to obstruct the great work of reformation, by publicly protesting against all changes in religion till the king became of age. This drew upon him the resentment of the administration a second time, who sent him to the Tower; and by that single act of severity against their head, they overawed the whole of the Romish party, who, for the present, at least outwardly, conformed to the Reformation.

Thus the state of religion began to flourish, when the regent of Scotland, expecting to be supported by the French to revenge the damage done last year by the protector, besieged Broughty castle with eight thousand men; which obliged the protector, contrary to his inclination, to continue the war; and to send Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, against the Scots, with a commission of his lieutenant general, granted by the authority of a new patent, which afterwards drew upon him many evils.

The English, in the mean time, endeavoured to divert the Scots from the siege of Broughty, by returning the compliment with taking the castle of Hadington; which enabled them to cover the most fruitful part of Scotland, and to make excursions to the very gates of their capital, it being no more than twelve miles distant from Edinburgh. Soon after they took Lauder also, and with the utmost expedition, put them into a good posture of defence.

The Scots, finding themselves in danger of being again worsted in the contest, demanded the promised succours from France, which amounted to six thousand, and arrived at the latter end of May; but would not act against the English in an offensive manner, till the young queen was put into their hands, and sent into France; she was carried north about, to avoid the English fleet under admiral Seymour, who made several fruitless descents on the coast; but having missed his ward, he returned home, without doing any material damage to the enemy.

The French, having thus obtained their ends, joined the Scots in the siege of Hadington; who surprized and cut off sir Robert Bowes, and sir Thomas Palmer, sent with thirteen hundred men to relieve the castle; but were themselves forced to raise the siege at the approach of the earl of Shrewsbury, with twenty-two thousand men, most of them Germans, hired from the elector of Saxony and the prince of Hesse. This put it in the power of the earl, not only to relieve the besieged, but to distress the enemy greatly, who were intrenched in an advantageous post. Yet, by what infatuation it could not be conceived, he, having supplied the castle with provisions, retired abruptly into England; which gave the French so much spirits, that they made an inroad into England as far as Newcastle, and meeting with no resistance, returned laden with spoil.

The French general D'Esse, flushed with this success, began to behave with so much imperiousness towards the Scots, that the queen dowager prayed that he might be recalled: but the court of France, though condescending ing to her request in that particular, gave her and the Scots much greater reason of complaint, by forcing upon them Mons. Montluc, bishop of Valence, to be chancellor of Scotland, who was sent over under the protection of a new general.

Thus the summer passed: and on the 24th of November the parliament of England met, after having been prorogued to the 20th of April, then to October the 15th and 25th, and at last to November the 24th, on account of the plague then at London. This parliament distinguished itself by confirming all the orders of council concerning the reformation in religion; and farther, allowed priests to marry; confirmed the new liturgy, which retrenched divers abuses, and gave a favourable turn to the Reformation.

While these things were done in parliament to the satisfaction of the Protestants, the protector had need of all his power to ward off the plots and attempts of his enemies; and to secure the king's person from the violent projects of the admiral his brother; who, finding every other step to the supreme power sufficiently guarded against his projects, had determined to get the king to his house at Holt, in Denbighshire, to displace the protector, and to seize the government into his own hands, with the assistance of ten thousand men already enlisted in several places. This plot being discovered, the council signed a warrant on the 19th of January, 1549, for his commitment to the Tower. Lord Russel, the earl of Southampton, and Mr. Secretary Petre, were commissioned to receive the depositions of the witnesses against him; and these noblemen reported to the council, on the 22nd of February, that the admiral was accused of conspiring the subversion of government; of committing many misdemeanours in the discharge of his office as lord admiral; of protecting, and taking a share with pirates in their robberies; and of refusing justice to those who demanded it, &c. His brother, the protector, now advised him to resign his office, and to retire from court; which, had he complied with would have saved his life; but he positively refused to adhere to his brother's advice, and rejected all counsel for his safety. His accusation was then drawn up in thirty-three articles, and a committee was deputed by the council to examine him; but he refused to answer, and demanded an open trial, and to be brought face to face before his accusers. Yet, although he was a peer of the realm, lord high admiral of England, and uncle to the king, this point of justice was denied him; and a bill of attainder was ordered into the house of lords, where it was read on the 25th and 26th of February, and passed on the 27th. When the bill was sent down to the commons, it met with some opposition till the 4th of March, (q) He was grandson to Richard Rich, a wealthy merchant, and sheriff of London in 1441. This gentleman had been bred a lawyer, and by his pliant temper, he raised himself to the pinnacle of the law.

when the king was advised to send a message, signifying his pleasure that they should pass it; when, it being put to the vote, the commons, in a full house of four hundred members, passed the bill, not above twelve voting in the negative. The royal assent being given to this attainder, the lord high admiral Seymour was beheaded on the 20th of the same month, by warrant from the regency, to which the hands of archbishop Cranmer, and of his own brother the protector were set. At the place of execution this unhappy nobleman, who had lived a vicious, profane, and irreligious life, made a very bad end; for, as bishop Latimer says, "he died very dangerously, yrksomelye, and horryblye." Nevertheless, how wicked soever the admiral may be supposed to have been, the protector's enemies made use of his prosecution and death, to raise him more uneasiness and trouble.

The parliament, having passed the bill of attainder abovementioned, granted the king a subsidy of one shilling in the pound for three years; three pence for every ewe, two pence for every wether kept in pastures, three half-pence for every woollen cloth made for sale in England for three years; strangers to pay two shillings. The clergy granted six shillings in the pound payable in the same time. When they had thus provided for the public safety, it was carried into a law, That malt should be three weeks in making, except in June, July, and August, when seventeen days were thought sufficient: that tythes should be paid as they had been within forty years before; and that no person should carry away his corn, &c. before he had set out the tythes, or otherwise agreed for them, upon pain of forfeiting treble the value of them: that an incumbent not paying his tenths due to the king, when demanded, should be deprived of that benefice for which they were due; and that butchers, bakers, &c. conspiring and agreeing not to sell meat, bread, &c. but at certain prices; or workmen refusing to work, except at a certain price or rate, should, for the first offence, forfeit ten pounds, for the second, twenty pounds, and for the third, forty pounds, to be paid within six days, or to suffer imprisonment for twenty days. The parliament was prorogued on the 14th of March, to the 4th of November.
